The federal government, and especially the Environmental Protection Agency and its former administrator, Christine Todd Whitman, were accused by Representatives Jerrold Nadler, a Democrat whose district includes Lower Manhattan, and Anthony D. Weiner, a Democrat from Brooklyn, of having falsely stated in the first days after the attack that the air downtown was safe to breathe. At an appearance yesterday in Harlem, Senator Clinton said that she felt that Mrs. Whitman and her agency "deliberately misled people" into thinking that it was safe to return to Lower Manhattan.

A report by the Inspector General's office in 2003 found that the E.P.A. went beyond what it knew in making general statements about the safety of the air downtown after the attack. It also found that the White House had at least indirectly influenced the wording of some statements by removing cautionary language. Mrs. Whitman strongly defended herself shortly after the release of that report, saying that her statements reflected what was known at the time and applied to areas outside ground zero.

Lea Geronimo, a resident of the Lower East Side, said it was the assurance from the E.P.A. that led her to return to her home and office three blocks from ground zero a week after the towers collapsed. She said she developed bronchitis and severe rashes a few months later.

DOJ_NMG_0061032

"Our lives will never be the same, and we will not tolerate half-measures and the whisper of a promise," she testified. "We need a comprehensive long-term treatment and study program to provide immediate care for residents and workers in Lower Manhattan."

The health of downtown residents has not been as well studied as that of ground zero workers, but limited medical surveys have indicated that many residents developed respiratory problems after 9/11, though the extent to which those problems have persisted is not known.

More than 100 residents gathered Thursday night at St. Paul's Chapel to demand screening and treatment.

Mr. Nadler, who attended the Thursday meeting and yesterday's hearing, said he had introduced a bill that would make rescue and recovery workers, downtown residents and schoolchildren who are sick eligible for treatment under Medicare.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of Manhattan and Queens, introduced a bill that would reopen the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund to make assistance available to those who are ill.

And Senator Clinton said at the hearing yesterday that she would push for an additional federal appropriation to cover the rising costs of medical treatment. "We cannot rest until we put into place a system to care for every single person who was affected by 9/11," she said.

Dr. John Howard, the federal 9/11 health care coordinator, told the committee that the $75 million appropriated for screening and treatment will be available next month and should be considered "a down payment," that will be supplemented as officials prepare estimates of the number of people who need help, the cost of caring for them and the types of programs they will need.

On Thursday, Dr. John O. Agwunobi, the assistant secretary for health of the Department of Health and Human Services, was named by Michael O. Leavitt, the department secretary, to lead a policy task force to develop programs for dealing with the 9/11 health issues.

Dr. Howard said he would continue in his current position as coordinator with groups in New York while also helping to shape new policies.

EPA, NYC Blamed For 9/11 Health Problems (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, September 9, 2006

City and federal officials came under withering criticism Friday from lawmakers who charged that ground zero workers were not protected as they clambered over a smoking pile of toxic debris — and have not been properly cared for since.

Former Environmental Protection Agency head Christie Todd Whitman was the most frequent target during a day-long House hearing about the health woes afflicting thousands of ground zero workers.

Whitman stressed in the days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that the air in lower Manhattan was safe, although she also said workers at the World Trade Center site needed to use protective breathing gear. In a "60 Minutes" segment to be aired Sunday, she said the responsibility for offering such gear to workers lay with the city.

Whitman is being sued over her public assurances, and she was accused Friday of doing too little to protect workers.

Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., who chaired the hearing, said Whitman's September 2001 statements "defied logic and everybody knows that."

Whitman defended herself Friday, insisting that it was up to local authorities to make sure rescue workers wore protective breathing gear.

"We agreed then, and I reiterate now, that the air on the site was not clean ... We were emphatic that workers needed to wear respirators, a message I repeated frequently. But I did not have the jurisdiction to force workers to wear them — that was up to their superiors," Whitman said in a statement.

City officials already under fire for their own role in the ongoing health problems disputed Whitman's claims.

City Health Commissioner Thomas Frieden said the federal government was responsible for work safety at the site, and added that he did not think Whitman's post-Sept. 11 assurances were "an appropriate way to word the message."

DOJ_NMG_0061033

In a Sept. 13, 2001, press release, the EPA said the air around the disaster site was relatively safe. On Sept. 16, 2001, Whitman said that tests showed air pollution levels "that cause us no concern." Two days later, she said she was glad to reassure New York and Washington residents that their air and water were safe.

Others appearing at the hearing before the House Subcommittee on National Security, Emerging Threats, and International Relations, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., accused the EPA of lying to New Yorkers and endangering public health.

At a separate event Friday, Mayor Michael Bloomberg defended the city's handling of the disaster, saying it distributed masks.

"Nobody knew whether there would be health issues down the road, and they made the decisions that they thought were right at the time," said Bloomberg, who succeeded Rudolph Giuliani as mayor months after the attacks.

Joe Lhota, Giuliani's former deputy mayor for operations, said in a statement Thursday, "The EPA publicly reported that the general air quality was safe, and the city repeatedly instructed workers on the pile to use their respirators."

The hearing began with testimony from Joseph Zadroga, whose NYPD officer son died in January of respiratory disease attributed to ground zero exposure.

Joseph Zadroga briefly lost his composure as he described the day he found James Zadroga dead on his bedroom floor. The father blasted the city for doing nothing while his son was sick, saying, "He was treated like a dog."

Public pressure has been growing for the government to deal with health problems blamed on toxic dust at the site. This week Mount Sinai Medical Center released a study showing that nearly seven out of every 10 ground zero responders suffered lung problems.

Dr. Robin Herbert, co-director of the New York hospital's program monitoring afflicted workers, told lawmakers that new patients are still arriving at Mount Sinai to be treated for 9/11-related illnesses — and thousands probably will need lifelong care.

The Bush administration said it will continue to help sick Sept. 11 workers but would not say what their long-term health needs might cost.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told New York lawmakers Thursday that $75 million would be delivered in the next two months to pay for treatment programs.

Veterans Of Sept. 11 (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

One of the worst things about listening to those who rushed to ground zero after the attacks on Sept. 11 is that you can barely hear their stories. For many, the lungs hardly work. The cough, the ragged breathing, the confusion and even the bitterness make it hard for some of those who labored in that toxic cloud to explain how they feel forgotten. Like Steven Centore, a former federal worker from Flanders, N.Y., who became so emotional at a Congressional hearing in Manhattan yesterday that he had to be gently reminded of his own condition.

Sick from his time working at ground zero, Mr. Centore was forced to pay for his treatment, and the federal government offered only one thing, he said: a “screening” that determined he was indeed sick. “You mean I’m just a data point for you,” he recalled saying to the nurse filling out his forms.

People like Mr. Centore and maybe 40,000 others from across the country must be treated for diseases that become more obvious every week. As Mount Sinai Medical Center reported Tuesday, as many as seven in 10 of those who worked at ground zero and Fresh Kills on Staten Island have felt their lungs deteriorate because of their heroism.

What the veterans of Sept. 11 need now is a national response, which is not a strong suit these days in Washington. There are a number of partial efforts to help by city, state, federal and private sources. But somebody has to make sure that those who are suffering don’t fall through the many gaps. Recommendations worth considering include putting those without health care under Medicare. The federal government should also restore the Victims Compensation Fund, which originally focused on victims’ families and was phased out in 2003. This time the fund should pay for health care of these emergency workers. If something drastic is not done soon, there are lawsuits involving as many as 8,000 people that could end up costing taxpayers a lot more in the long run.

DOJ_NMG_0061034

For some politicians, the message seems to have gotten through — especially as the nation remembers the attack five years ago this Monday. Members of Congress from the New York area have been pressuring to get more federal money for these responders. And Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, has promised to create a task force to provide some organization and to figure out the best ways to proceed. Creating a task force sounds like a delay rather than an answer, but the politicians from the Northeast who have been trumpeting this cause should now keep pestering Mr. Leavitt to move quickly.

As we pay homage on Monday to those who died on Sept. 11, 2001, it is worth remembering what happened on May 28, 2002. That evening — a scant 37 weeks after the attack — workers took down the last column from that smoldering mound and officially cleared the site. As one worker said of the herculean task completed by so many selfless people, "You found out who you were, what it means to be an American, what it is to stand up."

They came when the nation was attacked. Taking care of them now is a national obligation.

Washington School Still Feels Pain Of 9/11 (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — Sinita Brown will always prefer "the garden," a small plot shaded by the weathered brick walls of Madeleine V. Leckie Elementary School, of all the memorials to those killed in the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

Leckie Elementary lost a student, a teacher and two parents when American Airlines Flight 77 crashed into the Pentagon, killing 184 people. The student was Ms. Brown's son.

As President Bush prepares to mark the fifth anniversary with high-profile remembrances at the three crash sites, the elementary school will mark the day with a low-key ceremony. And the families of the school's four victims will cling to the bonds between them.

"Leckie is home," Ms. Brown, who now lives in Florida, said in a telephone interview. "No matter where we go, we will always come back. We were all happy there. Every time I am there, I feel like my son is a legend."

The families may have scattered, but the school and its garden remain a center of gravity, a place to steal away to and remember the last times their families were whole.

Built with the help of the Washington Architectural Foundation and other donors, the stretch of green includes a walkway, edged with the handprints of hundreds of students. Wooden benches in three sections represent those who were lost.

"Every time you go here, it reminds you that they were nice people and they didn't do anything wrong," said Arika Muse, a fifth grader who was in kindergarten in 2001.

Arika and some of her friends hope to speak at the school's Sept. 11 assembly on Monday. Soon, there will be no more students at Leckie with a clear memory of the day, although the older children have been told the story enough to pass it down.

Hilda E. Taylor, the teacher killed in the attack, was from Sierra Leone and had often lamented that Americans cared little about history and geography. Active with the National Geographic Society, Ms. Taylor took students on field trips sponsored by the organization.

In 2001, Ms. Taylor selected Ms. Brown's son, Bernard Brown II, a sixth grader with a magnetic personality and a permanent grin. Bernard, 11, was a good student, and Ms. Taylor thought a trip to the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary off California would motivate him to work even harder. Along on the trip were students and teachers from two other Washington schools, who were among those who died in the crash.

While many of those affected by the attacks have come to know one another through grief, those from Leckie had been close before that day.

Drawing many of its students from military housing and a nearby homeless shelter, the school is tucked away in a neighborhood east of the Anacostia River, where the problems of poverty and crime often fail to draw notice in the rest of Washington.

"The crime goes on and on, but we do all we can do to hold up our families and keep moving forward together," said Clementine D. Homesley, the principal.

In 2004, vandals stole benches from the memorial garden. Benefactors replaced them.

DOJ_NMG_0061035

The Browns lived in a military housing complex near the home of Andrea and Johnnie Doctor Jr., whose daughter attended Leckie and was a friend of Bernard. Mr. Doctor, a Navy information systems specialist, was one of the two Leckie parents killed. Marsha D. Ratchford, the other parent who died, lived with her family in an adjacent compound.

Bernard Brown Sr., often called Big Bernard, and Mr. Doctor, known as Doc, were basketball coaches on the military base and best friends. They were active at Leckie and ever present at their children's games. The families took turns picking up each other's children from schools and barbecued together on weekends.

Ms. Taylor was as much a friend as teacher. She helped Ms. Doctor, who was working to advance her nursing degree, with her college papers. She left her car at the Browns' house the morning of the trip so she and Bernard could go to the airport together.

"We were all family before Sept. 11," Ms. Doctor said. "And we are family now, for life."

Ms. Brown and Ms. Doctor still talk nearly every week. Ms. Homesley, Leckie's principal, keeps them posted on happenings at the school.

In June, the friends gathered at a park in Hampton, Va., where Ms. Brown's parents live, to celebrate what would have been Bernard's 16th birthday. Over hot dogs, ribs, fried fish and a birthday cake big enough to feed the more-than-100 guests, they reminisced and imagined the boy as a young man, showing off the Jeep his father had promised him as soon as he was old enough to drive.

"Nobody was shedding any tears that day," said Betty Carter, Bernard's grandmother. "Everybody was rejoicing because they knew he was looking down on us and rejoicing, too."

Ms. Doctor, who moved to South Carolina after her husband's death, returned to Washington in June. On the daily commute from her new job at a hospital in Virginia, she drives past the school, though it is not the quickest way home.

"It's like a calm comes over me here," she said, sitting on the bench dedicated to her husband. "The Pentagon was where he worked, but this school was someplace he really enjoyed."

The Browns have decided not to return to Washington for the school's memorial assembly. They will go, instead, to watch their daughter, Courtney, 12, play in a basketball game. That is what Bernard would have wanted to do, Ms. Brown said.

They will visit the school in their own time, when attention on the anniversary of their son's death has subsided.

"There is nothing but love up in that school," Ms. Brown said. "Genuine love."

He Bears The Mark Of His Loss Sadly (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A JAB, and then another, and another and another, almost like the riveting of bolts at a construction site. When the jabbing stopped an hour later, the two towers were soaring again from the Manhattan bedrock, their windows forever tinted red by the evening sun, their majesty forever set against a sky's lavender sighs.

This is how the World Trade Center always looked, at least from the dusky vantage point of a Starrett City rooftop in Brooklyn, at least in Jason Audiffred's memory. He would leave his family's sixth-floor apartment, ascend to the top of the building, and gaze west. Nothing like it, nothing in the world.

Now, at least, this special place had been restored, bolted with ink to Mr. Audiffred's beefy left bicep by an artist called Coney Island Vinny. The large and arresting tattoo, of course, means that the central catastrophe of our time is a part of him, always, in ways he can never escape.

But, he says, "I want to be reminded."

At 5-foot-9 and 245 pounds, with a shaved head and a nose sporting a diamond, Mr. Audiffred could be considered imposing, and his trade center tattoo only magnifies that sense. But there is something soft and wounded in his hazel eyes. He is 24, yet often seems on the verge of tears.

"He hasn't come to terms with it yet," says his mother, Robin, sitting beside him.

Her son does not disagree.

DOJ_NMG_0061036

Early every weekday morning, James Audiffred — Robin's husband, Jason's father — would drive west to the trade center, where he joined many other people who quietly kept the colossus clean and functioning. He had many trade center keys on his ring and, after 18 years of service, was operating one of the elevators in the north tower.

"From the 78th floor's sky lobby to the 107th floor, the Windows on the World," Jason Audiffred says. He remembers that his father would wear a blue blazer, blue slacks and a white shirt.

This father and son had a typical father-and-son relationship, which is to say loving, complex, occasionally tense, extremely tight. Yes, the father would get on the son for dropping out of high school and hanging around with the wrong people. But the father also played basketball with the son, cut his hair, built a carrying case for his D.J. equipment.

The two also shared a love for the trade center. The father took his only child to work with him so often that the boy knew many employees by their first names. The father also arranged for him to spend a summer as a tour guide on the south tower's observation deck. "To this day I have the view in my head," the son says.

On that day nearly five years ago, Mr. Audiffred saw the breaking news on television, raced up his apartment building to that familiar rooftop, and watched the ominous smoke belching from his father's workplace. James Audiffred went up that morning and never came down. No trace of him was ever recovered. He was 38.

On a day nearly four years ago, Mr. Audiffred sat down in a folding chair at a tattoo studio in Sheepshead Bay. He presented the artist with snapshots of a painting he owned, one of the trade center towers, and said: recreate it.

"I just wanted to bring the pain to my outer body," he says.

Jab, jab, jab, the riveting began.

After his tattoo, his first, was finished, his mother sat down for her first and only: a portrait of her husband, with his date of birth and date of death above her left breast. It hurt, she says, oh God did it hurt.

But without his body recovered, this is where her Jimmy is buried, near her heart.

Mr. Audiffred, who has trouble holding a job because, his mother says again, he "hasn't come to terms," eventually decided to get another tattoo, and another and another.

Tattoos became his therapy, Coney Island Vinny his therapist. Several of his tattoos relate to his passions: hip-hop, money, the Yankees.

Others, though, reflect that day and those towers. His right bicep, for example, now provides what he calls Part 2: a scene, also set at evening time and against a lavender backdrop, that depicts the hole at ground zero.

And beneath that first tattoo on his left bicep, beneath those idealized towers reaching for his shoulder, there now appears a question: "Why?"

"I never got an honest answer to why it happened," he says, his soft eyes searching.

After 5 Years, His Voice Can Still Crack (NYT)

By Joe Nocera

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TIME passes. Time heals.

A few days before the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, I went to see James J. Dunne III, the managing partner of the small investment banking firm Sandler O'Neill & Partners. Sandler O'Neill, you may recall, was one of the hardest hit firms that day. Its primary offices were on the 104th floor of the south tower of the World Trade Center; of the 83 employees (out of a total of 171) who were in the office that awful morning, only 17 made it out alive. Among the 66 who died were two of the three men who ran the firm: Herman Sandler, the co-founder, and Christopher Quackenbush, who headed investment banking.

Jimmy Dunne was the junior member of the ruling troika. He had been spared because he was on a golf course in Westchester County that morning, trying to qualify for an amateur tournament. Truth to tell, before 9/11, he was more focused on golf than on work. At 45, he had one foot out the door.

But I learned that only later, and it came as a surprise. The Jimmy Dunne I met shortly after 9/11 was more committed to his work than anyone I'd ever known. Thrust into a role he had never expected and had never prepared for — not just to lead Sandler O'Neill, but to save it — he embraced his task with an unnerving intensity.

DOJ_NMG_0061037

Back then, he was everywhere, doing everything: comforting grieving families, hiring equity traders (the equity desk lost 20 of its 24 traders), asking for help from competitors to get into deals, writing eulogies for dead partners, going on CNBC to refute a report that the firm was going out of business, figuring out how to rebuild the computer systems, and on and on.

There was something so raw about him then, so fierce, as if his life truly depended on rebuilding Sandler O'Neill. I remember especially how openly emotional he could be. He would start talking about Mr. Sandler, who had been his mentor, or Mr. Quackenbush, his best friend forever, a man who helped him quit drinking in his 20's — and his eyes would well up while his voice would start to crack. He always seemed on the verge of losing it. But he never did.

Five years later, Jimmy Dunne met me in his paneled office on Third Avenue and shook my hand. His hair was whiter than it used to be, and he'd gained a little weight. What was most apparent, though, was that the overpowering intensity that had characterized him after 9/11 had lifted.

Once we sat down, he immediately launched into a recitation about how much stronger the firm has become in recent years, with 255 employees, vastly improved research and a better mergers and acquisitions department. Though, he quickly added, things were more difficult this year because the "flat yield curve" was making trading profits tougher to come by.

I had to smile. So did he.

No one will ever accuse Jimmy Dunne of being the perfect boss. "He's not always the most patient listener, and he can be brutally blunt," said the firm's co-chief operating officer, Michael Lacovara, who joined a few years ago. "And I think he believes he can do anybody's job as well as they can do it themselves." But, added Mr. Lacovara, "if on Sept. 12, 2001, he hadn't felt that way, we wouldn't be here today." Mr. Dunne turned out to be the exact right person to lead Sandler O'Neill out of the abyss.

"What he did was a little akin to Rudy Giuliani," said Marc Maltz, the managing partner of the Triad Consulting Group, which worked with the firm, providing both organizational and psychological assistance for two years after 9/11. "He made decisions that gave people confidence. Once Jimmy worked it through in the first 48 hours and concluded that the firm would rebuild, he gave it the kind of leadership that was necessary."

There were two instinctive decisions he made in particular that would prove enormously beneficial over the long haul. First, he and several other surviving partners — who were also thrust into new leadership roles — made the snap decision that despite its crippled state, the firm would do right by the families of its deceased employees. It extended full benefits for five years for all the families. It set up a foundation to pay for the education of the 71 children who lost a parent who had worked at Sandler O'Neill. It offered years of psychological counseling not just to surviving employees but to family members of the deceased.

And in 2001, it paid out salaries and bonuses as if the employees were still alive and working. It also paid out the deceased partners' capital to their families, even though that depleted the firm's own capital. Indeed, as it completed deals or did trades in the latter part of 2001, it shared the proceeds with the families of deceased partners who had been working on those deals before 9/11.

These acts of generosity created a tremendous amount of good will for the firm. It motivated employees and caused clients and competitors and just about everyone else to rally around it. But that's not why Mr. Dunne took that path. Lots of small firms like to say they're a family, but at Sandler O'Neill it was actually true. "It really was a firm founded by friends who hired friends," Mr. Maltz said. More than anything else, the culture of the place drove Mr. Dunne's decision.

Mr. Dunne's second decision, equally instinctive and heart-felt, was to cast the rebuilding of Sandler O'Neill in moral terms. Partly, Mr. Dunne used the "they can't do this to us'' rhetoric, and partly he made the case that rebuilding the firm was something the deceased would want the survivors to do. But just as important, it gave the living a way to connect with one another, to do something after 9/11 that felt purposeful and important. "The organization had such a deep sense of moral purpose," marveled Mr. Maltz, who has written several papers about the underpinnings of Sandler O'Neill's revival.

Karen Fishman, one of the 17 employees who got out of the south tower before it collapsed, said: "Work was a way to deal with what happened. You needed to be with people who experienced what you experienced. You didn't want the firm to go away, because you needed it."

As with many Sandler O'Neill survivors, Ms. Fishman was suddenly handed new responsibilities. She buried herself in her work, sometimes thinking, after a 12-hour day, that she hadn't worked hard enough. But as the firm got stronger, those feelings lifted, and she began to feel instead that she should spend more time with her children. So in 2003, she left the firm. Time was passing. Time was healing.

DOJ_NMG_0061038

Mr. Dunne believes that the decisions he and the other new leaders of the firm made back then gave them a confidence they hadn't had before. And that also helped Sandler O'Neill become a bigger, stronger firm. "It was like we were in a cave, and we were making decisions without having any idea what other firms were doing," he said. "And then we saw others doing the same things we did. Usually when you are a small firm, you wait to see what the big firms are going to do. But we didn't wait for anyone's lead. And I think that has given us the confidence to believe that there isn't a piece of business in our niche that we shouldn't compete for — and get."

Today, of course, the number of employees hired since 9/11 vastly exceeds the number who were there that day. Still, I was astonished to discover that 74 of the 105 employees who worked for Sandler O'Neill on Sept. 12, 2001, are still there. But there's not much of a gap anymore between the new people and the old ones, as there inevitably was for the first year or so. And for the most part, even the old-timers now view 9/11 as an event that has slowly receded into the past.

"I don't need to go back there," said William Hickey, who now helps run the firm's M.& A. department. "I think about my friends all the time, but I don't think about the event itself."

Indeed, the person who probably dwells the most on 9/11 is Mr. Dunne himself. Over time, the firm took down from the walls the many letters of support and grief it had put up after 9/11; Mr. Dunne's own collection came down last of all, and only at the urging of his sister, who told him that the time had come for him to do so.

But he hasn't taken them all down. In his office, he has several framed letters, including one from Mr. Quackenbush's brother, written shortly after the attack, urging him to rebuild the firm. Sandler O'Neill commissioned a sculpture with the names of the deceased employees, and placed it in the lobby of its office. But after a few years, some employees came to feel that it was too omnipresent a reminder of an event they were trying to move beyond. So Mr. Dunne had it moved to a small alcove just outside his own office, where he, at least, can see it every day.

Most of all, Mr. Dunne still feels a sense of moral purpose. It's just a little different now. Whereas rebuilding was once a way of honoring his deceased partners, now he feels something else. "What are our responsibilities to all the people who helped us or took an interest in seeing us do well?" he said. "We got letters from a farmer in Iowa and a teacher in South Korea. They took the time to say that they respected what we were doing. I feel a large responsibility to the world for helping us survive."

Not long ago, Mr. Dunne gathered his partners together and told them he wanted to extend the benefits to the families for another three years. Not a single one dissented.

Why did you do that? I asked him. "We did it because we feel fortunate," he replied, "more fortunate than when we first did it five years ago. It just felt like the right thing to do."

His voice suddenly cracked, just as it used to before the passage of time.

Declarations The Sounds That Still Echo From 9/11 (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Everyone remembers the pictures, but I think more and more about the sounds. I always ask people what they heard that day in New York. We've all seen the film and videotape, but the sound equipment of television crews didn't always catch what people have described as the deep metallic roar.

The other night on TV there was a documentary on the Ironworkers of New York's Local 40, whose members ran to the site when the towers fell. They pitched in on rescue, then stayed for eight months to deconstruct a skyscraper some of them had helped build 35 years before. An ironworker named Jim Gaffney said, "My partner kept telling me the buildings are coming down and I'm saying 'no way.' Then we heard that noise that I will never forget. It was like a creaking and then the next thing you felt the ground rumbling."

Rudy Giuliani said it was like an earthquake. The actor Jim Caviezel saw the second plane hit the towers on television and what he heard shook him: "A weird, guttural discordant sound," he called it, a sound exactly like lightning. He knew because earlier that year he'd been hit. My son, then a teenager in a high school across the river from the towers, heard the first plane go in at 8:45 a.m. It sounded, he said, like a heavy truck going hard over a big street grate. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0061039

I think too about the sounds that came from within the buildings and within the planes -- the phone calls and messages left on answering machines, all the last things said to whoever was home and picked up the phone. They awe me, those messages.

Something terrible had happened. Life was reduced to its essentials. Time was short. People said what counted, what mattered. It has been noted that there is no record of anyone calling to say, "I never liked you," or, "You hurt my feelings." No one negotiated past grievances or said, "Vote for Smith." Amazingly -- or not -- there is no record of anyone damning the terrorists or saying "I hate them."

No one said anything unneeded, extraneous or small. Crisis is a great editor. When you read the transcripts that have been released over the years it's all so clear.

Flight 93 flight attendant Ceecee Lyles, 33 years old, in an answering-machine message to her husband: "Please tell my children that I love them very much. I'm sorry, baby. I wish I could see your face again."

Thirty-one-year-old Melissa Harrington, a California-based trade consultant at a meeting in the towers, called her father to say she loved him. Minutes later she left a message on the answering machine as her new husband slept in their San Francisco home. "Sean, it's me," she said. "I just wanted to let you know I love you."

Capt. Walter Hynes of the New York Fire Department's Ladder 13 dialed home that morning as his rig left the firehouse at 85th Street and Lexington Avenue. He was on his way downtown, he said in his message, and things were bad. "I don't know if we'll make it out. I want to tell you that I love you and I love the kids."

Firemen don't become firemen because they're pessimists. Imagine being a guy who feels in his gut he's going to his death, and he calls on the way to say goodbye and make things clear. His widow later told the Associated Press she'd played his message hundreds of times and made copies for their kids. "He was thinking about us in those final moments."

Elizabeth Rivas saw it that way too. When her husband left for the World Trade Center that morning, she went to a laundry, where she heard the news. She couldn't reach him by cell and rushed home. He'd called at 9:02 and reached her daughter. The child reported, "He say, mommy, he say he love you no matter what happens, he loves you." He never called again. Mrs. Rivas later said, "He tried to call me. He called me."

There was the amazing acceptance. I spoke this week with a medical doctor who told me she'd seen many people die, and many "with grace and acceptance." The people on the planes didn't have time to accept, to reflect, to think through; and yet so many showed the kind of grace you see in a hospice.

Peter Hanson, a passenger on United Airlines Flight 175 called his father. "I think they intend to go to Chicago or someplace and fly into a building," he said. "Don't worry, Dad -- if it happens, it will be very fast." On the same flight, Brian Sweeney called his wife, got the answering machine, and told her they'd been hijacked. "Hopefully I'll talk to you again, but if not, have a good life. I know I'll see you again some day."

There was Tom Burnett's famous call from United Flight 93. "We're all going to die, but three of us are going to do something," he told his wife, Deena. "I love you, honey."

These were people saying, essentially, In spite of my imminent death, my thoughts are on you, and on love. I asked a psychiatrist the other day for his thoughts, and he said the people on the planes and in the towers were "accepting the inevitable" and taking care of "unfinished business." "At death's door people pass on a responsibility -- 'Tell Billy I never stopped loving him and forgave him long ago.' 'Take care of Mom.' 'Pray for me, Father. Pray for me, I haven't been very good.' " They address what needs doing.

This reminded me of that moment when Todd Beamer of United 93 wound up praying on the phone with a woman he'd never met before, a Verizon Airfone supervisor named Lisa Jefferson. She said later that his tone was calm. It seemed as if they were "old friends," she later wrote. They said the Lord's Prayer together. Then he said "Let's roll." * * *

This is what I get from the last messages. People are often stronger than they know, bigger, more gallant than they'd guess. And this: We're all lucky to be here today and able to say what deserves saying, and if you say it a lot, it won't make it common and so unheard, but known and absorbed.

DOJ_NMG_0061040

I think the sound of the last messages, of what was said, will live as long in human history, and contain within it as much of human history, as any old metallic roar.

Ms. Noonan's column will appear weekly in Pursuits.

Twin Beams To Light Sky Again. But After 2008? (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

As twilight falls on Monday, the skies over Lower Manhattan will once again be pierced by the twin beams of the Tribute in Light.

Beginning in 2002 as a catch-as-catch-can improvisation, this one-night event has become something of a civic tradition. It is the celestial, silent taps that brings a day of remembrance to a close, a shared experience open simultaneously to almost anyone around the city.

Its future seems assured for the next two years. But after that?

"I'd say there's a question mark," said Kent L. Barwick, the president of the Municipal Art Society, the organizers of the Tribute in Light.

For one thing, the project may run out of money after 2008. For another, it may lose its current staging area atop the Battery Garage, six blocks south of ground zero; a rare expanse of secure open space downtown. A long-range redevelopment plan for the nearby area, known as Greenwich Street South, calls for demolishing the garage, though this is not on the immediate horizon.

And there is no guarantee that it will have a permanent home at the World Trade Center memorial, which is to open in 2009. "I haven't heard anybody say, 'Let's forget about this,' " Mr. Barwick said yesterday. "At the same time, it has to be addressed."

The Tribute in Light was first illuminated on March 11, 2002, six months after the terrorist attack. It was designed by John Bennett, Gustavo Bonevardi, Richard Nash Gould, Julian LaVerdiere and Paul Myoda, working with Paul Marantz, a lighting designer, and Michael Ahern, an event producer. It ran for a month.

Sept. 11, 2003, marked its next appearance. It has been illuminated for one night on each anniversary since.

In 2004, the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation authorized $3.5 million to run the tribute through 2008. That allowed the Municipal Art Society to purchase 88 Space Cannon searchlights, each four feet tall, with a 7,000-watt xenon bulb. They sit inside boxy steel frames, allowing them to be stacked for storage.

The fixtures, powered by temporary generators, are set out on the garage roof in two 50-by-50-foot squares, offset from each other as the twin towers were, though covering only 6 percent of the towers' area. The array is as ungainly to behold at close range as it is ethereal to see from afar.

"The art is in what they produce," said Frank E. Sanchis III, the senior vice president of the society. "It's never been about the light fixtures, it's been about the beacons. In a permanent installation, you'd have to worry about what it looks like." That is only one hurdle to placing the lights in the permanent memorial.

But its creators believe the Tribute in Light has an enduring value, in part because its silence and simplicity permit viewers to invest it with their own meaning or message. "One of the best things about this is that it is what it is," Mr. Ahern said. "There are no speeches attendant to it."

9/11 Memorial In N.J. Has 40 Extra Names (AP-Y)

By Janet Frankston

AP, September 9, 2006

A 100-foot-tall sculpture being unveiled on Monday's fifth anniversary of 9-11 honors thousands of terrorist attack victims, and then some: Carved into the granite base are the names of more than 40 people who weren't killed on Sept. 11 after all.

The majestic sculpture across the Hudson River from ground zero will feature 3,024 names of people once believed to have died in the 1993 and Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center. The problem is that the Russian artist who created the work used an outdated list of names of those missing at the trade center.

"We did the best that could have been done under the circumstances," said Emily Madoff, an attorney for artist Zurab Tsereteli.

Madoff said that she consulted several sources to try to determine the correct names before seeking confirmation from Kenneth Feinberg, the former special master of a federal Sept. 11 victim compensation fund, who referred her to a book published by The New York Times in 2003.

She said she never knew to contact the city, which has kept the official death toll for New York since the attacks.

She said she drew her list from the book, which identifies victims as of spring 2003. It includes 43 names that were removed by the medical examiner's office in October 2003 and January 2004 because the city couldn't confirm their deaths or, in some cases, their existence, according to Ellen Borakove, a spokeswoman for the medical examiner.

The names removed included illegal immigrants whose jobs were not well documented and missing people whose relatives say they were near the trade center on Sept. 11. Some claims were made up in attempts to rip off the government.

One name, Paul Herman Vanvelzer, was apparently a fabrication by a California woman who claimed she was a Sept. 11 victim's mother.

Some victims' family members said the erroneous names need to be removed.

"It kind of cheapens the whole thing," said Jack Lynch, whose firefighter son Michael Lynch was killed on Sept 11.

The memorial, called "To the Struggle Against World Terrorism," is not the only Sept. 11 tribute to run into such problems. In Jersey City, a memorial dedicated in 2002 to 40 victims was redone for $7,500.

The sculpture evokes the twin towers that once stood across the Hudson River. In the middle, a 40-foot steel teardrop hangs like a bell in the open center.

Its groundbreaking last September drew Russian President Vladimir Putin, and its dedication on Monday is expected to bring former President Clinton, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Gov. Jon S. Corzine.

The official Sept. 11 death toll stands at 2,973: 2,749 at the trade center, 184 at the Pentagon and 40 in Pennsylvania.

The planners of a memorial to open in 2009 at ground zero intend to list all those names, as well as the six people who died in the 1993 trade center bombing.

WAR NEWS:

Khatami: American "Conceit And Pride" Led To Iraq Mess (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, September 9, 2006

After Iran's hardline president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad challenged President Bush to a televised debate last week — and again warned the U.S. not to impose sanctions over Tehran's nuclear program — the White House approved his proposed September visit to attend the United Nations General Assembly in New York City. A few days before, over the objections of conservative Republicans and after a spirited administration debate, the U.S. approved a visit to several U.S. cities by Iran's former president, Mohammad Khatami — the highest ranking Iranian to tour since President Carter severed relations with Iran in 1979.

Khatami, 62, served eight years as president before leaving office in 2005, and he remains close to Iran's powerful Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khameini. Khatami, whose trip is designed to foster a "dialogue between civilizations," spoke to TIME for more than an hour this week in a heavily guarded Washington hotel suite. As the most prominent of his nation's reformers, he repeatedly distanced himself from many of the hardline views of Iran's current leadership, but strongly critized the U.S. for what he suggested is "arrogance" in Iraq. He also cited human-rights violations at both Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib, and warned of the "costs" of a U.S. or Israeli military strike on his country. But he endorsed a "two-state solution" to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians, and called the Holocaust a "historical fact." Excerpts:

TIME: This is your first visit to Washington what do you think of the country that has been called the Great Satan?

DOJ_NMG_0061042

Khatami: I never say "Great Satan." But I get really upset when Iran is called part of the "Axis of Evil." Even [Ayatollah] Khomeini [who coined the phrase] was referring only to U.S. policies — not to the American people or America itself, which is a great and big country.

TIME: Do you accept a two-state solution between Palestine and Israel? And does the government of Iran accept that?

Khatami: My opposition to Israel is moral. The peaceful solution to the problem of Palestine is to recognize Palestinian rights. This is the only way there could be sustained peace in the region.

TIME: And a Palestinian state to exist alongside Israel? Khatami: Yes.

TIME: Your successor [as president of Iran] has said that the Holocaust did not happen. How do you explain that?

Khatami: I personally believe that he really didn't deny the existence of Holocaust. I believe the Holocaust is the crime of Nazism. But it is possible that the Holocaust, which is an absolute fact, a historical fact, would be misused. The Holocaust should not be, in any way, an excuse for the suppression of Palestinian rights.

TIME: Bruce Laingen was the top American diplomat held hostage in Iran in 1979-80. And he has publicly raised a question in connection with your visit: What does the government of Iran owes the American hostages? And he's not talking about money. Morally?

Khatami: I regret the hostage crisis, hostage-taking. And I sympathize with the hostages and their families for their loss and their hurt. But this was [also] a revolutionary reaction to half a century of the U.S. taking Iran hostage. Maybe the other side [the U.S.] would be more indebted [to Iran].

TIME: Is there a civil war in Iraq?

Khatami: We are really concerned about this, but [there is no civil war], not yet.

TIME: Should Iraq be divided into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish zones?

Khatami: Definitely a bad idea. Iraq should remain unified. The solution is a democratic state. Numerically, the country is majority, Shiite, but the government is not yet sectarian. The president is a Kurd. The head of the government is a Shiite. The Sunnis have great, effective participation. So the breakup of Iraq is very dangerous. A democratic state can prevent from this from taking place.

TIME: President Bush's father did not occupy Iraq. What about the occupation of Iraq now?

Khatami: I don't know what President Bush, the father, would have done. But I know that eliminating Saddam [Hussein] has been to our benefit, to the benefit of Iran. I also predicted that getting into Iraq would be very easy [for America], but getting out of it would be extremely difficult. And today, Saddam is gone but Iraq has become the center stage of extremism and radicalism.

TIME: If you had any advice for the current President Bush, what would it be?

Khatami: The president should dispense peace and justice and reconciliation across the world. I believe that not only have U.S. policies not stopped terrorism, they have actually exacerbated and increased the problem.

TIME: Why?

Khatami: We could have resolved the Iraq issue without invasion and occupation without the cost in terms of human life, American lives, Iraqi lives and money. This could have been resolved. If the U.S. had not had such a sense of conceit and pride, or maybe even arrogance.

TIME: And the withdrawal of U.S. troops?

Khatami: The occupation should end as soon as possible [but] I believe we cannot just leave this newly born democratic government to the hands of terrorists, insurgents, and people who are seeking violence. The best way is to strengthen and to support the government, its security services, its police forces, and the best way to do that is also to get help from neighboring countries. The U.S. should know that it could get the help of Arab and Islamic countries to secure its interests,rather than without them.

TIME: The U.S. has accused Iran of trying to build a nuclear weapon, and Iran has denied this. Is there a way out?

Khatami: Concern about proliferation is definitely justified. But in this region there are three states that possess nuclear weapons, with hundreds of warheads. The biggest [arsenal] is Israel. And then Pakistan and India. If there are serious concerns about nuclear weapons, we should start by eliminating those that already exist. And the U.S. does not display any sensitivity whatsoever to these issues, to these nuclear weapons. None of the three have signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, but

DOJ_NMG_0061043

Iran has. Iran has the right to have access to nuclear energy. And we are ready to give every guarantee that we would use this for peaceful purposes. Our leader [President Ahmadinejad] has issued a decree prohibiting the production and the stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction.

TIME: Do you believe that a military attack on Iran, either by Israel or the U.S., is a possibility that Iran should take seriously and guard against?

Khatami: Any aggression against Iran would have costs, serious costs for the U.S., more than for Iran. Public opinion in the world, and a great majority of the American public, would not support a military engagement.

TIME: Anything else?

Khatami: In Iran, whenever the issue is Iran's territorial integrity, no political faction, no political group would have any doubt as to defending Iran's actions. This unity and national consensus would be really costly for the invader and aggressor.

TIME: President Bush has promised that the U.S. will try to impose sanctions on Iran through the Security Council in the near future, if this matter is not resolved. What would be the result?

Khatami: Experience has shown that threats, pressure and coercion has never created a solution, has never made sanctions effective. Sanctions, and even more than that, possible military action and the use of force, would create more crisis in Iran, for the region, and for the world.

TIME: Do you believe Hezbollah won the war in Lebanon?

Khatami: I would say Israel lost the war. Israel has fought Arabs many times. It could even defeat, in six days, three or four Arab armies. But, you know, confronting Hezbollah, it couldn't achieve any of those objectives. Unfortunately, U.S. rushed into defending Israel, wholeheartedly.

TIME: How do you explain charges from the U.S. and other critics that there were human rights violations, terrorism, and a buildup of Iran's nuclear program when you were president?

Khatami: I don't claim that there have never been human rights violations in Iran but I [also] believe human rights are being violated everywhere, with different names. I believe the violation of rights of prisoners in Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib is not compatible — everybody should condemn the violation of human rights, everywhere. Double standards will not help.

TIME: When you were president of Iran, you used to complain, publicly, that you couldn't implement some of your reforms domestically and you couldn't take certain actions in foreign policy. Who stopped you? Was it hardliners who are now in control of Iran?

Khatami: I think democracy is a process. And this is especially [true] when there is external pressure, and dangers, the threat to the internal integrity of the nation. Definitely, there are people who have been theoretically against me, but when a major power explicitly says that it intends to overthrow a government...

TIME: Are you talking about the U.S.?

Khatami: Let me not [use] names. Those who officially put in their budgets money to overthrow the Iranian government —it's natural that the constraints on freedom and openness will increase as a result of a security environment [like that].

Senate: Saddam Saw Al-Qaida As Threat (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 9, 2006

Saddam Hussein regarded al-Qaida as a threat rather than a possible ally, a Senate report says, contradicting assertions President Bush has used to build support for the war in Iraq.

Released Friday, the report discloses for the first time an October 2005 CIA assessment that before the war, Saddam's government "did not have a relationship, harbor or turn a blind eye toward" al-Qaida operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi or his associates.

Saddam told U.S. officials after his capture that he had not cooperated with Osama bin Laden even though he acknowledged that officials in his government had met with the al-Qaida leader, according to FBI summaries cited in the Senate report.

"Saddam only expressed negative sentiments about bin Laden," Tariq Aziz, the Iraqi leader's top aide, told the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0061044

The report also faults intelligence gathering in the lead-up to the 2003 invasion.

As recently as an Aug. 21 news conference, Bush said people should "imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein" with the capacity to make weapons of mass destruction and "who had relations with Zarqawi."

Democrats contended that the administration continues to use faulty intelligence, including assertions of a link between Saddam's government and the recently killed al-Zarqawi, to justify the war in Iraq.

They also said, in remarks attached to Friday's Senate Intelligence Committee document, that former CIA Director George Tenet had modified his position on the terrorist link at the request of administration policymakers.

Republicans said the document, which compares prewar intelligence with post-invasion findings on Iraq's weapons and on terrorist groups, broke little new ground. And they said Democrats were distorting it for political purposes.

A previous report in 2004 made clear the intelligence agencies' "massive failures," said Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., a member of the committee. "Yet to make a giant leap in logic to claim that the Bush administration intentionally misled the nation or manipulated intelligence is simply not warranted."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the report was "nothing new."

A second part of the report concluded that false information from the Iraqi National Congress, an anti-Saddam group led by then-exile Ahmed Chalabi, was used to support key U.S. intelligence assessments on Iraq.

It said U.S. intelligence agents put out numerous red flags about the reliability of INC sources but the intelligence community made a "serious error" and used one source who concocted a story that Iraq was building mobile biological weapons laboratories.

The report also said that in 2002 the National Security Council directed that funding for the INC should continue "despite warnings from both the CIA, which terminated its relationship with the INC in December 1996, and the DIA (Defense Intelligence Agency), that the INC was penetrated by hostile intelligence services, including the Iranians."

According to the report, postwar findings indicate that Saddam "was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime."

It said al-Zarqawi was in Baghdad from May until late November 2002. But "postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture al-Zarqawi and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi."

In June 2004, Bush defended Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion that Saddam had "long-established ties" with al-Qaida. "Zarqawi is the best evidence of connection to al-Qaida affiliates and al-Qaida," the president said.

The report concludes that postwar findings do not support a 2002 intelligence report that Iraq was reconstituting its nuclear program, possessed biological weapons or had ever developed mobile facilities for producing biological warfare agents.

"The report is a devastating indictment of the Bush-Cheney administration's unrelenting, misleading and deceptive attempts to convince the American people that Saddam Hussein was linked with al-Qaida," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., a member of the committee.

Levin and Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the top Democrat on the panel, said Tenet told the committee last July that in 2002 he had complied with an administration request "to say something about not being inconsistent with what the president had said" about the Saddam-terrorist link.

They said that on Oct. 7, 2002, the same day Bush gave a speech speaking of such a link, the CIA had sent a declassified letter to the committee saying it would be an "extreme step" for Saddam to assist Islamist terrorists in attacking the United States.

They said Tenet acknowledged to the committee that subsequently issuing a statement that there was no inconsistency between the president's speech and the CIA viewpoint was "the wrong thing to do."

Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said the mistakes of prewar intelligence have long been known and "the additional views of the committee's Democrats are little more than a rehashing of the same unfounded allegations they've used for over three years."

The panel report is Phase II of an analysis of prewar intelligence on Iraq. The first phase, issued in July 2004, focused on the CIA's failings in its estimates of Iraq's weapons program.

DOJ_NMG_0061045

The second phase had been delayed as Republicans and Democrats fought over what information should be declassified and how far the committee should delve into the question of whether policymakers may have manipulated intelligence to make the case for war.

Committee member Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said he planned to ask for an investigation into the amount of information remaining classified. He said, "I am particularly concerned it appears that information may have been classified to shield individuals from accountability."

Report Details Errors Before War (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The long-awaited Senate Intelligence Committee report released yesterday sheds new light on why U.S. intelligence agencies provided inaccurate prewar information about Saddam Hussein and his weapons programs, including details on how Iraqi exiles who fabricated or exaggerated their stories were accepted as truthful because they passed Pentagon lie detector tests.

The two newly declassified chapters of the report fueled political accusations yesterday that the Bush administration lied to justify invading Iraq, but the documents' nearly 400 pages contain several examples of how bad information wound up accepted as truthful in intelligence assessments at the time.

A section includes the results of an evaluation by the CIA of its performance, which concludes that, despite repeated prewar assessments that the Iraqis were practicing deceit and deception to hide their weapons, there actually were no such efforts because there were no weapons.

The CIA concludes: "There comes a point where the absence of evidence does indeed become the evidence of absence." That statement is a play on a remark Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made frequently in the months before the war -- after U.N. inspectors in late 2002 and early 2003 could find no weapons -- that "the absence of evidence is not evidence of absence."

One 208-page chapter from the Senate committee report covers the use of intelligence provided by the Iraqi National Congress and its leader, Ahmed Chalabi. The panel wrote that three Iraqi exiles gave the Pentagon inaccurate information about Hussein's alleged training of al-Qaeda terrorists, as well as about the existence of mobile biological weapons factories and an alleged meeting between the Iraqi leader and Osama bin Laden. All three exiles passed lie detector tests given by the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), adding credibility to their stories.

In each case, the information proved to be questionable, if not inaccurate. But in the case of the mobile labs, the source's information was used to corroborate data in the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq even after the informant had been tagged as a fabricator.

The report notes that a DIA official who knew that the source was unreliable sat in on two meetings in which the mobile labs information was incorporated into the speech Secretary of State Colin L. Powell delivered in February 2003 to the U.N. Security Council, but that the official did not realize the information was based solely on the word of the untrustworthy source.

According to the Senate panel's report, another Iraqi National Congress source, recommended to the DIA by Chalabi through a high-ranking Defense Department official, passed two lie detector tests after "claiming to have seen Saddam meeting with a man, who Uday Hussein [Saddam's son] identified as bin Laden." The source said Uday Hussein told him that bin Laden was there "to discuss training of some of his people in Iraq."

The DIA subsequently distributed the information but pointed out that the source was connected with the Iraqi opposition and that the information "may have been intended to influence as well as inform decision makers." The CIA later noted in its assessment of the information that the meeting between Hussein and bin Laden had "not been corroborated" and that "other sensitive reporting . . . provides no indication that Saddam and bin Laden have met each other."

Although the Senate report raises questions about the reliability of the information provided by Iraqi exiles, it notes that the information had little direct impact on the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq produced in October 2002. Many of the Iraqi

DOJ_NMG_0061046

National Congress claims, however, were passed on to the White House and the office of Vice President Cheney through reports by a separate intelligence analysis group established by then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith.

The Senate committee's inquiry into the Feith group's activities, another part of the prewar intelligence study, has been delayed by committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), who is awaiting the completion of a Pentagon inspector general inquiry into the same matter.

One surprising conclusion from the CIA retrospective is that the agency now believes that aggressive U.N. inspections in Iraq in 1991 after the Persian Gulf War led Hussein to what it describes as a "fateful decision." He covertly dismantled and destroyed the undeclared nuclear, chemical and biological facilities, materials and actual weapons he had put together in the preceding decade -- along with "the records that could have verified that unilateral destruction."

As a result, there was no proof in 2002 and 2003 when the Iraqis claimed they had no weapons of mass destruction, and Hussein could not demonstrate he was in basic, if not complete, compliance with U.N. resolutions. Noncompliance with the Security Council's October resolution was the main U.S. public rationale for the invasion of Iraq.

Senate: Hussein Wasn't Allied With Al Qaeda (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Iraq rebuffed Bin Laden and wanted to capture Zarqawi, the Intelligence Committee reports, contradicting Bush's argument for invasion.

WASHINGTON — The Senate Intelligence Committee on Friday said it had found no evidence that Saddam Hussein had ties to Al Qaeda or provided safe harbor to one of its most notorious operatives, Abu Musab Zarqawi — conclusions contradicting claims by the Bush administration before it invaded Iraq.

In a long-awaited report, the committee instead determined that the former Iraqi dictator was wary of Al Qaeda; repeatedly rebuffed requests from its leader, Osama bin Laden, for assistance; and sought to capture Zarqawi when the terrorist turned up in Baghdad.

The findings are the latest in a series of high-profile studies to dispute some of the Bush administration's key arguments for invading Iraq — mainly that the Hussein regime possessed stockpiles of banned weapons and had cultivated ties to terrorist networks. Presenting these since-discredited allegations as fact, President Bush and other high-ranking officials argued that Hussein's government posed an intolerable risk in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The 356-page report is certain to fuel the election-season debate over the administration's foreign policy at a time when Bush is seeking to shore up support for the war in Iraq through a series of speeches that cast the conflict as central to winning the larger war on terrorism.

Bush on Thursday again asserted that the battle in Iraq was inextricably linked to Al Qaeda, and disparaged those who considered it a "diversion" from the war on terrorism.

White House spokesman Tony Snow on Friday downplayed the significance of the report, describing it as "nothing new."

"It's … kind of relitigating things that happened three years ago," Snow said. "In 2002 and 2003, members of both parties got a good look at the intelligence we had, and they came to the very same conclusions about what was going on."

In one of its main conclusions, the report said that "postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of Al Qaeda and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from Al Qaeda to provide material or operational support."

According to the report, Hussein has told U.S. interrogators that "if he wanted to cooperate with the enemies of the U.S., he would have allied with North Korea or China." His former deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, told U.S. interrogators that "Saddam only expressed negative sentiments about Bin Laden."

The report's disclosures include a classified assessment by the CIA last year that Hussein's regime "did not have a relationship, harbor or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates."

DOJ_NMG_0061047

The committee, made up of eight Republicans and seven Democrats, said U.S. intelligence agencies before Sept. 11 "accurately characterized" Bin Laden's intermittent interest in pursuing assistance from Iraq, but were largely wrong about Hussein's attitudes.

The Iraqi leader, according to the report, was so wary of the terrorist network that he "issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with Al Qaeda."

Democrats seized on the findings Friday to accuse the Bush administration of having distorted the threat Iraq posed.

In a speech on the Senate floor, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, accused the White House of pursuing "a deceptive strategy of using intelligence reporting that the intelligence community had already warned was uncorroborated, unreliable and, in critical instances, fabricated."

The report released Friday is based largely on documents recovered from Iraqi facilities in the aftermath of the U.S. invasion in March 2003, as well as interrogations of Hussein and other Iraqi officials captured by coalition forces.

As a result, it represents the most thorough comparison to date of prewar suspicions with evidence subsequently collected. Much of the information was unavailable to U.S. intelligence agencies and policymakers before the war.

The report's publication was marked by intense political wrangling within the Republican-controlled Intelligence Committee, with two GOP members — Sens. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska — breaking ranks to vote in favor of conclusions drafted by Democrats.

In a statement, Snowe cited the "obligation of our government to learn from these horrific mistakes" and complained that the intelligence panel, "once noted for its bipartisanship, has become marred by partisan feuding." Hagel was not available for comment.

The dispute put Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), the committee's chairman, in the awkward position of touting the work of his panel while urging the public to ignore some of its conclusions.

"Overall, I am disappointed that some of my colleagues have twisted the facts to reach conclusions that support other agendas," Roberts said. "It is my view that the public should not focus on the conclusions in this report, but rather on the underlying facts."

In particular, Roberts objected to findings that he said overstated the influence of the Iraqi National Congress — an exile group led by Ahmad Chalabi that had close ties to the Bush administration and has been accused of funneling prewar misinformation about Baghdad's weapons programs to U.S. intelligence agencies and news organizations.

The committee devoted 207 pages to an analysis of the INC, concluding that it had "attempted to influence U.S. policy on Iraq by providing false information through defectors."

Another section focused on the erroneous prewar estimates by the CIA and other agencies that Baghdad had stockpiles of chemical and biological munitions and was pursuing the development of nuclear arms.

But the most significant new information in the report focuses on Baghdad's alleged ties to Al Qaeda.

The CIA and other intelligence agencies were generally skeptical that Hussein had significant links to the terrorist group. But Vice President Dick Cheney and other senior administration officials have persistently highlighted isolated intelligence reports suggesting a relationship between Hussein and Bin Laden. The Senate report contradicts many of those assertions.

The report concludes, for instance, that it is true that Zarqawi was in Baghdad for about seven months in 2002. But Hussein was initially unaware of his presence in the country and later ordered his intelligence services to capture Zarqawi, according to the report.

The attempt was unsuccessful, and Zarqawi escaped to Iran. He also hid in areas of northern Iraq beyond Hussein's reach. After Hussein was overthrown, Zarqawi led the deadly insurgency against U.S. forces before he was killed by a U.S. airstrike in June.

Even as administration officials insisted on a Hussein-Al Qaeda link, they steered clear of alleging a direct role by the Iraqi strongman in the Sept. 11 attacks.

And at a news conference last month, Bush said flatly that Hussein had "nothing" to do with the assaults. Still, a CNN poll released this week found that 43% of U.S. residents said they believed Hussein was personally involved in the attacks; 52% said he was not.

The committee's report also dismisses a contention repeatedly cited by Cheney that an Iraqi intelligence agent met with Sept. 11 hijacker Mohamed Atta in Prague in April 2001. That claim has bolstered public perceptions that Iraq was somehow linked to the Sept. 11 attacks.

But postwar evidence indicates no such meeting ever occurred, the committee found, citing Atta's travel and cellphone records obtained by the FBI, as well as information from the Iraqi agent alleged to have attended the meeting.

The report casts similar doubt on assertions that Iraq had provided chemical and biological weapons training to Al Qaeda operatives, or allowed terrorist organizations to practice for attacks on aircraft at a facility south of Baghdad known as Salman Pak.

Despite reports of repeated contacts between Iraq and Al Qaeda, the committee said, U.S. intelligence has been able to assemble evidence of only a single meeting — a 1995 encounter in Sudan between Bin Laden and Iraqi intelligence officer Faruq Hijazi.

In postwar debriefings, Hijazi said that Hussein had instructed him to "only listen" and not negotiate or offer support to Bin Laden. He said that Bin Laden "requested an office in Iraq, military training for his followers, Chinese sea mines and the broadcast of speeches from an anti-Saudi cleric."

Hijazi said that he "immediately rejected" virtually all of the requests, offering only to consider broadcasting anti-Saudi speeches.

Overall, the document portrays Hussein and his underlings as alarmed by U.S. accusations linking him to Al Qaeda.

At one point, the report said, Hussein was warned by the director of Iraq's intelligence service "that U.S. intelligence was attempting to fabricate connections between the [Iraqi intelligence services] and Al Qaeda" to justify an invasion.

The Senate report also offers new theories as to why Hussein's regime was unable to convince U.N. inspectors before the U.S. invasion that it no longer had stocks of illegal weapons.

A recent CIA analysis concluded that Hussein was stunned by the aggressiveness of weapons inspections after the 1991 Gulf War, and ordered the covert destruction of undeclared weapons and documents.

In the process, Hussein destroyed the very records U.N. inspectors sought a decade later when putting pressure on Iraq to account for its illicit weapons.

"The result was that Iraq was unable to provide proof when it tried at a later time to establish compliance," the report said, citing the CIA study.

*

C.I.A. Said To Find No Hussein Link To Terror Chief (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — The Central Intelligence Agency last fall repudiated the claim that there were prewar ties between Saddam Hussein's government and an operative of Al Qaeda, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, according to a report issued Friday by the Senate Intelligence Committee.

The disclosure undercuts continuing assertions by the Bush administration that such ties existed, and that they provided evidence of links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. The Republican-controlled committee, in a second report, also sharply criticized the administration for its reliance on the Iraqi National Congress during the prelude to the war in Iraq.

The findings are part of a continuing inquiry by the committee into prewar intelligence about Iraq. The conclusions went beyond its earlier findings, issued in the summer of 2004, by including criticism not just of American intelligence agencies but also of the administration.

Several Republicans strongly dissented on the report with conclusions about the Iraqi National Congress, saying they overstated the role that the exile group had played in the prewar intelligence assessments about Iraq. But the committee overwhelmingly approved the other report, with only one Republican senator voting against it.

The reports did not address the politically divisive question of whether the Bush administration had exaggerated or misused intelligence as part of its effort to win support for the war. But one report did contradict the administration's assertions, made before the war and since, that ties between Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Hussein's government provided evidence of a close relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

As recently as Aug. 21, President Bush said at a news conference that Mr. Hussein "had relations with Zarqawi.'' But a C.I.A. report completed in October 2005 concluded instead that Mr. Hussein's government "did not have a relationship, harbor or even turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates," according to the new Senate findings.

The C.I.A. report also contradicted claims made in February 2003 by Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, who mentioned Mr. Zarqawi no fewer than 20 times during a speech to the United Nations Security Council that made the administration's case for going to war. In that speech, Mr. Powell said that Iraq "today harbors a deadly terrorist network'' headed by Mr. Zarqawi, and dismissed as "not credible'' assertions by the Iraqi government that it had no knowledge of Mr. Zarqawi's whereabouts.

The panel concluded that Mr. Hussein regarded Al Qaeda as a threat rather than a potential ally, and that the Iraqi intelligence service "actively attempted to locate and capture al-Zarqawi without success.''

One of the reports by the committee criticized a decision by the National Security Council in 2002 to maintain a close relationship with the Iraqi National Congress, headed by the exile leader Ahmad Chalabi, even after the C.I.A. and the Defense Intelligence Agency had warned that "the I.N.C was penetrated by hostile intelligence services," notably Iran.

The report concluded that the organization had provided a large volume of flawed intelligence to the United States about Iraq, and concluded that the group "attempted to influence United States policy on Iraq by providing false information through defectors directed at convincing the United States that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and had links to terrorists."

The findings were released at an inopportune time for the Bush administration, which has spent the week trying to turn voters' attention away from the missteps on Iraq and toward the more comfortable political territory of the continued terrorist threat. On Friday, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, played down the reports, saying that they contained "nothing new" and were "re-litigating things that happened three years ago."

"The important thing to do is to figure out what you're doing tomorrow, and the day after, and the month after, and the year after to make sure that this war on terror is won," Mr. Snow said.

The two reports released Friday were expected to be the least controversial aspects of what remains of the Senate committee's investigation, which will eventually address whether the Bush administration's assertions about Iraq accurately reflected the available intelligence. But unanticipated delays caused them to be released in the heat of the fall political campaign.

The reports were approved by the committee in August, but went through a monthlong declassification process. It was Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the committee's Republican chairman, who set early September as the release date.

The committee's report in 2004, which lambasted intelligence agencies for vastly overestimating the state of Iraq's nuclear, biological and chemical weapons programs, was issued with unanimous approval. But the reports released Friday provided evidence of how much the relationship between Republicans and Democrats on the committee had degenerated over the past two years.

A set of conclusions that included criticism of the administration's ties with the Iraqi National Congress was opposed by several Republicans on the panel, including Mr. Roberts, but was approved with the support of two Republicans, Chuck Hagel, of Nebraska, and Olympia Snowe, of Maine, along with all seven Democrats. Senator Roberts even took the unusual step of disavowing the conclusions about the role played by the Iraqi National Congress, saying that they were "misleading and are not supported by the facts."

The report about the group's role concluded that faulty intelligence from the group made its way into several prewar intelligence reports, including the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate that directly preceded the Senate vote on the Iraq war. It says that sources introduced to American intelligence by the group directly influenced two key judgments of that document: that Mr. Hussein possessed mobile biological weapons laboratories and that he was trying to reconstitute his nuclear program.

The report said there was insufficient evidence to determine whether one of the most notorious of the intelligence sources used by the United States before the Iraq war was tied to the Iraqi National Congress. The source, an Iraqi who was code-named

DOJ_NMG_0061050

Curveball, was a crucial source for the American view that Mr. Hussein had a mobile biological weapons program, but the information that he provided was later entirely discredited.

The report said other mistaken information about Iraq's biological program had been provided by a source linked to the Iraqi National Congress, and it said the intelligence agencies' use of the information had "constituted a serious error.''

The dissenting opinion, signed by Mr. Roberts and four other Republican members of the committee, minimized the role played by Mr. Chalabi's group. "Information from the I.N.C. and I.N.C.-affiliated defectors was not widely used in intelligence community products and played little role in the intelligence community's judgments about Iraq's W.M.D. programs," the Republicans said.

Francis Brooke, a spokesman for the Iraqi National Congress, called the report "tendentious, partisan and misleading," and said that the group had not played a central role as the Bush administration built the case for war.

At the same time, Mr. Brooke said his organization was surprised at how little the American government knew about Mr. Hussein's government before the war, which may have forced the American officials to rely more heavily on the organization. "We did not realize the paucity of human intelligence that the administration had on Iraq," he said.

Iraq's Alleged Al-Qaeda Ties Were Disputed Before War (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

A declassified report released yesterday by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence revealed that U.S. intelligence analysts were strongly disputing the alleged links between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda while senior Bush administration officials were publicly asserting those links to justify invading Iraq.

Far from aligning himself with al-Qaeda and Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Hussein repeatedly rebuffed al-Qaeda's overtures and tried to capture Zarqawi, the report said. Tariq Aziz, the detained former deputy prime minister, has told the FBI that Hussein "only expressed negative sentiments about [Osama] bin Laden."

The report also said exiles from the Iraqi National Congress (INC) tried to influence U.S. policy by providing, through defectors, false information on Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons capabilities. After skeptical analysts warned that the group had been penetrated by hostile intelligence services, including Iran's, a 2002 White House directive ordered that U.S. funding for the INC be continued.

The newly declassified intelligence report provided administration critics with fresh ammunition, less than two months before midterm elections and in the middle of President Bush's campaign to refocus the public's attention away from Iraq and toward the threat of terrorism. Senior Senate Democrats immediately seized on the findings, using some of their strongest language yet to say the president continues to willfully and falsely connect Hussein to al-Qaeda.

As recently as Aug. 21, Bush suggested a link between Hussein and Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, who was killed by U.S. forces this summer. But a CIA assessment in October 2005 concluded that Hussein's government "did not have a relationship, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates," according to the report.

"The president is still distorting. He's still making statements which are false," said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), an intelligence committee member.

The partial release of the report came after nearly three years of partisan wrangling over what is to be a five-chapter analysis of the use of prewar intelligence in the run-up to the 2003 invasion of Iraq. The heart of the report -- a detailed comparison of administration statements with the intelligence then available -- is far from release. But the committee voted Thursday to release two chapters, one on the role that Iraqi exiles played in shaping prewar intelligence, the other on the accuracy of the prewar analyses of Hussein's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons capabilities and his suspected links to al-Qaeda and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the findings as old news. "If we have people who want to re-litigate that, that's fine," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0061051

But Republican attempts to paint the findings as a partisan rehash were undercut by intelligence committee members from the GOP. The committee report's conclusions are based on the Democrats' findings because two Republicans -- Sens. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.) -- supported those findings.

"After reviewing thousands of pages of evidence, I voted for the conclusions that most closely reflect the facts in the report," Snowe said in a written statement. "Policy-makers seemingly discounted or dismissed warnings about the veracity of critical intelligence reports that may have served as a basis for going to war."

Committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) was emphatic this week that Iraqi exiles did not fundamentally shape the critical assessment of the Iraqi threat in the 2002 National Intelligence Estimate.

But, as Snowe emphasized in her statement, the report concluded that information provided by an INC source was cited in that estimate and in Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's February 2003 speech to the United Nations as corroborating evidence about Iraq's mobile biological weapons program. Those citations came despite two April 2002 CIA assessments, a May 2002 Defense Intelligence Agency fabrication notice and a July 2002 National Intelligence Council warning -- all saying the INC source may have been coached by the exile group into fabricating the information.

Democrats and Republicans agree that analysts and politicians of all political stripes were wrong about the prewar assessments of Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. But the committee report indicates that intelligence analysts were substantially right about Hussein's lack of operational links to al-Qaeda. And Democrats compared the administration's public statements with newly declassified intelligence assessments to build their case that efforts to link Iraq to al-Qaeda were willfully misleading.

In a classified January 2003 report, for instance, the CIA concluded that Hussein "viewed Islamic extremists operating inside Iraq as a threat." But one day after that conclusion was published, Levin noted, Vice President Cheney said the Iraqi government "aids and protects terrorists, including members of al-Qaeda."

Intelligence reports in June, July and September 2002 all cast doubts on a reported meeting in Prague between Iraqi intelligence agents and Sept. 11 hijacker Mohamed Atta. Yet, in a Sept. 8, 2002, appearance on NBC's "Meet The Press," Cheney said the CIA considered the reports on the meeting credible, Levin said.

In February 2002, the Defense Intelligence Agency concluded that "Iraq is unlikely to have provided bin Laden any useful [chemical and biological weapons] knowledge or assistance." A year later, Bush said: "Iraq has also provided al-Qaeda with chemical and biological weapons training."

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), an intelligence committee member, said it was unfair for Democrats to compare the intelligence assessments in the report with the administration's statements. He said such comparisons go beyond the scope of the chapters released.

But Democrats were unequivocal in asserting that the chapters chronicle an indisputable pattern of deception.

"It is such a blatant misleading of the United States, its people, to prepare them, to position them, to, in fact, make them enthusiastic or feel that it's justified to go to war with Iraq," said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the committee's vice chairman. "That kind of public manipulation I don't know has any precedent in American history."

Intelligence Didn't Back Bush Iraq Stand, Reports Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

By William Roberts and James Rowley

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Bush administration claims justifying the war against Iraq were based on fragmented, conflicting, and at times unreliable intelligence, according to two reports released today by the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Administration statements that Saddam Hussein was allied with Osama bin Laden and was helping al-Qaeda obtain chemical and biological weapons proved wrong and misleading and weren't based on solid intelligence in its possession, the declassified Senate reports said.

Contrary to assertions by Vice President Dick Cheney and other senior Bush administration officials, Hussein didn't have links to al-Qaeda and the Sept. 11 terrorist plot, the reports said.

``Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaeda and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime," one of the reports said. Hussein refused all requests from al-Qaeda to provide material or operational support, said the reports.

While Iraq Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Chalabi and his Iraqi National Congress told U.S. officials that Iraq possessed nuclear, chemical or biological weapons, that information later proved inaccurate, according to the committee reports.

U.S. intelligence agencies overestimated Saddam Hussein's ability and desire to obtain weapons material while United Nations sanctions were in place, the reports said. Further, the Senate committee determined that Hussein sought weapons of mass destruction as deterrents against Israel and Iran, not for use against the U.S.

Hussein and al-Qaeda

Allegations that Hussein provided chemical and biological weapons training to al-Qaeda operatives also turned out to be false, the reports said. The Defense Intelligence Agency said in 2002 that it was unlikely Iraq gave Bin Laden any useful weapons assistance.

The Senate reports cite inconsistencies and contradictions overlooked by intelligence agencies as they produced intelligence briefings for senior policy makers.

U.S. analysts had ``little specific intelligence reporting" about Hussein's willingness to ally himself with al-Qaeda, the reports said. The committee quoted a 2002 Central Intelligence Agency report that said ``our assessment of al-Qaeda's ties to Iraq rests on a body of fragmented, conflicting reporting from sources of varying reliability."

On two occasions, Hussein rebuffed al-Qaeda emissaries seeking to establish a relationship with his regime, information not reported to U.S. intelligence agencies before the war, the reports said.

While Bin Laden's al-Qaeda lieutenant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was in Iraq in 2002, he was traveling under cover and eluded efforts by Hussein to capture him, the reports said.

Threat to Hussein

Al-Qaeda operative Abu Hafs al-Mauritani went to Iraq twice -- in 1998 and 2002 -- to meet with Hussein but was rebuffed, according to the reports. Hussein said al-Mauritani should leave the country because he may ``cause a problem" for the regime.

Further, Iraqi intelligence agents infiltrated Ansar al- Islam, a radical Kurdish group hosting al-Qaeda fighters, because Hussein saw them as a threat and thought the U.S. would use their presence to suggest a link between the Iraqis and the terrorists, the reports said.

Democrats said the reports show that statements by Bush administration officials before the Iraq war began in 2003 weren't supported by intelligence known at the time they spoke.

Republicans Counter

Republicans countered that Democrats were swayed by the same bad intelligence as President George W. Bush and supported the president's decision to go to war with Iraq. Still, seven of eight Republicans on the panel, including Chairman Pat Roberts, voted to approve the conclusions about pre-war intelligence.

Bush has consistently linked Iraq, where more than 2,600 U.S. military personnel have died and the U.S. is mired in a violent conflict between Shiites and Sunnis, to the larger war on terror and fundamentalist Islamic militants such as al-Qaeda.

Bush displayed ``gross negligence" by citing faulty intelligence in speeches and statements to connect Saddam Hussein to al-Qaeda, said Senator Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the intelligence panel.

When George Tenet, then-director of the CIA, told Bush that the intelligence case showing Iraq had weapons of mass destruction was a ``slam dunk," it was ``a corruption of the intelligence process," said Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat.

Snow Comments

Tenet later complied with administration demands that the CIA gloss over inconsistencies between intelligence data and Bush's assertions and should be held accountable, Levin said. The report quoted committee testimony this year by Tenet, who acknowledged ``it was the wrong thing to do."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the White House hadn't seen the two Senate reports and wasn't briefed on it.

``Based on the characterizations we've seen, it's nothing new," he told reporters at the daily White House briefing. ``So, it's, again, kind of re-litigating things that happened three years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0061053

``It's worth noting," Snow added, ``that in 2002 and 2003 members of both parties got a good look at the intelligence we had, and they came to the very same conclusions."

Committee chairman Roberts said Democrats were misusing the reports ``by careful cherry-picking through the intelligence and the facts in a political attempt to rewrite history." The information available before the war was used by the administration and Congress, Democrats included, to justify going into Iraq, he said.

Partisan Battles

The Senate reports, which were subject to partisan battles behind closed doors, are the result of two and half years of investigative review by the intelligence panel's staff. Democrats last year forced a closed session of the Senate to protest the committee's delays in releasing the reports.

Republican Senators Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine joined with intelligence committee Democrats in concluding that Chalabi actively sought to mislead the Bush administration to overthrow Saddam. Roberts said Chalabi's information played a minimal role.

To contact the reporters on this story: William Roberts in Washington wroberts@bloomberg.net

Report Finds No Saddam, Zarqawi Ties (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Post-Iraq invasion intelligence concluded there was no relationship between Saddam Hussein's regime and the al Qaeda terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi, casting doubt on President Bush's statements as recently as last month that there was a link.

A report released yesterday by the Senate intelligence committee said the CIA concluded last year that the Zarqawi-Saddam nexus did not exist.

"Postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture al-Zarqawi and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi," the bipartisan report concluded. It focused on comparing prewar intelligence on Iraq with post-invasion information from seized documents and interrogations of Saddam regime figures.

Democrats pounced on the conclusion as proof that Mr. Bush and his administration are misleading the American people about their justifications for going to war in March 2003 to oust Saddam.

Mr. Bush said at an Aug. 21 press conference, when asked to defend the invasion, "I square it because imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein, who had the capacity to make a weapon of mass destruction, who was paying suiciders to kill innocent life, who had relations with Zarqawi."

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and intelligence committee member, said yesterday: "To this day, these statements haven't stopped. Just two weeks ago, the president said in a press conference that Saddam Hussein had relations with Zarqawi. The intelligence committee's report demonstrates that statement to be false. ... The president's statement, made just two weeks ago, is flat out false."

White House spokesman Tony Snow told The Washington Times last night that Mr. Bush was referring to the fact that Zarqawi was in Iraq receiving medical care and lodging during Saddam's rule.

"The president knows there was no operational relationship and he did not assert there was an operational relationship," Mr. Snow said.

The Senate report also said there is no evidence that Saddam's regime participated in or aided the September 11 attacks. Mr. Snow said the president has never asserted otherwise.

"There have been repeated insinuations that the president had somehow said Saddam was involved in September 11," Mr. Snow said. "He has never said that. He has taken great pains from the very beginning to assure people that was not the case."

The Senate report did confirm prewar intelligence that the Jordanian-born Zarqawi, who had links to al Qaeda and fought in Afghanistan, did enter Iraq in the spring of 2002 and stayed in Baghdad until November of that year. Some Bush officials said publicly before the war that the Saddam regime would not have allowed the jihadist to remain in Baghdad if it did not condone his presence.

But post-invasion intelligence collection showed that Saddam considered Zarqawi an outlaw and sent his intelligence service to capture him. "The [Iraqi Intelligence Service] formed a special committee and actively attempted to locate and capture al-Zarqawi without success, contradicting prewar assessments that the IIS almost certainly possessed the capability to track him," the Senate report said.

Zarqawi returned to Iraq in 2003 and formed the deadly al Qaeda in Iraq terror group. A U.S. air strike killed him in June.

The report also said post-invasion intelligence can only confirm one meeting (in the Sudan) between a Saddam regime official and an al Qaeda operative. Saddam refused two other meeting requests from al Qaeda. An al Qaeda detainee recanted a statement to the CIA that Iraq helped train al Qaeda terrorists in explosives and chemical weapons.

The report reaffirmed an early committee report in 2004, and a presidential commission finding in 2004, that the 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on which the war decision was based was wrong in its major conclusions.

Republicans accused Democrats of rehashing the same findings and noted virtually all intelligence agencies worldwide estimated that Saddam still possessed stocks of chemical weapons. Mr. Bush has acknowledged the report was wrong. Neither the committee nor the bipartisan commission found that the Bush administration pressured the intelligence community on the 2002 NIE, which was generally in line with intelligence findings in the Clinton administration.

"The long-known fact is that the prewar intelligence was wrong," said committee Chairman Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican. "That flawed intelligence was used by policy-makers, both in the administration and in Congress, as one of numerous justifications to go to war in Iraq. The same intelligence was collectively believed and used, leading to the same assertive public statements regarding the threat posed by Saddam Hussein."

The Iraq Survey Group, which spent two years in Iraq hunting for weapons of mass destruction, found no stockpiles, but said Saddam planned to resume WMD programs after the United Nations lifted economic sanctions.

Senate Reports Say Saddam Rejected Cooperating With Terrorists (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein rejected pleas for assistance from Osama bin Laden and tried to capture terrorist Abu Musab al Zarqawi when he was in Iraq, a Senate Intelligence Committee report released Friday found, casting further doubt on the Bush administration's rationale for invading Iraq.

President Bush and other administration officials repeatedly cited Saddam's alleged ties to radical Islamic terrorists before the March 2003 invasion as one reason to take military action against Iraq.

The 150-page report said the administration's claims were untrue. "Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qaida to provide material or operational support," the report said.

The report was released along with a second one that said false information from the exile group Iraqi National Congress, led by Ahmad Chalabi, was widely distributed in prewar intelligence reports and used to support intelligence assessments about Iraq's weapons and links to terrorism. Intelligence officials repeatedly warned that the INC was unreliable, but White House and Pentagon officials ignored the warnings.

The reports are part of a five-report study that the Senate Intelligence Committee has undertaken into the Bush administration's use of intelligence before the invasion of Iraq.

The study has left the committee badly divided. Three reports remain classified, including one comparing prewar statements by Bush administration officials to intelligence available at the time. Democrats have accused Republicans of delaying the reports until after the November congressional elections.

On Friday, Democrats charged that the reports showed that the White House had manipulated intelligence to make the case for war to the American people.

"The administration ignored warnings prior to the war about the veracity of the intelligence it trumpeted publicly to support its case that Iraq was an imminent threat to the security of the United States," said panel Vice Chairman Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va.

DOJ_NMG_0061055

Republicans rejected that allegation and said the reports added little to what was already known.

"The long-known fact is that the prewar intelligence was wrong. That flawed intelligence was used by policymakers, both in the administration and in Congress, as one of numerous justifications to go to war in Iraq," said committee chairman Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan.

In the run-up to the war, Bush and his advisers repeatedly sought to link Saddam and al-Qaida, stopping just short of accusing the Iraqi leader of a role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"You can't distinguish between al-Qaida and Saddam when you talk about the war on terror," Bush said on Sept. 25, 2002.

On the same day, Condoleezza Rice, then the White House national security adviser, said, "High-ranking detainees have said that Iraq provided some training to al-Qaida in chemical weapons development."

The detainee Rice referred to was al-Qaida operative Ibn al Shaykh al Libi, who was captured in Pakistan in November 2001 and, U.S. intelligence officials said, tortured by Egyptian authorities after his transfer to that country.

The Senate report says that in February 2002, months before Rice spoke, the Defense Intelligence Agency reported that al Libi "was likely intentionally misleading his briefers."

Postwar information on Saddam's relations with Islamic extremists came from numerous sources, the report suggests, including seized documents and interrogations of Saddam himself, former Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz and a senior Iraqi spy, Faruq Hijazi.

The report, quoting from an FBI debriefing of Hijazi, said that when an Iraqi operative met bin Laden in Sudan in 1995, bin Laden asked that Saddam allow him to open an office in Iraq, give him Chinese-made sea mines and military training, and broadcast his speeches.

"According to Hijazi, Saddam immediately refused," the FBI debriefing said.

Regarding Zarqawi, the Senate report cites information that's surfaced since the war indicating that Saddam "attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture" him and the Iraqi regime "did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi."

Zarqawi, who operated from a part of northern Iraq that Saddam didn't control, was a key part of Bush's case for war. After the invasion, he became the head of the group al Qaida in Iraq. U.S. bombs killed him in June.

The second report released Friday confirms that the INC had "an aggressive `publicity campaign' prior to the war to bring defectors to the attention of `anyone who would listen.'"

While many committee Republicans dismissed the INC report's conclusions as unsupported by the facts, two of them, Sens. Olympia Snowe of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, voted for harsher language that Democrats proposed.

The report, which ran 211 pages, disclosed that three months after the White House approved continued funding for the INC's intelligence collection in July 2002, the Defense Intelligence Agency warned that the group "was penetrated by hostile intelligence services," including Iran's. It's unclear whether top White House officials were aware of the warning.

The report also confirms a report by McClatchy Newspapers that former CIA director R. James Woolsey helped get an INC defector attention from the U.S. government by referring him to Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Linton Wells.

The defector, Adnan Ihsan Saeed al Haideri, suggested that he had knowledge of dozens of sites related to weapons of mass destruction, but none of them were ever found, and Haideri, taken to Iraq in early 2004, couldn't identify the facilities that he claimed he knew about.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondents Matt Stearns and John Walcott contributed to this article.

Saddam Rejected Al-Qaida's Requests For Aid (SLPD)

By Bob Deans

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Toppled Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein distrusted the al-Qaida terrorist organization, rebuffed its requests for aid and tried unsuccessfully to capture one of its senior operatives, the Senate Intelligence Committee reported Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0061056

The report, based on an extensive review of postwar intelligence that included interrogations of former Iraqi officials, appeared to undercut a key claim of President George W. Bush's administration: that Saddam's ties to terrorist groups posed a threat to the U.S. and its allies.

As long ago as October 2002, Bush said that "Iraq and al-Qaida have had high-level contacts that go back a decade," warning that "Iraq could decide on any given day" to give a dangerous weapon "to a terrorist group."

At that time, though, the U.S. intelligence community had no evidence of close links between Saddam and al-Qaida, and analysts had reported in top secret documents that Saddam viewed Islamic extremists operating inside Iraq as a threat, the Senate committee reported.

As recently as Thursday, Bush continued to highlight links between Iraq and al-Qaida and its leader, Osama bin Laden. There are al-Qaida operatives in Iraq now, including many who have come from abroad to join an insurgency Pentagon officials estimate at somewhere around 30,000 strong. Bush's critics point out, though, that it has been the U.S.-led war in Iraq that both generated the insurgency and attracted the foreign jihadists.

"Osama bin Laden has proclaimed the third world war is raging in Iraq," Bush said Thursday in an Atlanta speech. "Al-Qaida leaders have declared that Baghdad will be the capital of the new caliphate that they wish to establish across the Middle East."

While bin Laden has purportedly made such claims, the U.S. intelligence community has concluded that when Saddam was in power, he repeatedly rebuffed al-Qaida's requests for assistance and forbade Iraqis from dealing with the group.

"Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qaida to provide material or operational support," states the report of the committee, which is chaired by Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kansas.

"Debriefings also indicate that Saddam issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with al-Qaida," the report continued. "No postwar information suggests that the Iraqi regime attempted to facilitate a relationship with bin Laden."

Also on Thursday, Bush spotlighted the U.S. killing of al-Qaida operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi earlier this year in Iraq, calling him "al-Qaida's most visible and aggressive leader to emerge" after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Roberts' committee, however, reported that Saddam ordered his internal intelligence forces to try to capture al-Zarqawi after they received a tip in the fall of 2002 that he was in Baghdad under an alias for medical treatment. But al-Zarqawi eluded the Iraqi security forces, left Iraq that fall and returned in June 2003, after U.S. forces had invaded Iraq and toppled Saddam's regime.

Democrats pounced on the report - which drew chiefly from Central Intelligence Agency conclusions in a 2005 report that was previously classified - as evidence that Bush's administration mischaracterized and misused intelligence to help trump up the Iraqi threat in the lead-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond, R-Mo., criticized Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee for attempting to spin the report released Friday, calling their comments that the administration manipulated pre-war intelligence about Iraq deceptive.

"Democrats continue to make partisan attacks even though the facts do not support those conclusions," Bond said. "The committee has wasted an inordinate amount of time looking in the rearview mirror as some of its members desperately attempt to find something to pin on the Bush administration for political leverage."

While acknowledging that the intelligence community "is responsible for massive failures prior to the Iraq war," Bond's statement denied that the administration "intentionally misled the nation or manipulated intelligence."

Bond, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said it had wasted its time "on a witch hunt" and should focus instead on fixing problems in the nation's intelligence agencies.

Bush based his case for war chiefly on his assertion that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons. No stockpiles of such weapons have been found, and a series of assessments have documented extensive flaws in the post-war intelligence concerning Iraq's weapons programs.

Make No Mistake: Presidents Wouldn't Admit It (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061057

Being president apparently means never being able to say you're sorry. Or wrong.

President Bush said that the Central Intelligence Agency did secretly detain certain people suspected of working for al-Qaeda, and that CIA interrogators have used "an alternative set of procedures" designed to pry information from prisoners. Given the opportunity to say he was wrong or that he was sorry, he did what presidents do: neither.

It is a presidential maneuver that satisfies some Americans for whom the ends of the Bush administration's approach to combating terrorism justify the means, and that angers others who believe civil liberties have been casualties of that war. It is a tack that the president may take again in light of reports from the Senate Intelligence Committee that Saddam Hussein was not linked to Osama bin Laden at the time Bush was mounting a war against Iraq. In any case, it is an unapologetic apologia consistent with 230 years of U.S. history.

"Thomas Jefferson was wrong about a lot of stuff," says Peter Onuf, Thomas Jefferson Foundation professor of history at the University of Virginia. But when it came to admitting he was wrong or sorry, Jefferson "could be evasive."

For example, when it was suggested that Jefferson had a liaison with the slave Sally Hemings, "he never addressed the issue," Onuf says. "The charges were widely bruited about in the Federalist press and his response was not to confront it directly. It probably was prudent of him."

Partly "it was the code of an honorable gentleman that provided coverage," Onuf says. Jefferson wouldn't stoop to "answering claims by social inferiors. He didn't respond to things he didn't have to. He was a pretty smooth guy. He certainly believed he was already on the side of the angels."

Other presidents have sidestepped culpability. When the British sacked the city of Washington in 1814, says Gerard W. Gawalt, specialist in American history at the Library of Congress, "James Madison managed to blame everybody but himself for that fiasco."

The presidential posture: Take responsibility, not blame.

Self-certainty is built into the presidential software. Steve Rubenzer, a Houston psychologist and co-author of "Personality, Character, and Leadership in the White House: Psychologists Assess the Presidents," says: "People who become president tend to be dominant individuals. They tend to like to be one up on other people. Apologizing is being one down."

Being wrong or sorry "is seen as a disadvantage. That's a position they try to avoid."

Presidents present themselves as competent and moral. "To admit otherwise is to essentially impeach yourself," Rubenzer says, "and once you have admitted it, it's not contested anymore."

Allan J. Lichtman, a history professor at American University and a Democratic candidate in Maryland for the U.S. Senate says that presidents have always had a sense of their own righteousness.

When it was discovered that members of Ulysses S. Grant's Cabinet were selling favors to the highest bidders, "Grant never took responsibility," Lichtman says. "He tried to defend his Cabinet and staff." Other presidents backed into corners -- Richard Nixon and Bill Clinton, for instance -- have used parsed and parsimonious language to justify their actions. Franklin Roosevelt never apologized for interning Japanese Americans, Lichtman says.

It wasn't until years after Jimmy Carter had left office, says Richard Norton Smith, a scholar in residence at George Mason University, "that he was able to reply what he would have done differently during the Iranian hostage crisis."

During a presidential debate in 1976, Gerald Ford said, "There is no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe and there never will be under a Ford administration." Ford was given opportunities at the time to admit that he was wrong, but "Ford is a stubborn Dutchman. He dug in his heels. He could have backed off in the program. But that's not in the nature of these guys," Smith says.

Years later, as the Soviet Union crumbled, Ford wrote a piece in this newspaper saying "I told you so."

Making the best of a bad situation is part of the job description. Marjorie Cohn of the National Lawyers Guild, a group that has been highly critical of Bush, says that the president's announcement about secret prisons reminds her of the man who was being run out of town and got out in front of the crowd to make it look like he was leading the parade. "That," she says, "is what the president is doing."

With All Deliberate Foot-Dragging (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061058

We were certainly relieved that the Senate Intelligence Committee finally made official yesterday what pretty much everyone but President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney had already acknowledged: There never was any connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda, not even between Mr. Hussein and the self-styled Qaeda leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Iraq also was not busily trying to build a nuclear weapon before the war, nor did it have a biological weapons program.

Those conclusions were contained in documents released by the committee as part of the second phase of its investigation into the prewar intelligence on Iraq. Releasing any documents was a change of pace for the panel's chairman, Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, who has consistently tried to stymie this phase of the investigation.

Unfortunately, the documents — only two of the five parts of the final report — are beside the big point of this inquiry: Did Mr. Bush and his aides knowingly hype the intelligence on Iraq and deliberately mislead Americans into war?

The first phase of the committee's investigation listed countless ways in which the intelligence agencies messed up before the war, but drew no conclusions about how Mr. Bush used the flawed intelligence. That question was put off until after the election of 2004, and Mr. Roberts did his best for another year to make sure it would never be answered.

When Democrats forced him to resume the investigation, Mr. Roberts re-engineered the inquiry into a five-part series and orchestrated the process so that the verdict on the actions of Mr. Bush and his team will now not be rendered until after yet another election season is over this fall.

Mr. Roberts has consistently defended his actions by saying he was trying to conduct a careful investigation. But yesterday, he denounced Democrats for "insisting that they were deliberately duped into supporting the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime."

"That is simply not true," Mr. Roberts said.

So much for not prejudging the outcome. If Mr. Roberts has an investigative report supporting that conclusion, we'd sure like to read it.

Army General Says Rumsfeld Refused To Plan For Post-war Iraq (DULNT/MCT)

By Stephanie Heinatz

The Duluth News Tribune/McClatchy, September 9, 2006

FORT EUSTIS, Va. - Long before the United States invaded Iraq in 2003, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld forbade military strategists to develop plans for securing a post-war Iraq, the retiring commander of the Army Transportation Corps said Thursday.

In fact, said Brig. Gen. Mark Scheid, Rumsfeld said "he would fire the next person" who talked about the need for a post-war plan.

Rumsfeld did replace Gen. Eric Shinseki, the Army chief of staff in 2003, after Shinseki told Congress that hundreds of thousands of troops would be needed to secure post-war Iraq.

Scheid, who is also the commander of Fort Eustis in Newport News, made his comments in an interview with the Daily Press. He retires in about three weeks.

Scheid's comments are further confirmation of the version of events reported in "Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq," the book by New York Times reporter Michael R. Gordon and retired Marine Corps Lt. Gen. Bernard E. Trainor.

In 2001, Scheid was a colonel with the Central Command, the unit that oversees U.S. military operations in the Mideast.

On Sept. 10, 2001, he was selected to be the chief of logistics war plans.

On Sept. 11, he said, "life just went to hell."

That day, Gen. Tommy Franks, the commander of Central Command, told his planners, including Scheid, to "get ready to go to war."

A day or two later, Rumsfeld was "telling us we were going to war in Afghanistan and to start building the war plan. We were going to go fast.

"Then, just as we were barely into Afghanistan Rumsfeld came and told us to get ready for Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0061059

Scheid said he remembers everyone thinking, "My gosh, we're in the middle of Afghanistan, how can we possibly be doing two at one time? How can we pull this off? It's just going to be too much."

Planning was kept very hush-hush in those early days.

"There was only a handful of people, maybe five or six, that were involved with that plan because it had to be kept very, very quiet."

There was already an offensive plan in place for Iraq, Scheid said. And in the beginning, the planners were just expanding on it.

"Whether we were going to execute it, we had no idea," Scheid said.

Eventually other military agencies like the transportation and Army materiel commands had to get involved.

They couldn't just "keep planning this in the dark," Scheid said.

Planning continued to be a challenge.

"The secretary of defense continued to push on us that everything we write in our plan has to be the idea that we are going to go in, we're going to take out the regime, and then we're going to leave," Scheid said. "We won't stay."

Scheid said the planners continued to try "to write what was called Phase 4," or the piece of the plan that included post-invasion operations like security, stability and reconstruction.

Even if the troops didn't stay, "at least we have to plan for it," Scheid said.

"I remember the secretary of defense saying that he would fire the next person that said that," Scheid said. "We would not do planning for Phase 4 operations, which would require all those additional troops that people talk about today.

"He said we will not do that because the American public will not back us if they think we are going over there for a long war."

Why did Rumsfeld think that? Scheid doesn't know.

"But think back to those times. We had done Bosnia. We said we were going into Bosnia and stop the fighting and come right out. And we stayed."

Was Rumsfeld right or wrong?

Scheid said he doesn't know.

"In his own mind he thought we could go in and fight and take out the regime and come out. But a lot of us planners were having a real hard time with it because we were also thinking we can't do this. Once you tear up a country you have to stay and rebuild it. It was very challenging."

Scheid doesn't go so far as calling for Rumsfeld to resign. He's listened as other retired generals have done so.

"Everybody has a right to their opinion," he said. "But what good did it do?"

Even if the people who laid out the initial war plans had fleshed out post-invasion missions, the fighting and insurgent attacks going on today would have been hard to predict, Scheid said.

"We really thought that after the collapse of the regime we were going to do all these humanitarian type things," he said. "We thought this would go pretty fast and we'd be able to get out of there. We really didn't anticipate them to continue to fight the way they did or come back the way they are.

"Now we're going more toward a Civil War. We didn't see that coming."

While Scheid, a soldier since 1977, spoke candidly about the days leading up to the invasion of Iraq, he remains concerned about the American public's view of the troops. He's bothered by the nationwide divide over the war and fearful that patriotism among citizens will continue to decline.

"We're really hurting right now," he said.

Iranian Troops Arrest 5 From Iraqi Security Forces On Border (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 8 — Five members of the Iraqi security forces and their interpreter were arrested by Iranian troops as the Iraqis were patrolling the Iraq-Iran border this week, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0061060

The Iraqis were on a joint patrol run by the Interior and Defense ministries, said the spokesman, Muhammad al-Askari, and were seized near the town of Mandali, in Diyala Province. The area has been rife with sectarian violence.

It was unclear which side of the border the Iraqis were on.

This is not the first time in recent years that Iran has arrested foreign troops for operating near its border. In June 2004, Iran seized three British naval boats and detained eight sailors as the boats were patrolling in the waters straddling the Iraq-Iran border in the south. The sailors were eventually released.

The arrests of the Iraqis come at a time of growing tension between the United States and Iran. The Bush administration is pushing for a United Nations resolution that would impose economic and political sanctions on Iran for going forward with its uranium enrichment program, which American officials say could result in a nuclear weapon.

Here in Baghdad, the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, and military commanders have accused individuals or groups in Iran of supporting Shiite militias and urging them to step up attacks against the Americans.

Several prominent Iraqi Shiite leaders with strong ties to Iran have denied the American accusations.

Iran and Iraq fought a war from 1980 to 1988 in which up to one million people were killed. Though Iraqi Shiite political parties are close to some Iranian officials, many Iraqis distrust the Iranians, who have been the traditional rivals of Arabs for influence in the region. Iran's population is mostly Shiite Persian.

Violence rippled across parts of Iraq on Friday. In Baghdad, a homemade bomb exploded near a police convoy, killing three civilians and wounding three policemen.

The police found six bodies in four different parts of Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said.

In the insurgent stronghold of Hawija, near the oil city of Kirkuk, gunmen assassinated a prominent sheik, Khalaf Ibrahim, police officials said. A volley of mortars in the town of Musayyib killed three Shiite pilgrims and wounded 22 others. The pilgrims were going to Karbala to celebrate the birthday of a vanished Shiite imam.

The American military said a soldier was killed by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad. An Iraqi civilian was killed and a young child injured in an accident on Friday involving a military convoy, American officials said.

The British military said a British soldier died Thursday from wounds suffered earlier in the week when his patrol was attacked in the town of Qurna.

The latest round of violence came a day after a Baghdad morgue official told reporters that more than 1,500 Iraqi civilians died violently in the capital in August, about the same level as in June. If the August figure is accurate, it shows that the new Baghdad security plan rolled out by the American military in early August has made little difference so far in quelling violence.

On Thursday, the new leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, released an audio message urging every Sunni Arab to kill an American within the next 15 days, and beseeching those Sunnis whose family members have suffered under the Shiite-led government to kill a member of a Shiite party or militia, according to a translation by the SITE Institute, which tracks jihadist messages.

It was Mr. Muhajir's first audio message since he was named successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Qaeda leader who was killed by an American airstrike in June.

"What you saw in the past is a drop of what you are going to see and what is prepared for you," Mr. Muhajir said.

American military officials have said they believe that Abu Hamza al-Muhajir is the nom de guerre of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian explosives expert said to have trained in 1999 at a terrorist camp in Afghanistan run by Al Qaeda.

Five Iraqi Soldiers Seized In Border Clash With Iran (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 8 -- The Iranian military seized five Iraqi soldiers after a cross-border skirmish Thursday, Iraqi authorities said Friday.

The captured troops were part of a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol that trekked on Thursday afternoon to a border post near Mandali, a town of 13,000 located about 75 miles northeast of Baghdad, to investigate reports that a large number of Iranians were crossing into Iraq there, according to Brig. Gen. Subhi Bairam, commander of the Mandali police.

DOJ_NMG_0061061

Iranian forces opened fire when the patrol moved within about 50 yards of the border, Bairam said. The patrol returned fire and then retreated from the scene. Back in Mandali, patrol members realized that five soldiers and the vehicle they were in had been captured by the Iranians.

The Iranian military said it arrested the troops for "infiltrating the Iranian soil," according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency. Iran also said it had arrested seven soldiers, not five.

The announcement of the capture came as sectarian violence continued to roil Iraq.

Three Shiite Muslim pilgrims were killed and two were wounded by mortar fire in Musayyib, south of Baghdad, as they marched to a major religious celebration in the holy city of Karbala, according to Capt. Muthanna Ahmed of the Babil provincial police. More than a million pilgrims are expected to gather in Karbala on Saturday for the Shabaniya holiday, which commemorates the birth of one of Shiite Islam's most revered religious figures.

In Baghdad, bombs killed four people and wounded five in separate attacks on police patrols in the eastern part of the city, according to Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Muhammad of the Interior Ministry. At least 11 other people were killed in other attacks across the country, police said.

The U.S. military also announced that an American soldier was killed early Friday when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad. No other details were released.

Special correspondent Saad Sarhan in Karbala and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Forces Deploy In Karbala To Protect Shi'ite Pilgrims (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Washington Times/AP, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi police and army troops fanned out around Karbala yesterday to safeguard the Shi'ite holy city as a mortar attack killed three pilgrims heading there for a religious festival.

At least 22 other persons were wounded -- four critically -- when three mortar rounds exploded among pilgrims in Musayyib, about 40 miles south of Baghdad.

Officials said they expected as many as 3 million pilgrims at the religious festival today in Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad.

"Our forces have tightened their control on the ground and our only concern now is rockets launched from a far distance," said Iraqi army Maj. Gen. Samir Abdullah.

Millions attend the festival observing the birthday of Imam al-Mahdi al-Muntadhar, a 9th-century religious leader. Many walk to Karbala from across Iraq, and several attacks already have occurred on processions heading to the city.

On Monday, Iraqi soldiers clashed with gunmen near Karbala during an operation to secure the area, leaving 14 militants and one Iraqi soldier dead, the prime minister's office said. Last week, 13 Pakistani and Indian Shi'ite pilgrims and their Iraqi driver were ambushed and killed en route to the city.

Since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Karbala has seen a number of attacks -- mostly involving suicide bombers -- that have killed hundreds of people. The attacks are considered to have been the work of Sunni Arab extremist groups, including al Qaeda in Iraq.

Iraqi officials said police and army troops had deployed around Karbala ahead of today's festival to prevent the infiltration of suicide bombers and terrorists. Cars have been banned since Wednesday.

One of the army units that will defend Karbala, the army's 8th Division, was the first to come under full Iraqi control during a ceremony Thursday. U.S.-led forces turned over control of Iraq's military command to the Shi'ite-led government, a step considered key toward the eventual withdrawal of foreign troops.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government defended its decision to shut down the Baghdad operations of Al Arabiya, a Dubai-based satellite TV channel, for one month.

Spokesman Ali al-Dabagh said some of Al Arabiya's reporting staff promoted sectarian violence and that some of its reports supported terrorism.

The other pan-Arab satellite network, Al Jazeera, had its office in the capital closed two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0061062

Also yesterday, coalition authorities announced the deaths of two coalition soldiers -- an American and a Briton.

Security Tight For Karbala Pilgrims (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD — Tens of thousands of Shiite Muslim pilgrims headed to a shrine city south of the capital Friday amid heavy security as the daily toll of casualties mounted in a sectarian war without respite.

No major attacks were reported against the multitudes destined for Karbala, where today they celebrate the birthday of a revered imam who disappeared a millennium ago.

But even on a relatively quiet day in the capital, authorities reported finding 14 unidentified bodies in various neighborhoods, all handcuffed, blindfolded and killed execution-style — most of them shot in the head — now a trademark of the internecine conflict.

In largely Shiite east Baghdad, a roadside bomb targeting police killed three civilians and wounded three officers. Mortar blasts killed two civilians in a Shiite district of south Baghdad, and gunmen killed at least three in other incidents, authorities reported.

The traditionally mixed capital — with its Shiites, Sunnis, Christians and others — has become the prime killing ground of the sectarian conflict, which authorities say leaves as many as 100 Iraqis dead each day. Tens of thousands reportedly have fled to neighborhoods where their sects predominate and militias provide some measure of safety.

Despite the presence in Iraq of about 145,000 U.S. troops, the highest figure in months, the Shiite-led government has struggled to maintain order amid daily carnage.

Thousands of Iraqi police officers, soldiers and volunteers sealed off Karbala, about 50 miles south of Baghdad, to try to prevent a repeat of previous attacks on masses of Shiite pilgrims, whose boisterous marches are often viewed as a provocation by the rival Sunni Arab community. Vehicles, cellphones and weapons were banned from the city, and everyone was subject to search.

News agencies reported mortar rounds aimed at Karbala-bound pilgrims killed at least three of them in Musayyib, about 35 miles south of Baghdad. But provincial authorities said the dead were local residents hit by mortar blasts targeting a police station in a violent mixed-population area.

More than 1 million pilgrims are expected, honoring a messianic figure known as the Mahdi who, it is believed, will return someday to save the faithful.

Karbala, with its two magnificent gold-domed shrines, is one of the jewels of the Shiite world. It has been the site of numerous attacks on pilgrims, including suicide bombings in spring 2004 that killed 130 worshipers and injured hundreds.

On Friday, the Muslim holy day, Shiite preachers nationwide urged the faithful to endorse federalism, a combustible concept under which Shiite-dominated southern provinces would merge into an autonomous region.

"Such a federal system exists in many nations, but when the Shiite talk about federalism, they are accused of dividing Iraq," leading cleric Sadruddin Qubanchi told worshipers in the southern city of Najaf. "There is no such danger."

...

The autonomy debate has badly exacerbated sectarian tensions. Many Sunnis view the plan as a scheme to deprive their long-dominant sect of resources while the Shiite south and Kurdish north pocket petroleum revenue from vast deposits in their zones.

In parliament Thursday, a shouting match ensued as Sunni representatives accused the majority Shiites of trying to slice up the country into ethnic and sectarian fiefdoms. The debate is expected to resume next week.

U.S. Count Of Baghdad Deaths Excludes Car Bombs, Mortar Attacks (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick And Zaineb Obeid

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. officials, seeking a way to measure the results of a program aimed at decreasing violence in Baghdad, aren't counting scores of dead killed in car bombings and mortar attacks as victims of the country's sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0061063

In a distinction previously undisclosed, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said Friday that the United States is including in its tabulations of sectarian violence only deaths of individuals killed in drive-by shootings or by torture and execution.

That has allowed U.S. officials to boast that the number of deaths from sectarian violence in Baghdad declined by more than 52 percent in August over July.

But it eliminates from tabulation huge numbers of people whose deaths are certainly part of the ongoing conflict between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Not included, for example, are scores of people who died in a highly coordinated bombing that leveled an entire apartment building in eastern Baghdad, a stronghold of rebel Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Johnson declined to provide an actual number for the U.S. tally of August deaths or for July, when the Baghdad city morgue counted a record 1,855 violent deaths.

Violent deaths for August, a morgue official told McClatchy Newspapers on Friday, totaled 1,526, a 17.7 percent decline from July and about the same as died violently in June.

The dispute is an important one. With Baghdad violence reaching record levels in July, U.S. commanders warned that the country was tipping toward civil war. They then ordered 8,000 U.S. troops and 3,000 Iraqis to conduct house-by-house searches of Baghdad's neighborhoods in an effort to root out insurgent gunmen and militia death squads in Operation Together Forward.

The program, which began in earnest Aug. 7, included bringing in thousands of American troops from other parts of Iraq in what was seen by many as a last-ditch effort to head off a civil war that many Iraqis say has already begun.

Within weeks of the kickoff of the Baghdad security plan, the U.S. military's top spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, boasted that the murder rate in Baghdad had fallen by 46 percent and attributed most of the fall to the new security sweeps.

On Thursday, Caldwell revised the figures, posting a statement on the website of the Multi-National Force-Iraq that the murder rate had dropped even more - by 52 percent from July.

That claim was immediately contradicted by the morgue figures, which trickled out in accounts by various news organizations citing unnamed officials.

Johnson said he couldn't comment on morgue figures and declined to release the raw numbers on which Caldwell's claim was based. He said the numbers were classified and that releasing them might help "our enemy" adjust their tactics.

"We attempt to strike the right balance, being as open and transparent as possible without providing information that places our troops or Iraqi civilians at undo risk by the enemy adjusting their tactics for greater impact," he said, in explaining the decision not to release the figures.

Johnson said the numbers more accurately reflect the impact of Operation Together Forward's mission: targeting operations of shadowy sectarian death squads, who often use drive-by shootings, torture and executions as tactics for terror, rather than suicide bombings or rocket or mortar attacks.

He said the figures quoted by Caldwell reflect a "cautious optimism" that the situation is improving in Iraq.

But whether the violence is truly improving is far from clear. The morgue numbers made public this week reflect only deaths in Baghdad and figures compiled by the Ministry of Health for August violent deaths throughout Iraq won't be released until later this month.

Car bombs daily claim tens of victims, and tit-for-tat exchanges of mortar fire are nightly occurrences. Every morning bodies are discovered, many with their hands and feet bound.

The distinction in the way those people die is lost on victims' relatives, some of whom suggest the true numbers are higher.

"If you want the truth, even when we hear or see the scenes of explosions, assassinations, or number of dead on TV, we don't really care anymore, our feelings are dead," said Dhiya Ahmed, whose 17-year-old nephew was killed on Aug. 11. The young man was walking with a friend near his house when gunmen approached and shot them both dead.

"The numbers are not quite true," said Ahmed. "I bet the actual number is much more."

The family's tragedy has been intense. Last year the victim's father was killed in a similar fashion.

Even while touting the successes, Caldwell on Thursday warned on the coalition Web site about possible increases in violence from insurgent and terrorist attacks that he said would be used to divert attention from the Baghdad security initiative.

"It should not be a surprise if we witness brief up ticks in violence in the near future," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0061064

Government leaders seem to be bracing for more bodies. A meeting was held recently between officials in the Health Ministry to talk about importing refrigerators for the morgue. The idea was to set them up in an empty building nearby.

But the discussion quickly broke down over what kind of freezers they would use: ones with sliding doors or a single large freezing room. More talks are scheduled.

In Baghdad on Friday, three civilians were killed and three others wounded when a bomb targeting the convoy of the Karrada neighborhood police commander exploded. Three police officers also were wounded.

Police also discovered 14 bodies in a western portion of the city.

New Army Manual Recalls Abuse (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The chief architect of the new Army field manual on interrogations said yesterday that the document aims to preserve the memory of the detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere so future generations of U.S. soldiers do not repeat the same mistakes.

Thomas Gandy, a senior civilian Army intelligence official, told reporters at the Pentagon that the new manual's explicit guidelines on what U.S. military personnel can and cannot do when questioning detainees arose out of the alarming photographs from Abu Ghraib and the dozen military investigations that examined abuse reported in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay. He said it was important to "keep these things vivid" so soldiers understand their boundaries and the effects of crossing them.

The manual, which is an extensive volume covering U.S. human intelligence collection operations, reads far more like direct instructions to military interrogators than did the previous field manual. It even includes highlight boxes filled with vital points top leaders wanted to make crystal clear. One such section warns troops that acts of violence or torture could lead to criminal charges and information of questionable value.

"Use of torture by U.S. personnel would bring discredit upon the U.S. and its armed forces while undermining domestic and international support for the war effort," the manual says. "It also could place U.S. and allied personnel in enemy hands at a greater risk of abuse by their captors. Conversely, knowing the enemy has abused U.S. and allied POWs does not justify using methods of interrogation specifically prohibited by law, treaty, agreement, and policy."

None of the techniques in the manual is classified despite more than a year of discussions that nearly culminated in at least one tactic remaining cloaked, Gandy said. Officials opted against secrecy, he said, because they feared it could fuel suspicion that the Pentagon was hiding abusive tactics.

The list of things interrogators cannot do includes abuse alleged at various facilities and some that appear to come directly from Abu Ghraib photographs: forcing a detainee to be naked, perform sexual acts, or pose in a sexual manner; placing hoods or sacks over a detainee's head or putting duct tape over his eyes; beatings, electric shocks, burns or other painful tactics; "waterboarding"; using military working dogs; using extreme cold or hot temperatures; mock executions; and depriving a detainee of food, water or medical care.

The manual also specifies that military police are not to be involved in interrogations.

Gandy said the narrow definitions should not affect most U.S. military interrogators, who rely on direct questioning for 90 percent or more of their successful efforts. President Bush this week said an alternative set of standards for the CIA -- which is not public -- has been necessary for interrogating top terrorist suspects, but Gandy and other Army officials said aggressive tactics are not required.

"These tools, used effectively, are adequate to meet our needs," he said of the techniques in the new manual.

Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First, said she is concerned that the Army field manual and a new Pentagon directive on detainee treatment designate the CIA as the agency that will do the nation's dirty work under a set of secret guidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0061065

"I'm afraid that they think they'll let the military stick to the law and they'll transfer all those great ideas over to civilian interrogators," Massimino said of the aggressive techniques. "It highlights the chasm between the military's rule-of-law standard and the lawlessness for civilian agencies."

U.S. Finds 'Torture Chambers' In Iraq (AP-Y)

AP, September 9, 2006

The senior commander of U.S. and Iraqi forces in northern Iraq said Friday that a small number of "torture chambers" apparently used for sectarian violence were discovered along the Diyala River.

Maj. Gen. Thomas R. Turner II, whose area of responsibility stretches from the Iranian border north to Turkey and west to the Syrian border, told reporters at the Pentagon that two or three small rooms were found in May or June. He mentioned them as examples of sectarian strife that has spread from Baghdad to other parts of Iraq.

"We do see that migration," he said when asked about a Pentagon report to Congress last week that expressed concern that sectarian violence was spreading beyond the Iraqi capital, where it is most intense and widespread.

Turner estimated that the torture chambers were about 6 feet wide and 6 feet long. He did not give their exact location. He said they were along the Diyala River, which runs northeast of Baghdad toward the Iranian border.

"What it included were places where shackles were attached to walls, batteries, and other evidence of torture," he said.

Diyala province is predominantly Sunni, with a sizable population of Shiites as well as Kurds.

Turner spoke by video teleconference from his headquarters at Tikrit.

Ex-Marine Warns Not To Rush To Judgment (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Ilario G. Pantano was cleared in two killings in Iraq and says others accused may be too.

SAN DIEGO — This is not the role Ilario G. Pantano had in mind when he reenlisted in the Marine Corps after Sept. 11. He wanted to join the fight against terrorism.

But now he's doing something different: pleading with Americans not to presume that a growing number of Marines and soldiers accused of atrocities in Iraq are actually guilty.

He is the voice of experience. The second lieutenant was charged with killing two unarmed Iraqi prisoners but was exonerated last year in a high-profile preliminary hearing at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

The case destroyed his Marine Corps career but gave him a new mission. Pantano resigned his commission in mid-2005.

"He is the perfect spokesman for the idea that you shouldn't prejudge," said Charles W. Gittins, his lawyer. "The case against him was supposedly solid but it fell apart quickly. It could happen again."

Gittins, in San Diego to defend a sergeant accused in a drowning at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot, wants Pantano to run for office. Pantano, 35, now living in North Carolina, says he's keeping his options open.

"What a great congressman or senator," Gittins said. "There are guys in those offices now who can't carry his briefcase."

Marine Sgt. Daniel Coburn, who accused Pantano of killing two defenseless Iraqis and of falsely claiming that the two were making threatening movements, has apparently not changed his mind.

The sergeant no longer talks to reporters, but his wife, Rae Anne, was scalding in expressing the family's opinion of Pantano: "He's a fake, and the media loves him because he's good-looking and articulate," she said.

On the articulate part, there is little doubt. Comfortable in front of cameras and unwavering in his opinions, Pantano has made the rounds of the political talk shows.

Even the acerbic and liberal-leaning Jon Stewart seemed impressed when Pantano appeared on "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" on Comedy Central. Pantano told the audience that no one could comprehend the brutality and moral confusion of war who had not seen it.

The war in Iraq, he said, boils down to deciding between a bad choice and a worse one.

DOJ_NMG_0061066

"One day you're interrogating a grandmother in front of her grandchildren because her son is a sniper and you've got to find this guy because he's killing your men," he said. "But she has lost children to Saddam — maybe four or five of them. You feel now this inner struggle: 'Am I becoming the beast?' "

Conservative bloggers championed Pantano's defense during the court case and are now praising his book "Warlord: No Better Friend, No Worse Enemy," which tells of his combat in Iraq and his courtroom experiences at Camp Lejeune.

Blogger Michelle Malkin, a regular on Bill O'Reilly's show on Fox television, has given her blog following a direct order: "Your mission: Make this book a best-seller. Spread the word."

Pantano has bantered with MSNBC "Hardball" host Chris Matthews, written a letter to the Washington Post blasting Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) for accusing Marines of "cold-blooded murder," and had a chapter of "Warlord" published in Soldier of Fortune magazine.

After growing up in New York's Hell's Kitchen neighborhood and attending a prep school on scholarship, he joined the Marine Corps and served on the front line as a sergeant in the Persian Gulf War.

After leaving the Corps, he graduated from New York University and became a commodities broker and then a multimedia entrepreneur.

Even before the dust from the World Trade Center settled in 2001, he said, he'd hurried to a barber for a "high-and-tight" haircut to begin feeling like a Marine again.

He reenlisted shortly after the attacks and was commissioned as a second lieutenant.

But just months into his first tour in Iraq in 2004 as commander of a rifle platoon, Pantano was pulled from combat and ordered back to the U.S. to answer the murder charges.

Although he did not testify at the hearing, he had insisted to investigators that he killed the two Iraqis after they made threatening moves at him. His accuser, Coburn, with whom Pantano had clashed, was judged by the hearing officer to lack credibility.

Pantano's legal strategy was aggressive and media-smart and has become a kind of standard for other military personnel facing similar charges, particularly the seven Marines and Navy corpsman at Camp Pendleton accused of kidnapping and murdering a 52-year-old Iraqi.

Like Pantano, each of the so-called Pendleton 8 has hired a civilian attorney not bound by military restrictions about talking to reporters and not reluctant to criticize military investigators. Each of the eight, also like Pantano, has a website devoted to his defense.

Pantano is worried that decisions about bringing criminal charges are often made by investigators and officers without direct combat experience. The line between acceptable and unacceptable violence in Iraq is hard to discern, he said.

"Sadly, we want the line to be a very rigid and moral one," he said. "Unfortunately, that line moves as the intensity of combat builds."

Marines and soldiers may become reluctant to fire their weapons for fear of being criticized or charged, he warned. "Our reluctance to apply the right amount of violence upfront has only allowed a festering wound of the insurgency to get worse."

Blast In Kabul Kills 14 Afghans, 2 U.S. Soldiers (WP)

By Pamela Constable And Javed Hamdard

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 8 -- A suicide bomber rammed a Toyota sedan into a U.S. military convoy Friday morning on a busy Kabul street, triggering a blast that killed 14 Afghan civilians and two U.S. soldiers, officials here said. At least 17 other people, including a U.S. soldier, were injured.

The attack, carried out on the same block as the heavily guarded U.S. Embassy, was the latest of half a dozen bombings that in recent months have brought what was an almost exclusively rural insurgency onto the streets of the Afghan capital.

Friday's bombing came as Taliban militiamen are battling NATO troops in southern Afghanistan with unexpected aggressiveness and occupying rural districts there.

DOJ_NMG_0061067

NATO officers meeting Friday in Warsaw debated a call from the alliance commander, Gen. James L. Jones, for member states to send as many as 2,500 more troops and additional combat aircraft and transports to the southern provinces.

Suicide bombings were all but unknown in Afghanistan until the past year. Afghan officials have charged that the attackers infiltrated from Pakistan, where they allegedly received training and weapons from Islamic groups or intelligence services.

Friday's explosion tore one U.S. military vehicle in half and scattered chunks of charred metal and human limbs across the pavement, witnesses said. It shattered hundreds of windows in the nearby Makroyan apartment complex.

The blast occurred on the eve of two tense anniversaries for the country: the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, which triggered the U.S. military campaign that drove the Taliban from power the following November, and the assassination of the anti-Taliban guerrilla leader Ahmed Shah Massoud two days before.

The bomber struck just a few yards from a traffic circle containing a monument to Massoud. A massive public ceremony commemorating Massoud's death is planned for Saturday.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called the crime "a heinous act of terrorism," and he said U.S. authorities here would work closely with Afghan security agencies to investigate it.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai condemned the attack as a "shocking and despicable" act that went "against the values of Islam and humanity." In a statement released by his office, he said that "enemies of Afghanistan are trying to hinder the country's progress towards peace and democracy by disrupting the peaceful life of our people."

In recent months there have been half a dozen suicide bombings in the capital, most of them aimed at U.S. or NATO convoys and facilities.

Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, a spokesman for U.S. military forces here, said 94 civilians and 28 foreign and Afghan troops have been killed by roadside bombs this year.

"We will continue to work together with the Afghan government and Afghan security forces to defeat Taliban extremists and protect the people of Afghanistan from this brutal common enemy," Fitzpatrick said.

Witnesses to the midmorning bombing said they heard a tremendous explosion and saw bodies, including those of several women, thrown into the air. They said the dead included an elderly man who was selling used clothing from a pushcart and several brothers who were hanging up used jeans and shirts to display on a fence.

"I was just setting out my melons when I heard a sound such as I had never heard in my life," said Hamid Wafa, 20, whose left hand was injured by shattered glass from storefronts near his fruit stand. He said he had seen a white Toyota Corolla smash into the passing convoy. "If I knew who had done this I would kill him."

A man of 50 who gave his name as Qayoum said all the glass in his apartment windows had been shattered. He speculated that the attack was "the work of al-Qaeda and terrorists," pointing out that it had taken place near both the U.S. Embassy and the presidential palace.

Afghan, U.S. and NATO troops quickly cordoned off the blast site and stationed four tanks nearby. A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy said that no one there had been injured but that the facility was closed for the rest of the day as a security measure.

Pakistan has denied the accusations that it is tolerating or helping the Taliban. Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, acknowledged on a goodwill visit to Kabul earlier this week that there had been cross-border infiltration by Afghan insurgents hiding in the border areas, but he disputed suggestions that Pakistani agencies were aiding in those movements.

Friday's explosion was the deadliest attack in the capital since September 2002, when a pair of bombs hidden in a taxi and on a bicycle killed 26 people, injured dozens more and destroyed much of a downtown block of shops and hotels. Recent bombings in Kabul have included remote-control and suicide blasts. Last week, a NATO military convoy was bombed on a highway outside Kabul, killing three Afghans. Earlier this summer, remote-control blasts targeted public buses carrying Afghan civilian and security workers to their jobs.

Suicide Bomber Kills 16 In Kabul Near Embassy (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061068

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 8 — A suicide bomber smashed his car into an American military vehicle just yards from the United States Embassy in downtown Kabul on Friday morning, killing as many as 16 people and wounding 29, Afghan and American officials said.

The bombing was one of the most powerful to shake the capital since American forces drove the Taliban from power in 2001. The United States military issued a statement confirming the deaths of two American soldiers and said two others were wounded.

The Afghan police at the scene put the death toll at 11 civilians and 5 American soldiers. Witnesses said they saw three American soldiers lying in the street. Other soldiers might also have been killed, they said, as the blast ripped apart the armored Humvee, making it hard to believe that anyone inside could have survived.

Soldiers later pulled shredded American uniforms off the trees and picked up body parts. A seat from the Humvee was left hanging in a tree.

Kabul residents said they were bracing for still more violence as they prepared to observe the fifth anniversary on Saturday of the death of the warlord Ahmed Shah Masood, who was killed by two suicide bombers from Al Qaeda in an assassination linked to the 9/11 attacks.

The Kabul bombing came amid a sharp escalation of violence in Afghanistan, where NATO and American military commanders are waging an offensive to crush a Taliban insurgency that has revived with unexpected strength this year.

Suicide bombers have struck more than 50 times in the last year, killing more than 100 civilians. Most often the attacks have been in the south, where the insurgency thrives.

That fighting against the insurgents continued Friday. A NATO soldier was killed and three others were wounded in a roadside attack in southwestern Afghanistan, where American troops are deployed, and another suicide bomber threw himself at a NATO convoy in Kandahar Province but killed only himself.

Heavy fighting also raged in a strategic area west of the city of Kandahar, where Canadian troops are locked in fierce battles with Taliban insurgents.

NATO defense chiefs, meeting in Warsaw on Friday, discussed raising still more troops for Afghanistan, which has become the largest and most serious combat mission in the alliance's 57-year history.

On Thursday, the Atlantic alliance's top commander of operations, Gen. James L. Jones of the United States, said that he had asked for 2,000 to 2,500 people on top of the roughly 18,500 soldiers NATO has already deployed in Afghanistan, and that he had called for more helicopters and transport aircraft.

But he said in an interview that alliance members had so far failed to provide equipment and troops pledged months ago, adding that he had asked them to "make good" on the promises and that he could not understand why NATO countries were delaying when their forces were facing sustained combat.

"I am asking for the forces we asked for 18 months ago," General Jones said. "It is not that we are making new demands. We have generated about 85 percent of the force that is required. In view of the hostilities that are going on, especially in the southern region, the commander on the ground said if he had the full kit he would be in very, very good shape."

The commander he referred to was the senior alliance officer, Lt. Gen. David Richards of Britain, who said Wednesday that after just six weeks in charge of the NATO force in the south, he felt the tide was turning against the Taliban, despite having lost 28 soldiers since Aug. 1.

"People are dying," General Jones added. "Soldiers are fighting, and so 85 percent in a peaceful situation may be O.K., but in a situation involving combat, that is another matter."

Asked which of the 26 countries in the alliance were dragging their feet, General Jones hesitated and then replied, "All of them."

During the weeks leading to NATO's deployment in the south, General Jones had repeatedly warned that the alliance would face strong resistance from insurgents and drug lords. "For the first time, their power is being challenged, and they will do everything possible to intimidate the NATO forces," he said.

In the capital, the soldiers killed in the blast were part of a provincial team whose work is to provide reconstruction and assistance to local communities, building roads and schools and supplying electricity, a United States military statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0061069

The blast strewed blackened wreckage and shrapnel across the tree-lined central divide of the avenue and blew out windows in surrounding apartment buildings. The police were gathering pieces of flesh in buckets as firefighters hosed down the road and a burning vehicle.

An elderly woman sitting outside her home was hit by shrapnel in the chest and died instantly, witnesses said. A boy selling baseball caps on the street and another boy with a secondhand clothing stall were killed, said Abdul Zarif, 18, a shopkeeper. "Another stall owner was wounded and was screaming as his younger brother was also dead," he said.

A baker, Ghulam Hazrat, 40, was thrown across to the back of the bakery by the blast. "We were lost for minutes under the dust and smoke and finally we climbed out of the bakery, and I saw the smoke and flames from an American car burning, and a lot of bodies on the other side of the road," he said.

A number of those killed were city workers sweeping the streets. Many people in nearby apartments were wounded by flying glass, hospital officials said.

At the nearby hospital, Sakhi Muhammad, 35, was in tears as he found the body of his nephew, a municipal worker, and cursed the government of President Hamid Karzai. "God destroy you with your government," he shouted.

Another man, Turialai, collected the body of his newly married brother Hayatullah, 35, who had been a passer-by. Turialai telephoned someone to start preparing the funeral.

Suicide bombing was very rare in Afghanistan until last fall, when attacks suddenly escalated and spokesmen for the Taliban claimed to have trained hundreds of bombers to send in against the government of Afghanistan and its foreign allies.

As of Aug. 12, suicide bombers had killed 124 people in Afghanistan this year. Of those, 105 — 84 percent — were civilians, according to United States military figures released in a statement in Kabul last month.

Car Bomb Kills 16 Near U.S. Embassy (WT/AP)

By Paul Garwood, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- In the most brazen attack yet on Kabul's heavily guarded center, a car bomber rammed into an American Humvee outside the U.S. Embassy yesterday, killing 16 persons, including two U.S. soldiers. It was the Afghan capital's deadliest suicide attack since the 2001 toppling of the Taliban.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, took responsibility for the attack, according to the privately run Pajhwok Afghan News Agency.

The attack shattered what had been a typically peaceful Muslim day of prayer in the war-ravaged capital and revealed the lingering vulnerability of foreign troops, local forces and Afghan civilians to terrorist attacks almost five years after a pro-American government was installed. Attacks in central Kabul have been rare in comparison with areas on the edge of the city and in the country's south.

Some 20,000 NATO soldiers and a similar number of U.S. forces are trying to crush the emboldened Taliban insurgency, mainly in southern Afghanistan. Taliban holdouts have been turning to Iraqi-style tactics -- including increasing numbers of suicide bombings -- to derail the government of President Hamid Karzai.

"Today's heinous act of terrorism is against the values of Islam and humanity," Mr. Karzai said.

The attack occurred as many Afghans were commemorating the assassination of anti-Taliban commander Ahmed Shah Masood, who was killed in an al Qaeda suicide bombing two days before the September 11 attacks in the United States.

Yesterday's explosion went off at 10:20 a.m. just 150 feet from the landmark Masood Square, which leads to the main gate of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy compound. It tore a 6-foot-wide crater in the road.

A witness, Najibullah Faizi, 25, said he saw a blue Toyota Corolla driven by a young, heavyset man speed past another car in the inside lane before slamming into one of two U.S. Humvees in a convoy.

"I fell to the ground after the blast. American soldiers started shooting at another car nearby. There was smoke and flames everywhere," Mr. Faizi said.

The blast sent a plume of brown smoke spiraling hundreds of feet into the sky and tore apart one of the Humvees, blowing it onto what had been its roof and turning it into a twisted, flaming hulk of metal.

DOJ_NMG_0061070

All that remained of the bomb-packed car was its front end, which was engulfed in flames some 60 feet away from the explosion.

The blast's force shattered every window in a five-story, Soviet-era apartment block facing the scene, spraying shards of glass over children eating their breakfasts and women cleaning their cramped homes. Restaurants and businesses on the other side of the road also had windows and doors blown in.

The U.S. military initially said two other soldiers were wounded, but later revised it to one.

American and NATO troops are fighting the Taliban primarily across vast desert plains in southern Helmand and Kandahar provinces, center of the country's massive opium trade.

"The fighting is extraordinarily intense. The intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis," Brig. Gen. Ed Butler, the commander of British forces in Afghanistan, told British ITV news.

He echoed NATO commander Gen. James L. Jones' call Thursday for at least 2,000 more troops. Gen. Jones, who said the next few weeks would be decisive in the fight against militants, is in Poland pressing officials from the 26 NATO member states for more soldiers and air support.

Yesterday in Warsaw, NATO defense chiefs held their first meeting on Afghanistan since taking over military command of the south of the country, with the violence in the Muslim nation escalating rapidly.

High on the agenda at the talks in the Polish capital was the call by Gen. Jones and other NATO leaders for more troops and equipment for Afghanistan, Canadian Col. Brett Boudreau said.

"But the issue of force levels and contributions will not be an exclusive part of the discussions," he added.

New Urgency To Nato Troop Call (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee and Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Kabul on Friday suffered its worst bomb blast in recent years, as Nato continued a push for more troops for the battle against the Taliban in Afghanistan.

The two events highlighted the challenges facing the military alliance, which has to contend with both a renewed insurgency and inbuilt difficulties in the way it provides troops for its missions.

A suicide bomber rammed into a US military convoy near the US embassy in the Afghan capital, killing two US soldiers and at least 14 civilians. Another 29 people were injured.

The blast was the second deadly bombing in Kabul in the space of a week and an indication that Taliban insurgents are becoming bold enough to strike outside their traditional southern strongholds.

A British soldier was killed in a suicide bomb along with four Afghan civilians on Monday, while fighting in Ghazni province just two hours south of the capital has been fierce this month.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai condemned Friday's blast as "despicable and shocking", in words echoed by Afghan residents injured in the explosion.

The attack came as the military chiefs of Nato's 26 member states met in Warsaw to discuss an urgent request for reinforcements from Gen James Jones, Nato's top commander.

In comments made to US-based journalists on Thursday night, Gen Jones made clear that he was looking for a reserve battalion of 800-1000 soldiers, plus air support that could involve additional personnel of up to 1,500 people.

Although Gen Jones formally requested such resources before Nato began its operation against the Taliban in southern Afghanistan on July 31, he now believes they are more important than ever.

"Normally in most operations we get by with about 80 per cent, 85 per cent of what we asked for, because most of our operations are somewhat benign," he said. "But since this one has turned, in the south at any rate, for a moment, pretty hot… getting that remaining 10, 15 per cent seems like more necessary now than it was maybe a month ago."

Gen Jones' request represents one of Nato's toughest challenges yet, since the alliance has long-standing difficulties in providing speedy troop deployments, air support and forces that can be moved around with ease.

DOJ_NMG_0061071

Although Nato commanders are keen to use extra soldiers to help against the Taliban before the winter months set in, Nato usually takes considerable time to win troop commitments – and faces particular problems at a time when contributors are stretched in theatres ranging from Lebanon to Iraq.

At present, operations in the most important theatre against the Taliban – around the city of Kandahar - have been bolstered by short-term reinforcements from the Dutch and the US.

Gen Jones also called for a squadron of attack helicopters and "two or three" C-130 aircraft, the latest in a series of requests for more air support in Afghanistan. For years, alliance commanders have been hamstrung by the lack of available aircraft and at present the US is providing air support for many of the operations in the south.

Gen Jones' call for a flexible reserve battalion could also be difficult to meet. At the moment, national caveats restrict many Nato troops from moving around at will and taking on a fully fledged combat role.

Lethal Blast Near Embassy Stokes Afghan Security Fears (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — A suicide bomb attack Friday on a convoy of American Humvees near the fortified U.S. Embassy, which took about 16 lives, including two soldiers', has raised fears here about a growing ability of anti-government extremists to strike with apparent impunity, even in the capital.

Among those killed in the deadliest suicide bombing in Kabul since the Taliban fell in 2001 were six municipal street sweepers, who were finishing their morning cleaning of the neighborhood, and two young boys who sold water. As many as 20 children were hit by shattered glass as they played on narrow swaths of grass in front of an apartment complex or ate breakfast, said a doctor who treated them on the scene.

Local police said 14 civilians were killed, but hospitals registered fewer.

The bombing attack was one of four Friday in South Asia that killed civilians and underscored the continuing devastation caused by political unrest. The other blasts killed at least 29 people in India, five in Pakistan and two in Sri Lanka.

Kabul's suicide bombing came a day before the fifth anniversary of the assassination of anti-Taliban leader Ahmed Shah Massoud, and it came just after Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf had visited Kabul and promised to try to stem the flow of militant fighters from his country into Afghanistan.

For Afghans, the bombing signaled an encroaching threat from extremists, who had been largely confined to Afghanistan's border with Pakistan.

People in the neighborhood and across the capital blamed the incident on the Musharraf government, which they said had allowed the Taliban to take refuge, train and rearm in Pakistan. But they said the United States was responsible too because it has influence with Musharraf yet has failed to compel him to halt support for Taliban guerrillas or prevent their crossing into Afghanistan.

"We really are not happy about our neighbors, and Americans can put more pressure on Pakistan," said former Afghan army Col. Habeeb Chopan, 43, who lives in the nearby apartment complex. "America has chosen the wrong politics in Afghanistan."

For Abdul Majid, 35, who wept silently Friday evening in his hospital bed, the attack was a horror of loss. The municipal supervisor for the area, he is paid $66 a month and was checking on his workers when the bomber hit.

"This place was always safe. There were many soldiers nearby, but now six of my staff were killed; three were injured," he said, struggling to sip some water without moving his shrapnel-lacerated legs and left arm.

"They were such poor people; they had so little, and I don't know now what will happen to their families — how will they survive?" he said.

Sher Mohammed Karimi, a deputy chief of staff for the Afghan Ministry of Defense, said the bomb was exceptionally large and a kind seen more often in the south. A suicide bombing Aug. 28 in the southern city of Lashkar Gah killed 17 and injured more than 40.

DOJ_NMG_0061072

U.S. officials portrayed Friday's blast as an expected outcome of weeks of hard fighting in the south between the Taliban and NATO forces.

"I think we have a war going on. I wouldn't make too much of one attack or another in Kabul," U.S. Ambassador Ronald E. Neumann said in comments broadcast on National Public Radio. "There is an attempt to give the appearance of more violence.

"I don't detect a strong groundswell of support for the Taliban," Neumann said. "It's a tough fight. We need more money. We're going to have to stay at it for a while. We are either going to abandon it to chaos or we're going to go forward and win, but you don't have any nice third choice."

North Atlantic Treaty Organization defense chiefs appeared to agree that more forces were needed to fight the Taliban. As a three-day meeting began in Warsaw, a spokesman for NATO's military committee, Canadian Col. Brett Boudreau, said the alliance was looking for about 2,000 more troops as well as equipment to help the alliance fight an increasingly fierce insurgency.

Before Friday's bombing, the military "had information about the possibility of an attack," acknowledged a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, U.S. Army Maj. Luke Knittig. "And this kind of information has helped us stop attacks in the past.

"But today we didn't have enough."

He said the Taliban were "showing a willingness to lash out" because of "the pressure we're putting them under."

"Today they targeted the international military — in some respects it's not unexpected. As long as we have them under pressure in the south … it would be likely the insurgents would try to test us in the capital," he said.

Still, Knittig said, "obviously today was pretty strong stuff."

The suicide bomber rammed his car into one of two Humvees traveling together about 600 feet from an entrance to the U.S. Embassy, close to a roundabout known as Massoud Circle.

The blast was so strong that it left only the burning metal skeleton of the vehicle and a crater 6 feet wide. Twisted metal hung in nearby trees; tatters of U.S. military uniforms and a charred pakol, a traditional Afghan hat, were among bits of clothing scattered around the bomb site.

Shrapnel shot out in all directions, killing a woman outside a Soviet-era apartment complex where all of the windows were blown out by the blast. The sidewalk was covered with broken glass.

Some of the bodies were so damaged that relatives had difficulty identifying them, said Moussa Zayer, 28, nursing director of Wazir Akbar Khan Hospital, which has a partnership with Loma Linda University Medical Center and gives free medicine to patients.

Zayer, who was on duty when the victims began to pour in, said most of the injured had shrapnel-shattered bones and severe cuts from flying glass.

"There were two boys, their faces were cut off; they were unrecognizable," he said. "Another boy, maybe 12 years old, was hurt in the spine. I think he will not walk again."

Local residents said the bomb would have been far more deadly if it had come on a weekday — Friday is Islam's holy day, and far fewer people are on the street.

The Ministry of Health is almost next door to the U.S. Embassy, and on a weekday, hundreds of workers would have been coming and going.

Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 16 People Near U.S. Embassy In Kabul (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan - A suicide bomber detonated an explosives-packed car Friday next to a U.S. military convoy, killing at least 16 people, including two American soldiers, just yards from the fortified entrance of the U.S. Embassy in central Kabul.

The attack, the bloodiest in the Afghan capital since American troops and their Afghan allies toppled the hard-line Taliban regime in 2001, came as more than 40,000 U.S. and NATO-led forces struggle to contain a resurgence of the Taliban and their al Qaida allies in Afghanistan's southern and eastern provinces.

DOJ_NMG_0061073

At least 76 American and 73 NATO troops have died so far this year in Afghanistan. NATO officials, who took over command of the Afghanistan campaign from the United States last month, have admitted surprise at the intensity of the fighting. On Thursday, NATO'S commander, Gen. James L. Jones, called for another 2,000 to 2,500 NATO troops.

Intelligence officials told McClatchy Newspapers earlier this year that much of the violence in Afghanistan has come from tactics - such as car bombings, suicide attacks and homemade bombs - that were brought to Afghanistan by militants trained in their use in Iraq. Many of those militants had volunteered to remain in Iraq, but their trainers told them to return to Afghanistan and Pakistan to train others, the officials said.

Friday's bombing occurred three days before the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States. But several Western and American officials said it wasn't certain that the bombing was timed to coincide with it.

"I don't think it is linked," said Col. Tom Collins, a U.S. military spokesman. "The timing is what it is."

The bombing may have been staged to coincide with the fifth anniversary Saturday of the assassination of a fabled guerrilla leader and Taliban opponent, Ahmad Shah Massoud, who was killed by suspected al-Qaida operatives posing as television journalists. The day is commemorated as a national holiday.

The traffic circle near where Friday's bombing occurred is named for Massoud, whose northern alliance swept the Taliban from power with the aid of American special forces and air power.

"Today's heinous act of terrorism is against the values of Islam and humanity," President Hamid Karzai declared.

The car bomber detonated his explosives around 10:30 a.m. next to a Humvee in a convoy of three U.S. military vehicles that was driving on one of several broad boulevards that lead from the circle.

"There was a huge blast and there was fire and smoke," said Nasir Nasrat, 13, who was flying a kite from the roof of an apartment building that overlooks the site. "I ran downstairs and I saw the upper half of a boy's body hanging from a tree. There was a woman missing an arm and a leg."

Police said that at least 16 people were killed, including two U.S. soldiers in the Humvee. Two other American soldiers were injured, Collins said. News reports said dozens of Afghans were injured.

The blast was about 200 yards from the heavily protected entrance to the U.S. Embassy in the city's upscale Wazir Akbar Khan area.

The circle, which features a monument bearing Massoud's portrait and a column topped by a pair of hands nestling the globe, sits on the main road linking Kabul airport and the massive U.S. Embassy compound.

"It's a very popular route with the U.S. military," said an official of the 20,000-strong NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, who requested anonymity because the issue is politically sensitive.

A roadside bomb wounded four Italian ISAF soldiers Friday in western Farah province, the ISAF announced.

The worst of the fighting has been in the southern provinces of Kandahar and Helmand. The ISAF launched an offensive launched Saturday to drive the Taliban from the main highway in the Panjwayi district, west of the city of Kandahar.

It was unclear Friday whether NATO's 26 member countries would commit more troops to Afghanistan. Military officials from those countries met in Poland to discuss the fighting but no agreement on sending reinforcements was announced. The meeting is to conclude Saturday.

Commander Has Hard Sell On Afghan Troops (AP-Y)

By Monika Scislowska

AP, September 9, 2006

Calls by NATO's top commander for 2,000 more troops in Afghanistan could be running up against donor fatigue from key members of the alliance.

The NATO campaign has been draining: In one of the world's harshest environments, it has failed to ensnare top al-Qaida leaders and the insurgency is at its fiercest since the fall of the Taliban — raising the specter of an Iraq-style quagmire.

Many NATO nations have already committed thousands of troops to Lebanon, making sending more soldiers into harm's way a hard sell in countries large and small.

DOJ_NMG_0061074

"There is a general lack of combat-able, high-quality troops that can be dispatched at relatively short notice, and a lot of countries are under pressure," said Kristian Soeby Kristensen, an analyst at the Danish Institute for International Studies in Copenhagen.

"In Denmark, we are giving it all we've got now," he said. "We have no more troops ... and I would suppose that the same is true for other allied countries."

NATO military chiefs met in Poland on Friday for their first face-to-face discussions of the deadly fighting in southern Afghanistan, where NATO relieved U.S.-led troops a month ago.

On Thursday, alliance commander Gen. James L. Jones called for between 2,000 and 2,500 more troops as well as extra aircraft to confront the resurgent Taliban guerrillas.

NATO spokesman Col. Brett Boudreau said after the first day of the closed-door meeting in Warsaw that there was "broad agreement" on the need for reinforcements.

"I am not at liberty to say what has been agreed or brought back to capitals, but certainly there is broad agreement that this form of requirement needs to be filled," he said. The meeting ends Saturday.

Jones said the extra troops are part of military planning already agreed on within the alliance.

However, there is no indication which of NATO's 26 nations will step deeper into a military situation with grim parallels to Iraq.

Some 20,000 NATO soldiers and a similar number of U.S. forces now face an emboldened Taliban insurgency.

Jones is seeking reinforcements for the 8,000 mainly British, Canadian and Dutch troops, who took over southern Afghanistan in August. Since then, at least 35 NATO troops have died as well as hundreds of militants.

Jones said the extra military muscle would allow allied forces to destroy the insurgents.

He also dismissed comparisons with Iraq as "a cheap shot."

"We are talking about something which is very manageable militarily. I'm optimistic that Afghanistan is and will be a success story," he said.

However, U.S. and NATO commanders have repeatedly underestimated the ability of the Taliban to regroup after heavy losses, and there are signs that militants in Afghanistan are adopting tactics used in Iraq.

On Friday, the Afghan capital suffered its worst suicide attack since U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban regime in late 2001. Sixteen people died, including two U.S. soldiers, when the driver of a car packed with explosives rammed an American Humvee near the U.S. Embassy in Kabul.

Suicide attacks have become increasingly common in Afghanistan, and a Taliban commander claimed last week to have lined up hundreds of volunteers for such missions.

U.S. officials have confirmed that militants are using more and more sophisticated roadside bombs to target Afghan and foreign troops.

"The fighting is extraordinarily intense. The intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis," the commander of British forces in Afghanistan, Brig. Ed Butler, told British ITV news.

Against that background, some nations are reluctant to send more troops into the firing line.

Boudreau said NATO generals with troops in Afghanistan agreed Friday to "reduce to a minimum" the restrictions on how their forces are used.

Germany, for instance, is loath to reallocate any of its 2,800 troops deployed mostly in the relatively peaceful north of Afghanistan, to the south.

Also Friday, Turkey's top military commander said his country would not be contributing any combat troops to Afghanistan. Turkey, which has taken its turn at commanding the NATO force, currently has some 900 military personnel there helping with reconstruction.

Karzai On The Bombing: "The Enemy Is Not Eliminated" (TIME)

By Aryn Baker

Time, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061075

The ferocity of the battle for control of Afghanistan, which has raged across the south of the country for weeks, was felt Friday in the capital. A massive suicide car-bombing in Kabul killed two Americans and at least 16 Afghans, and rocked the floor of the presidential palace a mile away, where President Karzai was sitting down for an interview with TIME.

Windows rattled across the city Friday morning as a suicide car-bomber rammed a U.S. convoy patrolling near the U.S. embassy in the city center. It was the second suicide attack in a week, following on Monday's bombing near the airport that killed five people. And it came at the end of a week of fierce clashes in the south; the strength of Taliban resistance has surprised NATO commanders, who on Thursday called on member-states to send a further 2,000 troops to reinforce its counterinsurgency mission in the Taliban's heartland.

President Karzai, struggling to maintain his composure in the minutes following the blast, condemned the attack and lamented the loss of life, but adamantly rejected any suggestion that the security situation in Afghanistan was deteriorating.

"Look, we have enemies," Karzai said. "The same enemies that blew up themselves in London, the same enemies that blew up the train in Madrid or the train in Bombay or the twin towers in America are still around. Before September 11 they were the government in Afghanistan. Today they are on the run and hiding and they come out from their hiding and try to hurt us when they can manage it."

Hurt Afghans they certainly did. Witnesses at the blast site described a mangled Humvee, a bomb crater about four feet deep, scattered body parts, and most chillingly, a bra tangled in tree branches above the vehicle, where it was hurled by the strength of the explosion. Although coalition forces were the immediate target, the size and range of the blast at a busy intersection suggests that the civilian casualties were intentional. Massoud Circle, where the attack occurred, is located near an apartment complex housing thousands of families, where many windows were shattered.

If Karzai's enemies are, indeed, on the run, events over the past week suggest they are far from being defeated. Besides the two suicide attacks in the capital and insurgent attacks scattered throughout the south and west, Taliban forces have mounted a surprisingly strong resistance to an ongoing NATO operation near Kandahar in which both sides have suffered substantial casualties. The bombings in the capital "looks to be the insurgents lashing out against us for the pressure we are putting on them in the south," says Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force. "Conventional warfare is taking its toll down there, and they know the importance of the capital."

With NATO still finding its feet just a month after taking control of the south from U.S. forces, the Taliban appears determined to do its utmost to test the appetite of the Western alliance for a sustained and messy counterinsurgency campaign. But Knittig insists that the alliance will not be swayed. "NATO has signed on the line for a long-term commitment to Afghanistan."

The Alliance will need to sustain that outlook if plans for rebuilding a viable Afghan society free of the Taliban are to be realized. "We will have [attacks of this kind] for a long time," warns Karzai. "The enemy is defeated, but it is not eliminated. The elimination part is what we should continue to work on. And that needs patience. That needs perseverance and that needs hard work."

Source: Mullah Omar In Pakistan (CNN)

By Peter Bergen, Anderson Cooper

CNN, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) -- The one-eyed Taliban leader Mullah Omar, who heads the religious militia fighting U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan, is living in Pakistan, though not in the same area where al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden is thought to be, according to a U.S. intelligence source.

The elusive Taliban leader is believed to be in Quetta or its environs, a city of one million that is the capital of Baluchistan province in southwestern Pakistan.

The intelligence source said of Mullah Omar's location: "At one point we had it down to a particular section of Quetta."

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf did not address specifically the question on his visit to Kabul Thursday, but said "Please do understand the Pakistan government (is not) behind anything that is happening in Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0061076

The last known location for Mullah Omar was in the southern Afghan city of Kandahar, which he fled in December 2001 as U.S. forces closed in on the city. The U.S. government is now offering a reward of up to $10 million for information leading to his capture.

The intelligence source says that Mullah Omar continues to supply "high level guidance" to his movement of religious warriors, although he is not involved in the day-to-day operations of the movement, a role that is largely played by military commander Mullah Dadullah.Specific location

U.S. officials have been saying for some time that another of the world's most wanted men -- Mullah Omar's close friend and advisor, bin Laden -- is believed to be in the Pakistan-Afghanistan border area, and the intelligence source who spoke of Mullah Omar offered a specific location for bin Laden, as well.

The source said that bin Laden is likely in Bajuar, a sparsely populated remote tribal region on the northern Afghan-Pakistan border, bordering Chitral. That is a region that a U.S. military intelligence official has identified to CNN in the past as a strong possibility for the location of al Qaeda's leader.

Meanwhile, NATO's top military commander, U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, has called on the 26 member nations to provide more troops for Afghanistan, which is facing its deadliest spate of violence since the Taliban regime was ousted in late 2001.

A huge suicide car bomb struck a convoy of U.S. military vehicles Friday in the Afghan capital, killing at least 18 people, officials and witnesses said. (Full story)

Major Reported She Had Been Kidnapped (AP)

By Leila Saralayeva, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

A U.S. Air Force officer who disappeared earlier this week in Kyrgyzstan was found alive late Friday, reportedly telling people who helped her that she had been kidnapped, officials said.

Maj. Jill Metzger, 33, was located by Kyrgyz law enforcement agents who informed authorities at the U.S. air base at the airport in Bishkek, the Central Asian nation's capital, base spokeswoman Capt. Anna Carpenter said.

Kyrgyz Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev said Metzger, 33, knocked on the door of a house on the outskirts of the capital shortly before midnight and told its residents that she had been kidnapped.

Metzger said she had been abducted by three young men and a woman in a minibus and held in a rural area 30 miles from Bishkek, Suvanaliyev told The Associated Press Saturday. He cited local police in Kant, where he said she approached the first house she came to. He said she looked exhausted and her hair was dyed.

That account differed somewhat from one given by Metzger's father-in-law, Kelly Mayo, who said in a telephone interview with the AP from Colorado Springs, Colo., that Metzger was found on the side of the road with her head shaved.

"I know she's coherent, and whoever had her let her go," he said, adding that she had been beaten. "We've got her back. Praise the Lord."

Suvanaliyev said the people who took Metzger in when she knocked on their door called the police.

Mayo said the Air Force's Office of Special Investigations notified the family Friday afternoon but were given few details. He said his son, Air Force Capt. Joshua Mayo, was elated after being told about his wife.

"I can't even describe it. He's just beside himself, just unbelievable joy," Mayo said, adding the family was waiting for her to call.

There was no immediately U.S. comment on the kidnapping report. Carpenter declined to discuss Metzger's condition, which a U.S. military statement said will be determined by a medical team.

"We are elated to have Jill back with us," a U.S. military statement quoted the base commander, Col. Scott Reese, as saying.

Kyrgyz authorities notified base officials at 1:15 a.m. local time Saturday of the news, the statement said.

Metzger, a former resident of Henderson, N.C., was serving a four-month stint at the base with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing. Her normal duty station is Moody Air Force Base in Georgia as a member of the 347th Mission Support Squadron. She had been scheduled to land back at her U.S. base Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0061077

The U.S. military has maintained an air base at Kyrgyzstan's main civilian airport since 2001, backing operations in nearby Afghanistan.

Military officials said the newlywed Metzger, dressed in blue jeans and a sweater, vanished during a shopping trip to a tourist hotspot in Bishkek, where she was searching for souvenirs to bring home to her family. The so-called "cultural tours" are common for off-duty personnel.

Her disappearance had baffled investigators. The military had 22 special agents looking for Metzger.

The shopping center where Metzger disappeared, located about 35 miles from the base, is not a particularly dangerous area, said Col. Kevin Jacobson of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations.

Still, the military had instituted a new policy barring all off-duty personnel from leaving the base until Metzger was found. It was unclear late Friday whether that policy had changed.

Interior Ministry spokesman Nurdin Jangarayev told the AP on Thursday that Metzger and another U.S. servicewoman were recorded on a security camera Tuesday afternoon as they entered TsUM, Bishkek's main department store.

She separated from her companion three minutes later, Jangarayev said. Over the next three hours, two calls were placed to her cellular phone but neither was answered, he said.

Before her disappearance, Metzger had been scheduled to head to Dayton, Ohio, for the annual United States Air Force Marathon. She has twice won the women's division of the event.

A week later, she was to travel with her husband to Jamaica for a belated 10-day honeymoon.

"Jill is a consummate happy-go-lucky person," her father-in-law said. "She doesn't see any kind of evil in the world. She's a wonderful, innocent person, and she would never think anyone would try and harm her."

Associated Press Writers Mike Baker in Raleigh, North Carolina, and Steve Gutterman in Moscow contributed to this report.

Air Force Officer Who Vanished In Kyrgyzstan Is Found Alive (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan, Saturday, Sept. 9 — A United States Air Force officer who disappeared earlier this week in Kyrgyzstan said she had been kidnapped, a senior Kyrgyz security official said Saturday.

Maj. Jill Metzger, 33, who vanished on Tuesday, knocked on the door of a house in a town outside Bishkek, the capital, early Saturday morning and told residents she had been abducted, Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev said.

Major Metzger said that she had been seized by three young men and a woman in a minibus and held in a rural area 30 miles from the capital, Mr. Suvanaliyev said.

A spokeswoman for the United States base at Bishkek's airport, Capt. Anna Carpenter, said earlier Saturday that Major Metzger, who had vanished during a shopping excursion, had been located but declined to comment on her condition, which an American military statement said would be determined by a medical team.

"We are elated to have Jill back with us," the statement quoted the base commander, Col. Scott Reese, as saying.

Her father-in-law, Kelly Mayo, said in a telephone interview from Colorado Springs, Colo., that the Air Force's Office of Special Investigations had notified the family, but few details were available. He said his son, Air Force Capt. Joshua Mayo, was overjoyed at the news.

"He's just beside himself, just unbelievable joy," Mr. Mayo said.

Major Metzger, a former resident of Henderson, N.C., was serving a four-month stint at the base with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing. Her normal duty station is Moody Air Force Base in Georgia as a member of the 347th Mission Support Squadron. She had been scheduled to land back at her base on Friday.

Military officials said Major Metzger, who recently married and was dressed in jeans and a sweater, vanished during a shopping trip in Bishkek, where she was searching for souvenirs for her family.

Such outings are common for off-duty personnel. Her disappearance had baffled investigators.

The military had 20 special agents looking for Major Metzger.

DOJ_NMG_0061078

The American military has maintained an air base at Kyrgyzstan's main civilian airport since 2001, to support operations in nearby Afghanistan. The shopping center where Major Metzger disappeared, about 35 miles from the base, is not a particularly dangerous area, said Col. Kevin Jacobson of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations.

Still, the military had instituted a new policy barring all off-duty personnel from leaving the base until Major Metzger was found. It was unclear late on Friday whether that policy had changed.

Before her disappearance, Major Metzger had been scheduled to head to Dayton, Ohio, for the annual United States Air Force Marathon. She has twice won the women's division of the event.

A week later, she was to travel with her husband to Jamaica for a belated 10-day honeymoon.

Army On Pace To Meet Year's Recruiting Goal (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The Army will meet its goal of recruiting 80,000 new active-duty soldiers this fiscal year but will fall short in the percentage of high school graduates as the education level of enlistees dips below the norm of the past decade, according to senior Pentagon officials.

The Army's apparent success in meeting the U.S. military's biggest recruiting mission marks a significant rebound from last year, when the Iraq war, low unemployment and a shortage of recruiters contributed to the service's failure to make its active-duty target for the first time since 1999.

Pentagon officials attributed the gains primarily to a beefed-up active-duty recruiting force, which grew from 5,100 at the beginning of 2005 to 6,600 this year. "The most fundamental reason for success was the increase in recruiters in the field," said Curtis L. Gilroy, director of accession policy at the Pentagon.

In addition, Congress authorized a doubling of the maximum enlistment bonus from $20,000 to $40,000. It also instituted special recruiting incentives, such as extra pay of up to $500 a month for recruiters who exceed their goals and a $1,000 bonus for soldiers for each person they refer to recruiters who completes boot camp.

The influx of new soldiers bodes well for the all-volunteer military engaged in its first sustained combat, boosting the Army's active-duty manpower by roughly 10,000 troops at a time when the nation's main ground force is bearing the brunt of the fighting and casualties in Iraq.

"We all know if we don't get recruiting right, the rest doesn't matter too much," Gilroy said.

By the end of August, the Army had recruited nearly 73,000 soldiers -- or 104 percent of the fiscal year-to-date goal for active duty -- chalking up an unusually high summer target of more than 10,000 recruits a month.

"I fully expect we will make our 80,000 mission for the fiscal year," Maj. Gen. Sean J. Byrne, director of Army personnel, told reporters. "I am more than satisfied with the quality of the soldiers," he added.

But though the number of Army recruits has grown this year, the number of those meeting key Pentagon standards has declined compared with the past several years.

For example, the proportion of recruits holding a high school diploma was 81.2 percent as of August, falling below the Pentagon benchmark of 90 percent for the second year in a row. The last time the Army fell to such a low level of high school graduates was in 1981, when it dropped to 80 percent.

As of August, about 61 percent of the Army recruits scored above the 50th percentile on the Armed Forces Qualification Test -- the lowest percentage since 1985 but still above the Pentagon's benchmark of 60 percent. About 3.7 percent of enlistees had the lowest acceptable scores, slightly below last year's figure of 4 percent but well above the average for the past decade.

In addition, the number of soldiers granted waivers for medical conditions, drug or alcohol problems, or misdemeanors has gradually increased, from 10 percent in 2001 to 15 percent last year, with this year's figure expected to be slightly higher, according to Byrne and Army data. "The Army understands that some people make mistakes in their lives" and should be afforded an opportunity to serve their country, Byrne said.

DOJ_NMG_0061079

Still, Pentagon officials said they were not overly concerned about the measures, in part because they do not reflect the newly implemented tests of motivation and fitness designed to glean from the pool of less qualified soldiers those who are likely to perform well.

This year, for example, the Pentagon implemented military-wide a program designed at Walter Reed Army Medical Center to test the fitness of potential recruits who are in good condition but are heavier than average, such as football players. About 1,000 Army recruits this year were granted waivers after they passed the test of 15 minutes of step climbing and 15 push-ups, Gilroy said.

An additional 5,000 Army recruits who lacked high school diplomas but had GEDs received waivers this year after they passed a new screening test for motivation and dependability, which research has shown to correlate with staying in the Army.

Overall, only about 25 percent of American 17-to-24-year-olds -- 4.6 million -- are qualified to join the military. The rest have crime, drug and medical problems that exclude them, such as the 25 percent who are obese, Gilroy said.

Meeting next year's active-duty recruiting target of 80,000 will remain a major challenge for the Army, which will start the year with a pool of only about 14 percent of recruits who have signed contracts but not entered boot camp -- compared with the goal of 25 to 35 percent.

"The recruiting environment is very tough, very difficult," Byrne said, because of the economy, low unemployment and "the obvious fact that we're a nation at war."

Army Touts Recruiting Turnaround (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 9, 2006

The Army says its success in enlisting new soldiers this year, after a dismal 2005, is innovative salesmanship by a bigger team of recruiters and financial incentives like bonuses of up to $40,000.

The Pentagon announced Friday that the Army met its recruiting goal for August, which a senior Army official said makes it virtually certain that the service will achieve its aim of signing up 80,000 new soldiers for the full recruiting year, which ends Sept. 30. Last year the Army fell short for the first time since 1999.

"We're reaching out a lot better," said the official, Maj. Gen. Sean Byrne, director of military personnel management. The Army is making better use of the Internet, for example, to reach more young people, he said.

The Army also has put about one-third more recruiters on the street, and Congress approved new financial incentives for enlistees, including signing bonuses for some slots of as much as $40,000. The Army also began allowing people as old as 42 to enter the service; the maximum age previously was 35.

Through August, the active-duty Army had signed up 72,997 new soldiers, nearly 3,000 above its year-to-date target. The Army National Guard was about 200 below its target of 63,240, while the Army Reserve, which had a particularly weak performance in August, was almost 2,000 below its year-to-date target of 33,124.

For August alone, the active Army topped the 10,000 mark for the second month in a row. It was the 15th consecutive month the active Army has met or exceeded its monthly goal. It missed four months in a row in early 2005, and some questioned whether the Army had developed a chronic and debilitating problem.

The Marine Corps, Air Force and Navy all achieved their August goals and are on target to meet their full-year targets, the Pentagon said.

Summer is typically the strongest recruiting season.

The Army's ability to recruit is particularly important now because it is trying to grow in size, as part of a plan to build a larger number of combat brigades for use in Iraq, Afghanistan and potentially elsewhere. Without that growth, existing brigades would be rotating so often on overseas combat tours that the Army would risk alienating soldiers and their families, thus eroding their willingness to re-enlist.

Even now, after increasing the active-duty Army by about 10,000 soldiers this year, to about 501,000, soldiers generally get less than two years at home between one-year tours in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0061080

Byrne said the Iraq war continues to be a drag on recruiting, and he said unpublished Army research surveys show people of enlistment age are increasingly disinclined to join. Similarly, adults who influence the choices of potential recruits — like parents, teachers and coaches — are less inclined to recommend military service.

But the Army has managed to overcome those negative factors by using more innovative techniques to reach young people, Byrne said. Recruiters, for example, are available at all hours on an Army Web site chat room. Those who indicate a strong interest are then offered a chance to meet face-to-face with a recruiter. That has proven more productive, Byrne said, than traditional tactics like waiting for people to walk into a recruiting station.

The Army also has accepted a larger number of recruits whose score on a standardized aptitude test is at the lower end of the acceptable range, and it has granted waivers to permit the enlistment of people with criminal records that otherwise would disqualify them. The Army says it does not grant waivers if there is a pattern of criminal misconduct or for convictions of drug trafficking or any sexually violent crimes.

Ex-Congress Aide Accused In Spy Case Is Free On Bail (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A former journalist and Congressional aide accused of working with Iraqi intelligence before the war was released from prison yesterday after a federal judge ruled that she could not be forced to take antipsychotic medication in an effort to make her competent to stand trial.

The judge, Michael Mukasey of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was not convinced that even if she took the medication, the defendant, Susan P. Lindauer, 43, would improve enough to be capable of standing trial.

Judge Mukasey also criticized the strength of the government's case, saying that the legal standard for forcibly administering medication requires a strong government interest in prosecution, and that the government has not been able to establish that standard in this case. The ruling was a setback for the government's case against Ms. Lindauer, who was arrested in March 2004 at her home in Takoma Park, Md. An indictment charged that Ms. Lindauer, also known as Symbol Susan, conspired to act as an unregistered agent of the government of Iraq from October 1999 until February 2004, and engaged in illegal financial transactions.

Although he was reluctant to analyze the government's case before trial, the judge said, "There is no indication that Lindauer ever came close to influencing anyone, or could have." The indictment, he said, describes an attempt to influence an unnamed government official as unsuccessful.

Investigators said she had tried to influence American policy by presenting herself as an agent of Saddam Hussein's government in early 2003 to Andrew H. Card Jr., then the White House chief of staff, who was described as a distant relative.

Judge Mukasey said that for Ms. Lindauer to succeed as an agent of the Iraqi government, she would have had to influence other people. But her mental condition makes that highly unlikely, he said.

"The record shows that even lay people recognize that she is seriously disturbed," Judge Mukasey said in a 35-page ruling issued on Wednesday. He said that a neighbor had suspected her of being mildly schizophrenic.

Prosecutors said she met with Iraqi intelligence officers at places in Baghdad, including Al Rashid Hotel, in 2002, where she accepted $5,000 in cash.

Ms. Lindauer told a television reporter after her arrest that she was innocent, and that she was an antiwar activist.

Ms. Lindauer worked as a journalist in Washington and in the press offices of several liberal Democrats in the House and Senate, although her last such job was in 2002.

At least a half dozen doctors for both the defense and the prosecution have found that Ms. Lindauer suffers from delusions of grandeur and paranoia, which makes her incompetent to stand trial, the judge said. But she refuses to accept the diagnosis or to take medication, he said. One doctor found that Ms. Lindauer had a history of psychotic episodes going back to her childhood, possibly at the age of 7, the judge said. These include her contention that she had gifts of prophecy that allowed her to report 11 bombings before they happened, that she spoke with divine inspiration and that she was an angel.

DOJ_NMG_0061081

Among her paranoid delusions, doctors said, were the notion that she was being watched by hidden cameras in her apartment, that the Egyptian government had tried to assassinate her and that men next door had videotaped her under instructions from President Bill Clinton.

At a hearing before Judge Mukasey yesterday, prosecutors offered a backup plan, asking the judge to order Ms. Lindauer to either voluntarily take antipsychotic drugs for 30 days or be held in contempt. Contempt charges could be punished with jail time.

Judge Mukasey declined to rule on the prosecutor's suggestion, saying that the case was being assigned to another judge and that he would leave that decision to her.

Meanwhile, he ordered Ms. Lindauer to be released under previously determined terms, including on bail of $500,000, on the condition that she receive psychological counseling and that her travel be restricted.

Her lawyer, Sanford Talkin, said she was released from the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan, where she has been held for the last few weeks.

Before that, she was in a federal prison hospital in Carswell, Tex. He said she would now return to her home in Maryland.

"She can't go to trial until she's competent," Mr. Talkin said. "I think it was a difficult decision, but I think it was the right decision, and I think it was a just decision."

Ms. Lindauer is a 1985 graduate of Smith College, where she majored in economics, and she received a master's degree from the London School of Economics.

Her father, John Lindauer, was the Republican nominee for governor of Alaska in 1998.

Judge Mukasey also expressed humanitarian concerns about forcing Ms. Lindauer to take medication, which, he said, "necessarily involves physically restraining defendant so that she can be injected with mind-altering drugs."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Stock Options Probe Expands (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - As shareholders are finding out how costly the stock-options backdating scandal might be, a widening cast of characters is being targeted.

In the latest development Friday, Broadcom Corp., a supplier of chips used in communications devices, said it may need to boost a charge it takes to $1.5 billion or more for stock-option accounting flaws -- double what it estimated in July.

Government officials said this week they want to know what roles corporate directors as well as outside attorneys, auditors and compensation consultants might have played in helping executives manipulate the timing of option grants to enrich themselves and their colleagues.

More than 100 public companies, many of them in the technology sector, are under scrutiny by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible rigging of stock-option grants to boost their value to the recipients. The Justice Department is investigating scores of companies for possible criminal violations.

California-based Broadcom, for example, uncovered grants awarded between June 2000 and 2002 in which the measurement dates differed from grant dates.

And the Internal Revenue Service is looking at possible tax-law violations in option grants by some companies.

Congress weighed in this week with hearings on the issue by two Senate panels. The chairman of one of them, the Senate Finance Committee, wants to learn more about the supporting players and is digging deep.

"It's hard to believe ... that the executives did this all by themselves," Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said at a hearing Wednesday. "And to be honest, the idea that all executives at different companies came up with this idea at the same time stretches the imagination."

Grassley said he planned to write to "several major corporations" that have engaged in backdating of stock options, asking them to provide the minutes of board meetings in which directors discussed the matter as well as documents from attorneys, accountants and consultants who assisted.

DOJ_NMG_0061082

In backdating, options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, a practice that can fatten profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices. Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed to investors and properly approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can run afoul of federal accounting and tax laws.

"We need to understand and bring enforcement action against all the actors who were involved with this abusive scandal," Grassley said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who testified at the same hearing, said the Justice Department "would have no difficulty bringing cases against accountants and attorneys" if the prosecutors can meet the relatively high burden of proof of criminal intent.

At the same time, though, he said he views the role of outside actors as "less significant" than in other financial scandals of recent years -- which he termed far more complex than options dating and involving a multitude of players both inside and outside companies.

As a government law-enforcement official, McNulty was being "appropriately cautious" in his public comments, said Michael Koenig, a former federal prosecutor who now is in private law practice at Dewey Ballantine in Washington. If outside players are found to have actively participated in illegal options timing schemes, Koenig said, "They will get charged; they will get prosecuted."

For attorney Darren Robbins, complicity by directors and outside parties is a given: His firm is targeting a number of them in its lawsuits against dozens of companies over the timing of options grants to executives, brought on behalf of big pension funds in the United States, Europe and Australia.

His mission is to ensure "that the net is cast wide enough to include all of those who formulated or perpetrated the wrongdoing," said Robbins, a partner in San Diego-based Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, a high-profile law firm specializing in class-action suits against public companies.

He said he doesn't expect companies to voluntarily provide the relevant documents to Grassley, so the finance panel chairman may have to threaten issuing subpoenas.

In related developments this week:

• Comverse Technology Inc., a maker of voicemail software whose option awards are under investigation, said Tuesday that it has requested more time from the Nasdaq Stock Market to file its restated finance statements to avoid having its stock stripped from trading. Federal authorities charged last month that three former top executives of Comverse hatched a scheme to secretly manipulate options for profit.

• The Home Depot Inc. disclosed Wednesday that federal prosecutors in Manhattan have asked for information from the nation's largest home-improvement store chain in connection with an inquiry into stock options. Atlanta-based Home Depot said in June that the SEC had begun an examination after the company disclosed it had found $10 million in unrecorded stock-option expenses.

• Sharper Image Corp. said Thursday that it needed more time to finalize its second-quarter results so its recently reorganized board can determine if past employee options were properly recorded, creating a potential distraction as the specialty merchant struggles to snap out of a deep sales funk.

• Casual clothier Gap Inc. reported Thursday that an internal review of its stock-option practices found errors related to the dating of certain grants, resulting in unrecorded expenses of around $5 million.

Broadcom Problem Grows (MERCN)

By Mark Schwanhausser

The San Jose Mercury News, September 9, 2006

Broadcom warned investors Friday that its internal review of misdated stock options had uncovered deeper problems that will force it to recognize at least $1.5 billion in expenses -- double the Irvine company's original estimate in July.

DOJ_NMG_0061083

Meanwhile, a Silicon Valley company said its internal investigation had come to the opposite conclusion: Linear Technology found ``no evidence of fraud or misconduct of any kind." Still, the Milpitas chip maker apparently became the first valley company to disclose that the Internal Revenue Service is looking into possible option abuses.

So far, about 120 U.S. companies face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews, with about one-fourth of them based in Silicon Valley. Many of those have warned they will need to restate past financial reports because option abuses led them to overstate their profits.

Broadcom stands apart, however, because the size and breadth of its errors have grown dramatically. The semiconductor maker said in July that it had understated its option expenses by an estimated $750 million and would restate records dating to 2000.

Now it says it will restate financial reports back to 1998 -- covering its entire history as a public company. The accounting charge ``will be at least twice the amount previously estimated and could be substantially more" if investigators find more tainted options, Broadcom said.

The $1.5 billion expense is more than double the $727.5 million in net income that Broadcom reported in its four profitable years, according to Bloomberg News. The company suffered $6.6 billion in net losses in the other four years. Its stock fell 34 cents to $26.09 Friday, but it has dropped 46 percent since peaking in March.

`Destabilizing scandal'

The revelation forces investors to grapple with a troubling question, said Damon Silvers, associate general counsel for the AFL-CIO, which manages union pensions with $5 trillion in assets.

``Is the company a successful business or not?" Silvers said. ``That's why we've been saying over and over again that this is a profoundly destabilizing scandal."

In contrast, Linear Technology's internal review concluded that it ``did not employ backdating" from 1995 to 2006 and would not need to restate financial records. Backdating involves doctoring the paperwork on options to dates with lower stock prices to give recipients immediate paper profits.

Linear came under suspicion because of a number of fortuitously timed option grants. In 1998, for example, Chairman and Chief Executive Robert H. Swanson Jr. and at least four other top executives received options priced at the lowest price of the company's fiscal year.

In its annual report issued Friday, the company said it granted stock options on a quarterly basis near board meetings that were scheduled far in advance to coincide with the release of quarterly earnings.

Linear previously disclosed that it is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department -- and the annual report noted that the IRS had joined that list Tuesday. Linear's stock fell 23 cents to close at $32.59 Friday.

A local IRS spokesman declined to comment on the agency's request for documents, citing privacy issues. It can't say whether its request was minor or a full-fledged audit. Unlike the SEC, which can escalate from an informal investigation to a formal investigation, the IRS doesn't have a way to signal if an audit is escalating.

IRS joins task force

The news of the IRS's involvement in Linear came a day after the U.S. attorney in San Francisco announced that four IRS criminal investigation agents had joined a task force examining whether companies and executives committed fraud when options were misdated. The task force now has 15 members from the SEC, Justice Department and IRS.

Some experts are hesitant to read too much into the IRS's request for documents from Linear, however. Because the options scandal has unfolded rapidly -- and could reflect problems at hundreds more companies -- the IRS might still be gathering data from companies nationwide to assess the scope of the problem and how to develop an eventual settlement program.

``They're in the very early stages here," said Pete Klinger, director of compensation and benefits at BDO Seidman in San Francisco. ``From what we've seen so far, it is not very widespread."

Broadcom's Stock Option Costs Soar (LAT)

By James S. Granelli, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Unreported expenses may surpass $1.5 billion, leading to the largest restatement among firms under scrutiny for alleged manipulation.

As an optimistic symbol of the technology industry's future, Broadcom Corp. in the late 1990s was hard to beat.

Stock options turned average workers into millionaires, and the founders established themselves at the top of Orange County's corporate and philanthropic elite as the Irvine chip maker's share price soared.

But eight years after its frothy debut on the public markets, Broadcom is fast epitomizing the industry's cavalier past — and more sober prospects.

On Friday, the company said unreported expenses related to those stock options that peppered the employee parking lot with Ferraris and Lamborghinis are likely to swell to more than $1.5 billion and ultimately could be "substantially more."

The revision is double an estimate of two months ago and would increase Broadcom's accumulated losses since going public in 1998 to more than $7 billion. It's also the largest restatement among any of the more than 100 public companies under scrutiny over alleged manipulation of the timing of stock option grants.

Although technology companies were more likely than other firms to grant stock options as incentives for rank-and-file workers as well as executives, questions about the practice are being raised at a number of companies — including Home Depot, Cheesecake Factory, Cablevision and UnitedHealth.

In many cases, experts believe, nothing illegal was done, although the Justice Department is examining more than 45 companies and the Securities and Exchange Commission is reviewing more than 100. Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. in San Jose have been charged with securities fraud.

No one at Broadcom, which makes communications chips designed into cellphones and digital entertainment systems, has been accused of wrongdoing, and the company said it was cooperating with an informal investigation by the SEC.

"Broadcom seems to be one of the more aggressive companies in advancing its internal investigation," said Michael D. Cohen, research director for Pacific American Securities in San Diego. "It's concerned about not wanting to be the poster child in the industrywide scandal."

Broadcom said its internal investigation, which uncovered $750 million in unreported compensation expenses two months ago, identified additional options linked to dates other than when they were actually awarded. So-called backdating involves timing options to dips in the stock, creating a greater likelihood of a lucrative upside.

As a result of the investigation, Broadcom is restating all of its financial reports back to its initial public offering in 1998. It said all changes involved alterations to bookkeeping accounts that did not affect the company's cash position or financial stability. The company has more than $2 billion in cash and short-term securities and has been profitable since 2004.

All together, Broadcom granted options for 238 million shares of common stock to employees over more than five years — with 95% going to employees other than executive officers. The company said no board member received options — including co-founders Henry T. Nicholas III and Henry Samueli, who became billionaires from their stakes in the company.

Spokesman William Blanning said Broadcom would not comment beyond a news release issued early Friday before financial markets opened. Broadcom shares fell 34 cents, or just over 1%, to $26.09 — about half their 52-week high of $50 and far from their split-adjusted all-time high of $182.41.

"This is almost old news," said Marc A. Siegel, research director at the Center for Financial Research and Analysis. "People investing today are looking forward."

It was Siegel's report last spring that identified Broadcom and others as granting options with questionable timing.

"These kind of things in and of themselves do not affect cash. There's no economic damage," said analyst David Wu at Global Crown Capital in San Francisco. "But it does show how fast and loose they were playing, giving out options on a very liberal basis."

Broadcom was a typical young high-tech company caught up in the exuberance of the 1990s. Founded in 1991, it used stock options to attract engineering talent and supplement the relatively low salaries common at emerging companies.

DOJ_NMG_0061085

When tech was the darling of Wall Street, Broadcom was one of the stellar stocks. During those giddy days when investors chased anything that ended in .com, Broadcom had something unusual: real products and a solid business plan selling chips that ran TV set-top boxes and wireless devices.

And it had Nicholas.

Brash, bright and seemingly always awake, Nicholas pushed the company into a range of new niches, negotiating late-night deals and using the company's high-priced stock to buy 18 companies in two years.

By 2000, Nicholas and Samueli, the chairman, had amassed a net worth that Forbes magazine estimated at $10 billion each, most of it in Broadcom stock. But the next year, as the tech economy burst, Broadcom shares plummeted 92%, taking most of the co-founders' assets with it. Their net worth in 2001 was pegged at $2 billion each.

By 2003, Nicholas, known for extravagant parties at his sprawling Laguna Hills mansion, found himself nearly burned out and almost divorced. He quit the company to reconcile with his wife.

Samueli, who remains chairman, has donated more than $160 million, mostly to educational and healthcare institutions. Two engineering schools are named after him, one at UCLA and one at UC Irvine, and a center for alternative medicine at UC Irvine is named for his wife, Susan.

Broadcom plugged away, hiring Scott A. McGregor as chief executive from Royal Philips Electronics in 2004. McGregor shed stagnant businesses and pushed into more promising markets. Today, Broadcom's chips are found not only in cable TV set-top boxes and cellphones but a host of mobile and broadband products.

"The promise of Broadcom in the late 1990s is still there today," said Cohen, who has followed the company since its early days.

He noted, though, that the corporate culture had changed since the aggressively competitive Nicholas quit as chief executive.

"It's still highly competitive," Cohen said. "But the nature of those go-go years and the high-flying stock affected things differently. You had to be the first charger into the market then. Now it's a little more business-as-usual atmosphere."

*

james.granelli@latimes.com

Broadcom's Backdating Charge Doubles To $1.5 Billion (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Rebecca Barr

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a maker of computer chips for consumer devices, said it discovered more instances of stock-option backdating that will require the company to at least double its charge for the practice to $1.5 billion.

The company's 1998 and 1999 earnings must be restated, Broadcom said today in a statement. Most of the non-cash charge will be expensed in the periods through the end of 2003.

The restatement is the biggest yet among at least 120 companies facing federal probes or conducting internal reviews into whether they manipulated dates to inflate the value of options. In July, Broadcom said it would take a $750 million charge after an audit committee found options backdating from 2000 to 2002. That review continues.

``More serious than effect on share price is what it says for the culture of the company," said Michael Cohen, an analyst for San Diego-based Pacific American Securities. ``In addition to straightening out the accounting, these companies should find the wrongdoers and get some recovery for shareholders."

Shares of Irvine, California-based Broadcom slipped 76 cents, or 2.9 percent, to $25.67 at 10:45 a.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Before today, they had fallen 46 percent from this year's March 2 peak.

Broadcom, which is also under an informal probe by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, said the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Central District of California asked for some documents already requested by the SEC.

Profit, Loss

DOJ_NMG_0061086

The $1.5 billion would be more than twice as much as the $727.5 million in total net income Broadcom reported for its four profitable years since going public in 1998, according to data compiled by Bloomberg. The company had $6.63 billion in net losses for the other four years.

``Stockholders are hit twice," said Cohen who rates Broadcom's stock ``buy" and said he doesn't own it. ``First you're stolen from, then the stock goes down when the theft is uncovered."

The company said it has found no instances of option backdating after May 2003 and neither founders Henry Samueli and Henry Nicholas nor any board members board past or present have profited from the disputed options.

``I suspect investors will now look at what they expect from Broadcom management in the future, and with the current management team in place," said Marc Siegel, director of research at the Center for Financial Research & Analysis in Rockville, Maryland.

Restatements

More than 40 companies have said they will restate earnings or might have to do so when internal probes are completed. The restatements total at least $2.27 billion so far, according to Bloomberg data. Broadcom's is the biggest announced to date.

Federal investigators are scrutinizing stock-option grants that may have been backdated or carefully timed to coincide with days when the stock price was low to enrich the recipients. Such grants can hide costs, distort taxes, and obscure a company's true financial condition, and could be criminal acts if not properly disclosed.

Stock options allow recipients to buy shares at a future date, usually at the price on the day they were granted. They are given to managers as an incentive to find ways to boost the stock price. Broadcom in July said as much as 95 percent of its options are awarded to employees below executive officer level.

Subverts Purpose

Prosecutors and members of Congress have said backdating grants, or awarding them shortly before good news is announced, subverts their purpose and could involve criminal fraud.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox told Congress this week that more than 100 companies are being investigated. Executives at Comverse Technology Inc. and Brocade Communications Systems Inc. face criminal charges, and Cox said more enforcement actions will follow.

Broadcom's extra charges announced today concern options awarded between June 1998 and May 2003, a period that hadn't been assessed by the audit committee when the preliminary expense was announced in July.

Linear Technology Corp. today said the U.S. Internal Revenue Service requested information about its options-granting practices. The company, which makes computer chips for cell phones and satellite systems, already had disclosed that the SEC and the Justice Department are conducting informal inquiries into the options.

To contact the reporter on this story: Rebecca Barr in New York at rbarr1@bloomberg.net .

Ebbers Ordered To Report To Prison Sept. 26 In WorldCom Fraud (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers was ordered to report to prison Sept. 26 to begin serving a 25-year sentence for an $11 billion (â,¬8.64 billion) accounting fraud.

U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones, in a ruling made public Thursday, ordered Ebbers to surrender to an institution designated by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons to begin serving a sentence that was delayed for the last year while an appeals court considered it.

Ebbers was sentenced in July of last year after he was convicted of fraud and conspiracy in the massive fraud that drove WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month upheld his conviction and sentence, finding he was motivated primarily by personal financial circumstances.

Ebbers once was known as one of America's most successful chief executive officers as his telecommunications company and its stock soared during the technology driven excesses of the late 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0061087

At trial, prosecutors successfully argued that Ebbers helped lead a plan to prop up the company's stock price by hiding its failing finances. The scheme was described as one of the largest accounting frauds in history.

WorldCom collapsed into bankruptcy in 2002, and investigators eventually uncovered $11 billion (â,¬8.64 billion) in fraud, much of it because accountants were classifying regular expenses as long-term capital expenditures. The company re-emerged under the name MCI. Verizon later bought MCI.

A lawyer for Ebbers, Reid Weingarten, did not immediately return a telephone call for comment Thursday.

Ebbers at sentencing could have faced as much as 85 years in prison on nine criminal counts including securities fraud, conspiracy and making false filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

He was convicted more than two years after an internal auditor began asking questions about curious accounting at WorldCom, touching off a scandal that eventually unearthed $11 billion (â,¬8.64 billion) in cooked books.

The company struck a $750 million (â,¬589 million) settlement with federal regulators to repay aggrieved investors, a small sum compared to the tens of billions of dollars of market capitalization that evaporated in the scandal.

Former Enron Executive David Delainey Asks Judge For Probation (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Former Enron Corp. executive David Delainey, who pleaded guilty to insider trading, asked a judge to sentence him to probation or house arrest because he cooperated with prosecutors in their investigation.

Delainey, a Canadian citizen and former head of Enron's energy trading and retail energy services divisions, said he deserves less than the 10-year term he agreed to serve, according to court papers filed Aug. 28. He asked to serve any sentence in Canada, near his job and family in Calgary.

``Mr. Delainey has provided the government with extraordinary insight and education, and has given powerful, credible testimony," John Dowd, his lawyer, wrote in court papers filed with U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt in Houston. ``His testimony at the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay was critical to achieving the convictions."

Skilling, 52, and Lay, who died in July at age 64, were convicted in May of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the world's largest energy trader. More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions vanished when Enron plunged into bankruptcy in December 2001.

Delainey, 40, pleaded guilty to selling more than $4.26 million in Enron stock between January 2000 and October 2001 based on non-public knowledge of numerous management schemes that were artificially boosting Enron's bottom line. These included realigning business units to hide losses and improperly using reserves to make up shortfalls in earnings expectations.

Forfeiture

As part of his plea agreement, Delainey also agreed to forfeit almost $8 million in illicit profits and cooperate with prosecutors when he pleaded guilty to a single count of insider trading in October 2003. In a Sept. 5 response to his sentencing request, prosecutors told Hoyt they will seek an unspecified reduction in Delainey's sentence.

Delainey's court filing described $7 million he forfeited to the Justice Department and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, as well as a $10,000 unsolicited donation he made in March 2002 to the Enron Ex-Employee Relief Fund, which benefits laid-off Enron workers.

Dowd told Hoyt that Delainey also deserves credit for waiving extradition and voluntarily coming to the U.S. to face charges. He said it might have been difficult to extradite the Enron executive because Canada doesn't consider insider trading a crime.

``Although Mr. Delainey could easily have sought to hide behind the extradition treaty and embroil the government in long and costly extradition proceedings, he decided instead to take responsibility for his actions and help clean up this mess," Dowd wrote.

Jaclyn Lesch, spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, didn't return a call seeking comment.

The case is U.S. v. Delainey, H-03-420, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

To contact the reporter on this story: Laurel Brubaker Calkins in Houston at laurel@calkins.us.com .

HP Chairwoman Tries To Diffuse Uproar (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

Embattled HP Chairwoman Battles to Save Her Job Amid Furor Over Spy Tactics

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Battling to keep her job, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn tried Friday to defuse the uproar over a company-ordered investigation that relied on a potentially illegal ruse to obtain the personal phone records of her fellow directors and at least nine reporters.

In an interview, Dunn described the tactics as "absolutely appalling" and "embarrassing" while defending the need to pursue the investigation to plug a leak on HP's board.

"I serve at the pleasure of the board," Dunn said. "I totally trust their judgment. If they think it would be better for me to step aside, I would do that. But a number of directors have urged me to hang in there." She declined to say how many of HP's other nine directors support her.

The board plans to hold an emergency meeting by phone during the weekend to discuss the concerns about the company's investigation as well as Dunn's job status.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer already has concluded the HP investigation broke state law by obtaining people's private phone records under false pretenses -- a charade known as "pretexting."

HP's investigators masqueraded as the directors and reporters targeted in the probe, using their Social Security numbers in some instances to dupe phone companies into turning over lists of personal phone calls.

Lockyer is still gathering evidence to determine the breadth of the violations and the culprits behind them, a process that he hopes to wrap up soon, his spokesman, Tom Dresslar, said Friday.

In a letter sent late Friday, U.S. Senator Richard Durbin, D-Illinois, asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review whether HP's investigation broke any federal laws. "I am deeply troubled by these allegations," wrote Durbin, who wants to pass a federal law that would outlaw obtaining private phone records without an accountholder's consent.

The Federal Communications Commission also has taken the first step toward opening an investigation by sending a letter of inquiry to AT&T Inc., the source of the personal phone records obtained by HP.

The invasion of privacy so infuriated one HP director, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, that he resigned from the board in May and triggered a chain of events that finally forced the company to publicly disclose its role in the pretexting.

Incensed by several media stories that quoted unnamed people about information shared during HP board meetings, Dunn authorized the investigation earlier this year to find out if any of the company's directors were talking out of turn.

The inquiry convinced HP that George Keyworth II had been providing reporters with confidential company information. The company is punishing him by preventing him from running for re-election to the board.

In Friday's interview, Dunn branded the leaks as an "egregious breach" of HP's standards and emphasized the investigation was conducted with the full backing of the board. "This was not my spy campaign on our board." She also said "all this nonsense" could have been avoided had Keyworth admitted he was leaking information before the investigation began.

Now Dunn, 52, is scrambling to hold on to her $300,000-per-year job at HP amid an intensifying backlash against one of Silicon Valley's oldest and proudest companies.

The pretexting imbroglio already is threatening to become a huge distraction for the Palo Alto-based HP as it tries to build on its recent momentum in the personal computer and other high-target markets.

Dunn will have to resign if HP hopes to minimize the damage that already has been caused to its reputation, said Gary Lutin, a New York investment banker who advises shareholders on corporate control issues.

"Whether you consider the questions about (Dunn's) judgment to be resolved or unresolved, she is no longer in a position to be a viable chairman," Lutin said. "If the directors don't understand that, then they are not qualified to serve as fiduciaries for shareholders."

Dunn could still hold on to her job if she can convince other directors that she never authorized investigators to resort to pretexting, said Kirk Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics.

Even if that is true, Dunn still might have difficulty explaining why she didn't confront investigators about how they obtained the phone records once they turned over to her, Hanson said. "Once they had the telephone logs, you would think someone would raise the question, 'How did we get these?'"

Dunn said she had no clue investigators would resort to pretexting, saying she didn't even know what the word meant until June or July -- a few months after she authorized the investigation. She said she still doesn't know the identity of the firm behind the pretexting.

Viet Dinh, an attorney representing Perkins, said it's difficult to believe Dunn didn't know about pretexting before June. "To my knowledge, there are only two ways to get these kinds of records: with a government subpoena or with people's consent," Dinh said, asserting that HP's investigators didn't have that kind of privileged access.

So far, all but one of the nine reporters targeted in HP's pretexting have been identified by their news organizations. They are: Peter Burrows, Ben Elgin and Roger Crockett of Business Week; Pui-Wing Tam and George Anders of The Wall Street Journal; Dawn Kawamoto and Tom Krazit of CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com; and John Markoff of The New York Times.

The involvement of the reporters "takes the improprieties to a whole new level," said Dresslar, Lockyer's spokesman.

The pretexting backlash hasn't hurt HP's stock too badly yet. The company's shares rose 75 cents Friday to close at $36.17 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Unless drastic action is taken, it's only a matter before the brewing scandal begins to hurt HP, Lutin predicted.

"As long as this confusion and disorder continues, no self-respecting professional is going to want to work for Hewlett-Packard and the company will gradually be drained of talent," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Washington: Executive Is Sentenced In Bribery Case (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A federal judge in Alexandria, Va., sentenced Vernon L. Jackson, the chief executive of a Kentucky technology company, to 7 years 3 months in jail for paying more than $400,000 to Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana. In May, Mr. Jackson pleaded guilty to charges that he made the payments to a consulting firm run by Mr. Jefferson's wife in return for the congressman's help on business deals in Africa. Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged. Prosecutors said Mr. Jackson had been cooperating with a federal investigation of the congressman. They also told the judge, T.S. Ellis III of Federal District Court, that they would be likely to ask him to reduce the sentence if Mr. Jackson continued to help.

Businessman Gets 7 Years For Bribing Legislator (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Louisville businessman Vernon L. Jackson was sentenced yesterday to seven years and three months in federal prison for bribing Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) with more than $400,000 and company stock to promote his Kentucky firm's high-tech business ventures.

During sentencing, U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria told Jackson, 54, owner of iGate Inc., that he made a "very bad decision" that corrupted the political process.

Jackson said nothing during the proceeding. His attorney, Michael S. Nachmanoff, said he was pleased the judge gave a sentence that was at the low end of the federal guideline.

Jackson is the second person to be sentenced in the 18-month public corruption probe that has targeted Jefferson and cast a dark cloud over the eight-term congressman's political future. Jefferson, 59, has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing, but sources have said an indictment appears assured.

DOJ_NMG_0061090

Jackson pleaded guilty in May to bribing Jefferson to promote iGate's broadband technology for Internet and cable television in Nigeria, Ghana and Cameroon. In January, Brett M. Pfeffer, a former Jefferson aide, pleaded guilty to bribing the congressman and was sentenced to eight years in prison.

Both men, under their plea agreements, could get their sentences reduced for their cooperation with the FBI.

Jefferson attorney Robert Trout, who attended yesterday's sentencing, issued a statement afterward saying: "Congressman Jefferson knows well the pressure that the Department of Justice can apply once it targets someone for criminal prosecution. As Jackson's plea bargain makes clear, the government has offered powerful inducements to cause Jackson to plead guilty."

Jefferson, the statement added, has repeatedly said he never took payment in any form to perform "any act or duty."

Jefferson is running for reelection in his Hurricane Katrina-damaged district against 12 opponents.

The corruption probe has been slowed by the political uproar and legal battle over the FBI's raid in May on Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. Jefferson has argued that the raid violated the Constitution, and investigators have been prevented from looking at the seized materials while the matter works its way through court.

Exec. Gets 7 Years For Congressman Bribe (AP-Y)

By Matthew Barakat

AP, September 9, 2006

A Kentucky businessman who admitted paying more than $400,000 in bribes to a Louisiana congressman was sentenced Friday to more than seven years in prison.

Vernon Jackson, 54, of Louisville, is a key figure in the federal investigation of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La. The chief executive of the telecommunications firm iGate Inc. said he paid the bribes to gain the congressman's help in obtaining business deals in Africa.

The bribes paid by Jackson, including stocks and cash paid to a company controlled by Jefferson's family, had a value of $400,000 to $1 million, according to court records.

The congressman has not been charged but court records allege the FBI caught Jefferson on videotape taking a $100,000 cash bribe from an FBI informant who agreed to have her conversations with the congressman taped. Most of that money later turned up in a freezer in Jefferson's home.

The bribes paid by Jackson are separate from the $100,000 found in the freezer.

Jackson did not speak during the hearing and declined to comment afterward. He has previously expressed remorse for his conduct.

The seven-year, three-month sentence imposed by U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III was at the low end of federal sentencing guidelines. Prosecutor Mark Lytle said Jackson was continuing to cooperate in the investigation, and his sentence could later be reduced. He will not begin serving his sentence until January.

Jefferson was never mentioned by name in Friday's hearing, but prosecutors have made it clear in court papers that he is the congressman to whom Jackson paid bribes.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing. His lawyer, Robert Trout, suggested Jackson is lying to garner leniency from prosecutors.

"Congressman Jefferson knows well the pressure that the Department of Justice can apply once it targets someone for criminal prosecution. As Jackson's plea bargain makes clear, the government has offered powerful inducements to cause Jackson to plead guilty. He has every reason to expect that his sentence will be substantially reduced depending on his testimony against the congressman," Trout said.

The government's investigation of Jefferson has been delayed by the furor that resulted from the Justice Department's decision to raid Jefferson's congressional office earlier this year.

Jefferson claims that his status as a congressman grants him immunity from executive branch search warrants. The Justice Department has not yet reviewed the documents it seized from the office while the issue is being litigated.

A former congressional aide of Jefferson was sentenced to eight years in prison after admitting that he helped broker some of the bribes paid to Jefferson.

IGate's Jackson Gets 87 Months (LEXHL)

By John Cheves, HERALD-LEADER STAFF WRITER

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), September 9, 2006

BUSINESSMAN PLEADED GUILTY TO BRIBING CONGRESSMAN TO PROMOTE TECH COMPANY

WASHINGTON - A Louisville businessman who says he bribed a congressman to promote his small technology company was sentenced yesterday to more than seven years in prison.

Federal prosecutors said Vernon Jackson, 54, founder of iGate, deserved credit for pleading guilty in May to two bribery counts, and they said he is cooperating with the Justice Department in its political corruption investigation. Jackson could have received up to nine years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

Although Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., has not been charged with a crime, he is the friend and partner of Jackson who promoted iGate in the United States and overseas. FBI agents have searched Jefferson's homes and offices in Washington and New Orleans, finding $90,000 in alleged bribe money stashed in his freezer.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria, Va., noted that Jackson is a self-made entrepreneur with strong ties to his community and church. But Ellis said the punishment must reflect the damage that bribery inflicts on the credibility of government.

"The rule of law ... only makes sense if our public officials are not corrupt," Ellis said, ordering Jackson to serve 87 months in prison. Jackson, a tall, stocky man with a shaved head and a trim mustache, stood without reaction. "Public corruption is the worst kind of a virulent and malignant cancer," the judge said.

Ellis ruled that Jackson won't have to report to prison until at least January, as prosecutors said they want to continue to consult him in their investigation.

According to court records, Jefferson took more than $400,000 in bribes from Jackson -- and slowly tried to seize control of his company -- in exchange for helping iGate win U.S. and foreign government contracts, using his position in Congress. Founded in 1998, iGate sells what it calls innovative technology for broadband Internet access.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Lytle said after the sentencing that he could not discuss the status of the Justice Department's investigation.

A spokeswoman for Jefferson later declined to comment. First elected to Congress in 1991, Jefferson faces a crowd of re-election challengers this fall in Louisiana's Democratic primary.

Yesterday, Jackson -- an engineer who moved to Louisville nearly 20 years ago -- declined to comment outside the courtroom or address the judge. His public defender said Jackson is ashamed and remorseful for what he did.

"Mr. Jackson is a good man who has risen from modest beginnings," said his lawyer, Michael Nachmanoff. "His desire to see his business succeed is what led him to where he is today. ... If he could go back in time, he would. But he cannot."

IGate's future is uncertain. Jackson has drawn no salary from his small company for more than a year and has accumulated considerable personal debt, Nachmanoff said.

However, David Harper, a Louisville lawyer for iGate, said it can continue without its founder and chairman, who previously had been expected to leave for the ministry in the near future.

"The company's fine," said Harper, who declined to offer details such as how many employees remain. "There are several projects in the pipeline right now that I'm not at liberty to discuss. But we're going to continue, just as Mr. Jackson wants us to."

Roller-coaster Career Ends In Prison (NOTP)

By Bill Walsh, And Bruce Alpert%%par%%washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 9, 2006

Telecom exec linked to Jefferson gets 7 years

WASHINGTON -- Kentucky businessman Vernon Jackson, the son of a school custodian who had built himself into a high-tech multimillionaire only to lose it all, was trying to claw his way back into the game six years ago when he met Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

Jackson, whose fortune was once estimated at $32 million, saw the congressman as his ticket back to financial success and respectability. Jefferson's connections in Washington and West Africa held the promise of finally finding a market for Jackson's patented telecommunications invention that could make both of them rich.

Instead, according to FBI wiretap transcripts and court pleadings, Jefferson hit up Jackson for nearly $400,000 in bribes and eventually sought to seize control of his fledgling telecommunications company, iGate Inc.

Jefferson has not been charged and has maintained his innocence.

Jackson pleaded guilty in May to bribery of a public official and conspiracy to commit bribery. He was sentenced Friday to seven years and three months in prison. Jackson has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors in the case the federal Justice Department has been building against Jefferson for a year and a half. He is scheduled to begin serving his sentence in January.

At first glance, the two men would seem an odd pairing. Jefferson, who received a law degree from Harvard University, is wry and urbane, a slim stick of a figure who speaks in low, clipped cadences. Jackson is a bear of a man who talks with a booming voice and attended technical school on his way to starting his career toiling in the telecom labs at AT&T.

But they also are remarkably similar in ways that would draw them together in an audacious business venture that has turned into a nightmare.

Jefferson, 59, and Jackson, 54, are African-American sons of the segregated South who were born into large families with little money but an abiding devotion to religion. Each was one of nine children, Jefferson growing up in rural north Louisiana and Jackson in Charlotte, N.C. They also shared an unflagging personal energy and a burning ambition to rise above their humble origins.

By the mid-1990s, both had made it. Jefferson parlayed his Harvard law degree and a canny political instinct into a successful career as the first African-American congressman from Louisiana since Reconstruction.

Jackson, a technology whiz kid, was recruited out of high school by AT&T, where he spent the next two decades. Deciding to strike out on his own, he formed his own firm in 1990 on the strength of a patent he received for what he believed to be breakthrough technology. The invention would allow voice, data and video images to be transmitted across existing copper lines without the need to install expensive fiber optics. He eventually packaged the invention as a service that would allow workers to conduct video conferences from their desktop computers.

It "was literally a product which could save the U.S. military and the U.S. government hundreds of millions, if not billions," of dollars, said William Warner, who marketed the technology for Jackson.

With his brother, Richard, Jackson launched VideoLan Technologies Inc. in 1994, and a year later took the company public. Almost overnight, VideoLan's stock soared from $4 a share to nearly $50.

Suddenly rich beyond his wildest dreams, Jackson bought his wife, Sandra, a Mercedes-Benz, and the couple plunked down $1.5 million to build a mansion alongside a golf course designed by Arnold Palmer in one of the toniest neighborhoods of Louisville, Ky.

But VideoLan struggled. Friends said telecom giants in the industry smothered Jackson's plans after he rebuffed their buyout offers. Within three years, Jackson had been ousted from VideoLan, which was headed for bankruptcy. His $250,000 annual salary was shut off, and his stock holdings plummeted in value.

By 1997, unable to make payments to the builder, his dream home became an abandoned wooden shell of two-by-fours that neighbors complained was an eyesore.

"He always had two problems," said Kiran Chudgar, a Louisville businessman who helped develop prototypes for Jackson's technology. "One was that he had a lot of big corporations who weren't anxious for his technology to succeed for competitive reasons. The other was that he never seemed to have enough funding to make his ideas happen."

Jackson may have lacked business acumen, but he believed in his product and he had ambition to spare. He successfully sued his old company to get the patent rights and started over with a new firm he called iGate Inc.

Jackson's attorney said his client wasn't motivated by money alone. Michael Nachmanoff said Jackson also wanted to use his invention to bridge the "digital divide" in telecommunications between the haves and the have-nots. Jackson believed his technology could bring broadband communications to people and places that otherwise couldn't afford it.

DOJ_NMG_0061093

"It was in this context that he met and developed a relationship with" Jefferson, Nachmanoff wrote in court filings.

By the time they met in 2000, Jefferson had carved out an influential niche for himself in Congress as a brainy, business-friendly Democrat with a keen interest in West Africa. Jefferson saw promise in Jackson's technology and, according to court documents, got busy making it happen.

To verify the effectiveness of Jackson's creation, Jefferson got it tested by the Army's Technology Integration Center, which gave it the thumbs up. Jefferson then helped get iGate's product listed on a prominent federal government contractor database. It was scooped up by Fort Sam Houston in Texas and Fort Stewart in Georgia. But few other contracts followed.

Nonetheless, things seemed promising to Jackson, who told those in his inner circle that he had a "friend in Washington" who was going to put him back on top. Jackson called the congressman "Jeff," and their families grew close. Jackson recommended Jefferson's daughter Jamila for a seat on the board of a Texas telecom firm, Gridline. According to a story in the Lexington (Ky.) Herald-Leader, Jackson and his wife accompanied Jefferson and his wife, Andrea, to New York for a weekend getaway in September 2004 that included seats at the U.S. Open tennis tournament, tickets to "The Lion King" on Broadway and some shopping.

The friendliness, however, masked a secret pact the two men had forged, according to the FBI. In 2001, court records say, Jefferson demanded that Jackson give him a cut of the business. He urged him to sign a professional services agreement with the ANJ Group, a company led by Andrea Jefferson. The deal called for 1 million shares of iGate stock, $7,500 per month and a 5 percent share of the company. Eventually, the FBI says, Jefferson demanded 35 percent.

The FBI says that over five years, Jackson paid the ANJ Group $367,500 disguised as consulting fees and paid for travel costing nearly $88,000.

IGate was hoping to find a lucrative market in Nigeria, a poor country whose telecommunications system is antiquated. Largely through Jefferson's influence, the FBI says, the Nigerian firm NetLink agreed to put $45 million into the deal and fronted $6.5 million to iGate.

NetLink eventually backed out, and Jefferson lined up a new investor, Lori Mody, a Northern Virginia millionaire. In conversations taped by the FBI, Jefferson can be heard telling Mody that he planned to move Jackson aside and take over the company himself.

Things began to unravel when Mody suspected she was being stiffed. She had paid $3.5 million for the rights to iGate's technology, but Jackson refused to sign them over. She went to the FBI to complain about fraud, a tip that hatched a bribery probe targeting Jackson and Jefferson.

Writing to U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, Jackson's wife acknowledged Jackson's complicity in the bribery scheme. But she also said her husband was taken advantage of.

"I feel that he had to be blindsided by individuals who have no regard for people," Sandra Jackson said.

Jackson's dream of a quick trip back to the good life has taken a detour through a federal penitentiary. When Jackson pleaded guilty, he asked for a court-appointed attorney, saying that he was destitute. His financial forms listed debts totaling more than $360,000, almost as much as the FBI says he paid in bribes to Jefferson.

. . . . . .

Bill Walsh can be reached at bill.walsh@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7817.

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

More Firms Linked To Probe (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 9, 2006

Investigators seeking records from Nigeria

WASHINGTON -- Documents released this week by Nigerian investigators indicate that the ongoing U.S. probe of Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, includes an examination of his links to some previously unreported companies.

Nigeria's Economic and Financial Crimes Commission said it had been asked by the U.S. Justice Department to examine the congressman's role not only in promoting a Nigerian project proposed by the Kentucky firm iGate Inc., but also his links to:

-- Life Technology Holdings, now known as Global Environmental Energy Corp., which at one time had offices in New Orleans and filed for bankruptcy protection after its efforts to build garbage incinerators failed to catch on. Along with iGate, it helped finance Jefferson's trip to Western Africa, including Nigeria, in 2004.

-- TDC Overseas of Baton Rouge, which was looking to build a sugar refinery in Nigeria. George Knost, the company's chief executive officer, said TDC is "cooperating fully" with the Justice Department probe of Jefferson. The company has "had no improper dealings with Jefferson or anyone else," Knost said.

-- Jefferson Interest Inc., which matches the name of a company registered with the Louisiana secretary of state's office in 1983 that lists Jefferson as president and his brothers Bennie and Mose as vice president and secretary-treasurer, respectively.

The Justice Department probe of Jefferson centers on allegations that Vernon Jackson, chief executive officer of iGate Inc., funneled more than $360,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help in getting contracts in Nigeria and Ghana for iGate's copper wire broadband technology. Jackson has pleaded guilty and was sentenced Friday to seven years and three months in jail.

Jefferson has not been charged and has said he did nothing wrong. He declined to comment Friday through a spokesman for the Washington, D.C., communications firm he hired to deal with the questions about the investigation.

"Due to the pending investigation by the Department of Justice, we are unable to comment at this time," said Christopher Garrett of Impact Strategies. "We look forward to a more appropriate time, when all of the facts surrounding this matter can be disclosed."

The commission's report said the Justice Department also asked for bank records held by Atonte Diete-Spiff, a former Jefferson congressional staffer, and a company by the name of Providence International. It also asks for records of calls made from a phone number registered to Diete-Spiff.

Diete-Spiff, who traveled twice to Nigeria in 2000 as a representative of Jefferson, couldn't be reached for comment Friday. The Louisiana secretary of state lists a Providence International Construction Co. in New Orleans, formed in 2002, and managed by a Jefferson congressional staffer, Stephanie Butler.

The Economic and Financial Crimes Commission also said the Justice Department wanted help with information about not only Jefferson's activities in Nigeria, but also those of his wife, Andrea; the couple's five daughters, Jamila, Jalilah, Nailah, Jelani and Akilah; Jefferson's son-in-laws Tony Bullock and Philip Jones; and Jefferson's brothers, Mose, Bennie and Archie Jefferson.

Officials with Global Environmental Energy, previously known as Life Technology Holdings, or LETH Energy, could not be reached for comment. But in an interview last year, Noreen Wilson, then listed as president of Global Environmental Energy, said Jefferson "has always been willing" to help U.S. firms establish contacts with African leaders. She said Jefferson had never asked for anything in return.

A Global news release in 2004 pointed to deals to build 500 energy plants worldwide, but it appears that few were actually built. Two unbuilt incinerators were proposed for the New Orleans area -- one in Slidell and another in New Orleans, which had won approval from the Port of New Orleans.

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

Obvious Question In Plame Case Had Early Answer (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Richard T. Cooper

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Almost three years ago, as Patrick J. Fitzgerald settled in as the newly appointed special counsel in charge of the Valerie Plame leak investigation, he learned a startling secret.

Washington was ablaze with speculation about who had revealed Plame's identity as a covert CIA officer to syndicated columnist Robert Novak; senior White House officials were considered the likely culprits. But Fitzgerald, reading FBI reports just after taking charge, learned that federal investigators already knew Novak's primary source — a gossipy State Department official who seemed to have strained relations with the White House.

So if the mystery was already solved, why did Fitzgerald's investigation continue for almost 36 more months? Why does I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, still face criminal charges in connection with the Plame leak? And why were other senior officials left twisting in the wind, facing possible indictment?

Did the special counsel, operating behind the veil of secrecy of all such inquiries, abuse his authority in a witch hunt?

Such questions are at the heart of a furor that erupted late last month after the revelation that several months after Novak's column naming Plame appeared in July 2003, Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage had informed his superiors — and then the Justice Department, which was investigating the leak — that he had been Novak's primary source. Armitage's reasons for talking to Novak remain unclear. He was known for his skepticism on some aspects of President Bush's Iraq war strategy, but also for his penchant to gossip.

This week, breaking a silence he said Fitzgerald imposed, Armitage told "CBS Evening News," "I feel terrible, every day. I think I let down the president, I let down the secretary of State, I let down my department, my family, and I also let down Mr. and Mrs. Wilson."

The discovery of Armitage's role — and the fact that it had been known to investigators so early — is stirring administration defenders to fury.

After all, they say, the inquiry left the White House under a cloud of suspicion for months and created a costly distraction for senior officials, including political strategist Karl Rove and even Cheney.

"It's as if a giant hoax were perpetrated on the country — by the media, by partisan opponents of the Bush administration, even by several Bush subordinates who betrayed the president and their White House colleagues," conservative commentator Fred Barnes wrote this week in a Weekly Standard Magazine column that listed Fitzgerald, the news media and others as the culprits.

Is such criticism of Fitzgerald's inquiry appropriate?

The special counsel declined to comment. And the argument has become intensely partisan.

Yet the information on Armitage — first revealed in a new book — along with court filings and interviews with former White House staffers and others familiar with the inquiry, suggest Fitzgerald pressed ahead because he learned quickly that Armitage was not alone in discussing Plame with reporters. Top White House officials had talked about her as well.

Fitzgerald, who had been the U.S. attorney in Chicago, was appointed special counsel Dec. 30, 2003, taking over a probe initiated by the Justice Department three months earlier at the request of the CIA.

According to the book "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal and the Selling of the Iraq War," by Michael Isikoff and David Corn, Fitzgerald had barely arrived in Washington when he received a thick binder filled with FBI reports. They summarized interviews that agents had conducted with Armitage, Rove, Libby and others.

And the reports made clear that senior White House officials had been discussing Plame's status not just with Novak but with other Washington journalists — including Judith Miller of the New York Times and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine.

Early on, the prosecutor learned that Rove may have been a corroborating source for the information Armitage provided to Novak. That fact alone would have compelled the special counsel to push on with the investigation, in the view of some experts.

"We now know that almost from the beginning of the case the prosecutor was confronted with two different investigative tracks," said Dan French, who served as a U.S. attorney during the Clinton administration. One track was Armitage, the other Rove and his top-level colleagues at the White House, he said.

"Objectively, this represents two separate lines of inquiry and a prosecutor in this situation would feel compelled to pursue both," said French, who represented a witness in the case.

Former White House staffers have told The Times that in 2003, Rove and Libby seemed intent on undermining the credibility of Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had been assigned by the CIA to look into reports that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein tried to buy enriched uranium from the African nation Niger.

Bush cited the claim — attributed to British intelligence — in his 2003 State of the Union address as evidence that Hussein was seeking nuclear weapons, even though Wilson's earlier report to the CIA indicated he had found little evidence to support the likelihood that any sale to Iraq had occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0061096

Wilson, who became an advisor to Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), later accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

In leaking the role of Wilson's wife at the CIA, administration officials suggested to journalists that she had promoted his mission as a boondoggle — not a serious inquiry.

As Fitzgerald examined the evidence, he seems to have concluded that some White House officials might not have been forthcoming to investigators about their conversations with reporters. That raised the possibility of a cover-up.

Intentionally leaking classified information or the name of an undercover intelligence agent is a federal crime, though the legal definition of "intent" remains murky. Making false or misleading statements to FBI or other federal investigators, or to a grand jury, can also be a crime.

In early February 2004, barely a month into his tenure, Fitzgerald sought and received a letter from his Justice Department boss stating that — in addition to probing the leaks — he was authorized to pursue possible obstruction of justice and related crimes.

Still, an impression remained in the public's mind that the key question was who provided information on Plame to Novak, the first journalist to write about her. While the public focused on Novak, investigators were asking about Matt Cooper's sources for a story he and others at Time had published on Time's website soon after Novak's column.

Cooper has since acknowledged that his primary source was Rove, with Libby also talking to him. Libby, the only person charged in the case, has pleaded not guilty to perjury and obstruction of justice.

According to Cooper, neither Rove nor Libby mentioned Plame by name. Nor did they mention her covert status, though Rove indicated she worked on WMD at "the Agency" and was responsible for her husband's trip. Spokesmen for both Libby and Rove pointed out that neither official initiated the conversations with Cooper.

Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, said his client did not initiate conversations with reporters about Plame, was unaware of her covert status, and did not encourage reporters to write about her.

Nonetheless, with the evidence he had, and with indications that these officials might have been less than candid with investigators, Fitzgerald decided to press on with his investigation even though he knew the answer to what the public considered the main question — who leaked to Bob Novak?

Armitage Leak Poses More Questions (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, September 9, 2006

For three years, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald knew the answer to one of the biggest questions in Washington: Who leaked the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame?

Now that former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage acknowledged this week that he was the leaker, the new question is what Fitzgerald has been looking for during a quest that rattled the White House and sent a reporter to jail.

"What was the rationale for seeking an answer to a question he already knew the answer to?" asked Wayne Berman, a former assistant secretary of commerce and a supporter of the only person indicted in the leak case, former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Fitzgerald's office had no response to that question Friday.

Armitage said he inadvertently revealed Plame's job to syndicated columnist Robert Novak in July 2003. That revelation came as Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Novak's column touched off claims that the White House was behind a smear campaign, which led to a federal investigation into the leak and whether it was part of a partisan effort to undermine Wilson's credibility.

Early in the inquiry, Armitage told authorities he was Novak's source. Armitage said Fitzgerald asked him to not to say that publicly. Fitzgerald then pressed on with the investigation, questioning White House aides. Among them was top Bush adviser Karl Rove, who appeared five times before a grand jury before being cleared of wrongdoing this summer.

When Libby was indicted in October 2005 on charges of obstruction of justice, perjury and lying to investigators, Fitzgerald said Libby was the first official to discuss Plame in a conversation with New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

DOJ_NMG_0061097

That's where this week's admission by Armitage muddles the case.

After Fitzgerald's comment about Libby at a news conference, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward reminded Armitage that he had made a passing comment to him days before Libby's conversation with Miller. That meant that Armitage, not Libby, had been the first to mention it to a reporter, and he quickly informed the prosecutor of that recollection.

Former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson, who has criticized Libby's prosecution, said Fitzgerald had a duty to set the record straight yet continued to urge Armitage's silence. Thompson said the case shows the worst side effects of appointing a special prosecutor.

"The whole world was watching Mr. Fitzgerald," Thompson said. "He had an extremely narrow focus and a lot of pressure to come up with something or somebody. He came up with a pea and tried to hold a press conference and hold it up as an elephant."

Armitage wasn't the only one asserting that his memory had failed. Both Libby and Rove have said they forgot details about their conversations with reporters. At least one of Rove's trips to the grand jury was so he could freshen his testimony with something he said he had forgotten in an earlier appearance.

Although Libby was the only one indicted, two reporters were threatened with jail for not disclosing sources. One of them — Miller — served 85 days.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said Friday she believes Fitzgerald knew that no crime had been committed with the leak of Plame's identity, yet he forced reporters to disclose their confidential sources and even sent Miller to jail.

"After a while, he didn't care who the source was," Dalglish said. "They just wanted to get somebody on obstruction."

Attorney Melanie Sloan, who represents the Wilsons in a civil lawsuit claiming Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney and others conspired to leak Plame's identity, said the investigation was necessary.

Fitzgerald knew Armitage's leak started the scandal, Sloan said, but he didn't know who else leaked information to the media. That's what the three-year investigation has been about, she said.

Berman, the Libby supporter, sees things differently. He said Armitage's admission contradicts the conspiracy theory and raises questions about why Libby was ever charged.

"Scooter was singled out, for whatever reason, by a prosecutor who appears to have made different decisions about people who had similar circumstances," Berman said.

Feds Interview Harris' Ex-campaign Manager (SPT)

By Anita Kumar, Times Staff Writer

St. Petersburg Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Federal investigators interviewed U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' former campaign manager as part of an ongoing federal inquiry into her relationship with a convicted defense contractor.

Jim Dornan, who left Harris' Senate campaign in November, spoke to investigators from the FBI and the Defense Department in Washington for about 90 minutes Thursday.

The Justice and Defense departments are examining Harris' dealings with Mitchell Wade, who made illegal campaign contributions to Harris and later asked her to help secure $10-million in federal money for a company project.

They have subpoenaed records from Harris' campaign office and have interviewed at least three former staffers: senior campaign consultant Ed Rollins, congressional chief of staff Fred Asbell and Mona Tate Yost, a congressional aide who later went to work for Wade.

A fourth employee, Kara Borie, Harris' former congressional spokeswoman, was contacted by investigators last month but it is unclear whether she was interviewed.

Dornan declined to comment. The Justice Department has refused to acknowledge an investigation.

Harris maintains she is not a target of the investigation.

Wade, who pleaded guilty to bribing another member of Congress, and Harris shared at least two dinners - each costing about $3,000 - at a tony Georgetown restaurant.

DOJ_NMG_0061098

Dornan was not working for Harris when she received the donations or requested the money for the project.

Harris of Longboat Key defeated three political newcomers Tuesday to cinch the Republican nomination for the Senate. She faces Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson in November.

Harris' campaign has faced a host of problems in recent months including enormous staff turnover.

Anita Kumar can be reached at 202 463-0576 or akumar@sptimes.com. [Last modified September 9, 2006, 01:20:33]

Pressure Mounts On Internet Gaming (AP-YBIZ)

By Jeff Douglas, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

Latest Arrest Turns Up Heat on Internet Gambling Operations

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- Gambling industry experts agree: If you operate an offshore gaming Web site, stay out of the U.S.

Moments after setting foot in the U.S. Thursday, Sportingbet PLC chairman Peter Dicks became the second U.K. offshore sports betting executive arrested in recent months for running an online gambling operation. Former BetOnSports PLC chief executive David Carruthers was arrested on federal charges in July.

It's still unclear if the arrest is a coincidence or part of a government crackdown, but some experts suspect the latter.

And as millions of dollars in bets for the NFL's opening weekend roll into thousands of Web sites, the pressure on the Internet gaming industry has intensified.

"You don't need legal expertise to know if you are running an offshore gambling site, don't come to America right now. You stand a good chance of being arrested," Internet gambling expert and lawyer Nelson Rose said.

Dicks, 64, was arrested at Kennedy International Airport in New York after flying from London, where his Web sites operate legally and are traded on the London Stock Exchange. More than $1.5 billion shares in the company were suspended by the LSE at Sportingbet's request Thursday.

Dicks was detained on a Louisiana state warrant from May for gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years year in prison and a $25,000 fine. Similar warrants have been issued for other Sportingbet associates, but authorities would not release information on who or how many of them are wanted.

Seven states have laws prohibiting Internet gambling. The arrest of Dicks marked the first time one of those states has taken action against one of thousands of big-time online gambling operations. Million of American players bet an estimated $6 billion per year online, according to industry figures.

While the Justice Department has said it is being more vigilant in prosecuting illegal offshore betting, the department said Thursday's arrest was not a coordinated effort with state authorities.

The warrant was issued in May and Dicks' name was flagged during a routine customs check at JFK airport.

Sportingbet Web sites continued to operate Friday and company officials said they expected to continue unless told otherwise by authorities.

BetOnSports closed its U.S. Web sites on a judge's order and fired Carruthers, who remains under house arrest on $1 million bond in the St. Louis area, awaiting trial. He faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges.

Lawmakers on both sides of the issue are pushing for change, including a proposed law to prohibit U.S. bank and credit transactions with online gambling operations.

Death Penalty Sought For Killing At Wheeler (HONADV)

By Curtis Lum, Advertiser Staff Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, September 9, 2006

The U.S. attorney's office in Hawai'i will seek the death penalty in the case of a Schofield Barracks soldier accused of beating to death his 5-year-old daughter last year.

It is only the second time the U.S. Justice Department has approved capital punishment in a Hawai'i case since the federal death penalty law was enacted in 1994.

Army Spc. Naeem Williams was indicted by a federal grand jury in February 2006 on one count of first-degree murder. He is accused of the beating death of his daughter, Talia Williams, at the Williams' Wheeler Army Airfield apartment on July 16, 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0061099

Last night, Tarshia Williams, Talia's mother, said from her South Carolina home that it was a "blessing" that the death penalty was approved for her former husband. Naeem Williams was granted custody of Talia in December 2004.

"I just wanted justice for my daughter. I've been praying for this for a year," Williams said. "I just want him to be punished for everything he did to my child. I feel like justice is about to be served."

Tarshia Williams said it's been a difficult year for her and she recently marked the anniversary of her child's death by releasing balloons at her grave.

"He tried so hard to get my daughter away from me ... ," Tarshia Williams said. "When I got my baby back, my baby was unrecognizable."

No trial date has been set, but Williams said she will be here for the trial.

David Klein, Williams' attorney, said that he will fight the imposition of the death penalty if his client is found guilty of murder.

"This is a tragic case that is being compounded by the unfortunate decision by the government to seek the death penalty, especially given Mr. Williams' lack of criminal history and exceptional military service," Klein said.

Williams remains at the Federal Detention Center in Hono-lulu, Klein said. He declined further comment.

Federal authorities said Talia was an abused child and that her father beat her and knocked her to the floor on the day she died. An autopsy showed that Talia died of "inflicted head trauma due to battered child syndrome," and authorities reported that the apartment's walls were spattered with blood.

Yesterday, U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo said that the decision to seek the death penalty was made by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"The Department of Justice has determined that the torture and murder of a young child warrants the death penalty. So we will march accordingly," Kubo said. He declined further comment.

Delilah Williams, Naeem Williams' wife, also has been charged with the murder of Talia.

The death penalty won't be sought against Delilah Williams, U.S. Attorney Marshall H. Silverberg said.

Naeem Williams is only the second person in Hawai'i who has faced the possibility of execution since the federal death penalty was enacted in 1994. The death penalty in four other capital murder cases was rejected while U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno was in office.

In 1999, then-U.S. Attorney Steven Alm was given the go-ahead to seek the death penalty against Richard Lee Tuck "China" Chong. Chong was charged with the 1997 shooting death of William Noa Jr. in Makaha over what prosecutors said was a $100 drug debt. Chong eventually pleaded guilty to the murder charge and was sentenced to life in prison. In September 2001, Chong committed suicide in his cell at the federal penitentiary in Lompoc, Calif.

Capital punishment was abolished by the Hawai'i territorial Legislature in 1957. The last execution under state law was in 1944. The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Reach Curtis Lum at culum@honoluluadvertiser.com.

Prosecutors Seeking Death Penalty In Child Beating (HSB)

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, September 9, 2006

Notice filed in federal court in Naeem Williams case

Federal prosecutors filed notice today that they intend to seek a federal death penalty for a Schofield Barracks soldier if he is convicted of first-degree murder for the death of his 5-year-old daughter.

Spc. Naeem Williams, 26, was indicted Feb. 15 for last year's death of Talia Williams. Her stepmother, Delilah Williams, 22, was also charged with murder, but hasn't been indicted.

The decision to seek the death penalty was made by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, according to U.S. Attorney Edward Kubo Jr.

The death penalty won't be sought against Delilah Williams, U.S. Attorney Marshall H. Silverberg said. Both are being held in Honolulu, he said.

Talia was taken by ambulance from the family's residence at Wheeler Army Airfield to Wahiawa General Hospital on July 16, 2005.

Emergency room doctors pronounced the child dead from “blunt head trauma due to battered child syndrome” shortly after she arrived. Doctors said the girl had bruises on her arms, chest, knees and thighs and a cut on her back.

Court documents have quoted Delilah Williams as saying her husband struck Talia with a belt because she had wet herself, and when he found out she had wet herself again, he struck her again, and she fell, hitting her head on the floor.

Hawaii has no death penalty, but Williams will be tried in the state under the federal death penalty law, Silverberg said.

The case is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court because the crime allegedly occurred on a military base, he said.

A trial date for Williams has not been set.

Only a handful of federal executions have taken place since the 1960s, with fewer than 50 federal death row inmates nationwide.

Only one other person has faced the federal death penalty in Hawaii since the 1950s.

Richard “China” Chong avoided a death sentence in 2000 by agreeing to plead guilty to the 1997 murder of William Noa Jr. over a $100 drug debt.

Chong was sentenced in 2001 to life in prison without the possibility of parole, but died of an apparent suicide about three months later at the federal penitentiary in Lompoc, Calif.

Jail For Va. Man Who Gave China Secrets (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 9, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-A former Pentagon intelligence analyst who disclosed classified information to Chinese spies was sentenced Friday to three months in jail.

Ronald N. Montaperto, 67, pleaded guilty earlier this year in federal court to unlawful retention of classified documents. He admitted that he had contacts with two intelligence officers from China as early as 1983 and as recently as 2001.

At his sentencing, Montaperto said he had wanted to boost his status in the intelligence community and obtain useful intelligence for the United States. "I never meant to hurt my country in any way," he said.

Montaperto's lawyer, Stephen Anthony, said Montaperto was an academic and was untrained in dealing with Chinese spies, and that they essentially wheedled him into making illegal disclosures.

In rejecting prosecutors' request for a term of about two years, U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that there was no evidence that Montaperto sought to profit financially from his disclosures, and that the government would not have had a case had he not admitted his misconduct.

Pentagon Analyst Gets Light Jail Term (WT)

By Bill Gertz, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

A former Pentagon analyst who passed highly classified intelligence to two Chinese military officers was sentenced to three months in prison yesterday -- far shy of four to five years called for in sentencing guidelines.

Federal Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that despite the "very serious charge" against Ronald Montaperto, he was swayed to reduce the sentence based on letters of support from current and former intelligence and military officials.

Montaperto, 67, who pleaded guilty in June to unlawful retention of classified documents he obtained while working at the Defense Intelligence Agency, said he was trying to get intelligence for the United States from the Chinese officials.

"I never meant to hurt my country in any way," Mr. Montaperto said during his hearing at U.S. District Court in Alexandria. He worked at the Pentagon from 1981 until his dismissal in 2003.

Neil Hammerstrom, the assistant U.S. attorney, told the court that Montaperto met 60 times with two Chinese military intelligence officers and provided both secret and top secret information during the meetings.

Mr. Hammerstrom asked for at least a two-year sentence, arguing a tough prison term was needed because Montaperto "repeatedly placed in jeopardy sensitive sources and methods pertaining to our national security."

Montaperto told investigators he could not remember the specifics of the classified information he passed to Chinese intelligence, lapses that prevented prosecutors from charging him with more serious spy charges.

U.S. officials said a major U.S. electronic eavesdropping operation against China went silent around the time Montaperto admitted passing the highly classified data to the Chinese in 1988.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, chairman of the House intelligence committee, said he is concerned by the apparent support for Montaperto from the U.S. intelligence community and promised a committee probe.

"You would think that the intel community would set the standard for holding people accountable for mishandling and passing of classified information to our enemies," Mr. Hoekstra said.

Among the officials who wrote letters of support were Lonnie Henley, currently the deputy national intelligence officer for East Asia in the office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte. Mr. Henley said he has been "close friends" with Montaperto since the 1980s.

Another supporter was retired Rear Adm. Eric McVadon, who currently holds a security clearance as a consultant on China to the CIA and Pentagon. Adm. McVadon said he would not second guess the case against his friend but could only "recoil at characterizations of him in the press as a spy."

Judge Lee said he also considered Montaperto's "extraordinary" voluntary confessions in the light sentence, which includes three months of home detention and five years' probation.

However, investigators said Montaperto did not reveal or admit the passing of secrets until fooled into making the admissions in a 2003 sting operation while he worked at the U.S. Pacific Command think tank in Hawaii.

U.S. intelligence officials have said Montaperto was first investigated in the late 1980s after a Chinese defector said Beijing considered him one of their "dear friends," or informal supporters of China.

The light sentence contrasts with the 12-year prison term given in January to another former Pentagon official, Larry Franklin, who was convicted of providing classified information to two officials of the America Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Jail For Va. Man Who Gave China Secrets (AP)

AP, September 9, 2006

A former Pentagon intelligence analyst who disclosed classified information to Chinese spies was sentenced Friday to three months in jail.

Ronald N. Montaperto, 67, pleaded guilty earlier this year in federal court to unlawful retention of classified documents. He admitted that he had contacts with two intelligence officers from China as early as 1983 and as recently as 2001.

At his sentencing, Montaperto said he had wanted to boost his status in the intelligence community and obtain useful intelligence for the United States. "I never meant to hurt my country in any way," he said.

Montaperto's lawyer, Stephen Anthony, said Montaperto was an academic and was untrained in dealing with Chinese spies, and that they essentially wheedled him into making illegal disclosures.

In rejecting prosecutors' request for a term of about two years, U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that there was no evidence that Montaperto sought to profit financially from his disclosures, and that the government would not have had a case had he not admitted his misconduct.

Officials Capture Fugitive On FBI's 10 Most Wanted List (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 9, 2006

CARROLL, N.Y. -- Ralph "Bucky" Phillips turned, pistol in hand. A dog's growl had tipped him that, one more time, police were within seconds of snatching away his freedom.

State police said a trooper fired off a volley of shots in the woods of western New York, about 30 miles from where Phillips is accused of killing a fellow trooper and seriously wounding another.

This time the escaped convict didn't get a shot off. He just ran.

But Phillips, who had already given police the slip several times during five months on the run, couldn't shake his pursuers. The cordon around one of America's most wanted criminals tightened throughout the afternoon and into the evening.

At 8 p.m., an exhausted and gaunt Phillips, with helicopters above and SWAT teams and U.S. Marshals closing in, threw up his hands and surrendered.

"He could run but he couldn't hide," said New York State Police Superintendent Wayne Bennett. "The bottom line is the pressure was so great on him. The game was up and he knew it."

Phillips was being taken to a jail in Buffalo and was to be arraigned Saturday morning. He faces a charge of attempted murder in connection with the shooting of a state trooper on June 10.

Before his capture, Bennett said Phillips wasn't expecting the kind of rapid response and overwhelming manpower brought to bear on the search.

Bennett said Phillips was the "ultimate" danger to police.

"He knows he's facing dying in prison," he said before Phillips was caught. "If that doesn't make him desperate, I'm not sure what will."

Hours after the confrontation near Carroll, a town about 65 miles south of Buffalo, Bennett said there had been two more sightings of Phillips and that the search was focused on a square mile of woods, cornfields and open areas in nearby Pennsylvania.

Local, state and federal police used helicopters, roadblocks and dogs to end the state's largest manhunt ever.

Bennett said residents in the area were not evacuated.

Phillips, 44, is a career thief who broke out of a Buffalo-area jail in April by using a can opener to cut his way through a ceiling. He has threatened "suicide by cop" and once promised to "splatter pig meat all over Chautauqua County."

In June, police believe he shot a state trooper who had pulled over the car he was driving. Phillips escaped and the trooper survived.

On Aug. 31, police say he ambushed two state troopers who were staking out the house of his former girlfriend. Three days later, one of the troopers died. The other remains in critical condition in a Pennsylvania hospital.

Since his escape, he twisted and turned his way throughout southwestern New York and northwestern Pennsylvania, eluding a huge manhunt, stealing cars, burglarizing homes and camps and relying on a network of acquaintances to stay free, police said. He may have stolen 41 guns from a New York gun shop, authorities said.

On Thursday, the FBI put Phillips on its 10 Most Wanted list.

Friday's search started shortly before 2 a.m. in Pennsylvania when a police officer tried to pull over a stolen car. After a short chase, the car crashed and the driver, identified by police as Phillips, fled into the woods.

A half-hour later, Phillips stole a second car and drove back into New York, where troopers located him and launched a second chase, authorities said.

Phillips jumped out of the moving car and ducked into woods, zigzagging back and forth between New York and Pennsylvania, authorities said.

Police dogs tracked his scent for several hours until he was spotted in a field by federal marshals.

The helicopter zeroed in on him and it was over.

___P>

Associated Press Writers Chris Carola and Michael Virtanen in Albany, and Mike Cowden and Mark Scolforo in Pennsylvania contributed to this report.

___P>

On the Net:

http://www.fbi.gov/wanted/topten/fugitives/fugitives.htm

Fugitive Wanted In Shootings Of 3 Troopers Surrenders (NYT)

By Michael Wilson And David Staba

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

DUNKIRK, N.Y., Sept. 8 — The fugitive Ralph J. Phillips surrendered to the police on Friday night, ending a five-month manhunt in which one state trooper was killed in an ambush and two were wounded.

About 8 p.m., Mr. Phillips, hands in the air, emerged from the woods across the New York State line in northern Pennsylvania, where he had been cornered in a one-square-mile swath of tall brush.

DOJ_NMG_0061103

His surrender came just minutes before the search was to be halted for the night, the New York State Police said. Mr. Phillips, 44, was quickly taken out of the woods near the town of Akeley, Pa., in a police car while state troopers cheered inside a command tent.

Mr. Phillips, also known as Bucky, slumped with his head against the rear seat, his hair long, thin and tangled. He appeared to be exhausted, but unhurt.

"Bucky Philips, as I told you before, he could run, but he couldn't hide, and he is in custody," said Superintendent Wayne E. Bennett of the state police.

In the previous hours, he was chased by cars, tracked by helicopters and bloodhounds and fired at by a trooper, and finally surrounded.

Many of the people who lived nearby, as well as Mr. Phillips's friends and relatives, had speculated that he would not be taken alive, and they expressed relief when he was.

After the capture, residents clapped and shouted along the dark roads.

Mr. Phillips had been a fugitive since April 2, when he escaped from the Erie County jail where he was serving a 90-day sentence on a parole violation. He is expected to be arraigned Saturday on escape charges and of charges connected with the June 10 shooting that left a trooper injured during a traffic stop in Chemung County in central New York.

Mr. Phillips is also a suspect in the Aug. 31 shooting of two state troopers outside his former companion's house in Stockton, in western New York.

Trooper Joseph A. Longobardo was struck in the thigh and died on Sunday, a day after doctors amputated his leg.

Trooper Donald Baker Jr., who was hit in the abdomen, remained in critical condition in an Erie, Pa., hospital on Friday.

Mr. Phillips has not been charged in those shootings.

Less than an hour before the capture, as dusk approached, the authorities said that the search would be suspended when it grew dark, and that troopers would secure the area with a tight perimeter of officers and cars.

The searchers got a break at 1:55 a.m. on Friday when a sheriff's deputy from Warren County, Pa., chased a stolen car. The car crashed into a tree, and the driver fled into the woods, the police said.

At 2:25 a.m., a second car in the area was reported stolen. The police saw that car about 20 minutes later and gave chase.

This time, the driver jumped out of the car while it was still moving, the police said. Again, he scrambled into the woods.

Hundreds of troopers and officers from other agencies swarmed into the area. The police found evidence in the car — exactly what was not disclosed Friday — that was used to give bloodhounds the suspect's scent.

"We need scent," Superintendent Bennett said. "It doesn't get any better than that."

"What occurred with the stolen cars was spontaneous — there was no time to put any plan into effect," Superintendent Bennett said on Friday afternoon in the first of three afternoon news conferences.

"That's an advantage to us. He didn't have any time to contact anyone or get to a safe house."

At 9:10 a.m., two troopers and a police dog came upon a man they identified as Mr. Phillips from behind, a short distance away. At the sound of the dog's growl, Mr. Phillips spun around with a pistol in his left hand, pointing it at the troopers, and one of the troopers shot at him, the police said.

Mr. Phillips did not fire. He fled, and it was unclear at the time whether he had been struck by the bullet. But he was uninjured, and unarmed, when he surrendered, the police said.

About six hours later, around 3 p.m., there were two more sightings of Mr. Phillips within 30 minutes, one by a trooper and one by a civilian. He had been running in one instance and crawling through brush in the other, Superintendent Bennett said.

Mr. Phillips had crisscrossed creeks in the area in an apparent attempt to confuse the police dogs tracking his scent, the police said.

The searchers closed in on him from the ground and above.

"He got to the point where there wasn't any place to go," Superintendent Bennett said. "You get to the point where there's a helicopter over your head and people with high-powered rifles coming toward you. The game is up."

In April, Mr. Phillips used a can opener to pry open a hole in a kitchen ceiling and escape from jail.

DOJ_NMG_0061104

His criminal background, while long, included no violent crimes, and so the June 10 shooting of Trooper Sean M. Brown in Chemung County surprised residents who knew Mr. Phillips.

Trooper Brown was shot in the abdomen, and his injuries were the least severe of the three troopers struck.

By the end of the manhunt, the reward for information leading to Mr. Phillips's capture had grown to $425,000, and he had been added to the F.B.I.'s 10 Most Wanted List, just three names down from Osama bin Laden.

Seven people have been charged with aiding Mr. Phillips during his flight, including his daughter, her boyfriend and her mother,

"I would have to believe he's somewhat exhausted," Superintendent Bennett said after the surrender. "You constantly have to look around. You constantly have to look over your shoulder. I would say he's exhausted. We put a big chase on him today."

Capture Ends Fugitive's Long Run (ALBANYTU)

By Jordan Carleo-evangelist, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, September 9, 2006

Police catch suspected cop killer in woods in Pennsylvania

AKELEY, Pa. -- Ralph "Bucky" Phillips, the man suspected of shooting three New York state troopers in his five-month flight from justice, was taken into custody just before 8 p.m. Friday in rural Pennsylvania.

Phillips, 44, the subject of New York's largest manhunt, was driven out of a wooded area in a Pennsylvania State Police car, past dozens of residents cheering the officers.

The suspected cop killer slumped in the back seat, surrounded by state troopers.

Many officers, including numerous New York state troopers, shared the crowd's excitement -- blaring sirens, honking horns and returning words of thanks.

A raucous shout also went up at the police command post in Carroll, N.Y., witnesses said.

"Bucky Phillips, as I told you before -- he could run, but he couldn't hide," said State Police Superintendent Wayne Bennett. "The bottom line is that the good guys won here."

The excitement was tempered by the death of Trooper Joseph Longobardo on Sunday. The Greenfield resident, who worked out of Wilton, was ambushed with Trooper Donald Baker Jr. of Clifton Park in the woods near Phillips' hometown last week. Authorities have said Phillips is the main suspect.

Baker remains hospitalized in critical condition in an Erie, Pa., hospital. Longobardo's wake is scheduled to start Saturday.

Authorities also allege Phillips shot Trooper Sean Brown in Chemung County on June 10.

The hunt for Phillips -- previously centered in his native Chautauqua County in New York -- took a dramatic turn south early Friday morning.

Authorities focused on an area spanning Chautauqua County and Warren County, Pennsylvania. They captured Phillips as hundreds of law enforcement officers rushed against the coming darkness to search a one-square- mile rectangle in which they believed they had him cornered. Standing almost within arm's length of each other, the officers on one side of that rectangle methodically closed in, Bennett said.

"You're not going to shoot one of our people and get away with it," the superintendent said. "We will track you down. We will hunt you down for as long as it takes."

According to Bennett, here's what happened in the early hours Friday:

The search began just before 2 a.m. in Warren County. There, a sheriff's deputy pursued a stolen car for several minutes before it crashed into a tree and its occupant ran away.

About a half-hour later, a second car was stolen in Pennsylvania. New York State Police spotted that car in the extreme southern end of Chautauqua County. After a brief chase, the driver fled the car while it was still moving and ran off into the woods.

Hundreds of law enforcement officers descended on the town of Carroll and neighboring communities in Pennsylvania, where they searched for Phillips by ground and air. At 9:10 a.m., two New York state troopers encountered a man who matched Phillips' description in the woods. The man turned with a pistol in his left hand, and a trooper fired.

The gunman did not fire back before fleeing.

DOJ_NMG_0061105

Just before dusk, an exhausted, dirty and bearded Phillips appeared near a wood line in binocular sights of a Warren County sheriff's deputy.

The deputy alerted nearby SWAT teams and a helicopter descended on Phillips, who quickly realized he was surrounded and gave up without a fight. Phillips was ordered to raise his hands and was taken into custody.

"The game was up -- and he knew it," Bennett said.

In a law enforcement convoy that included a helicopter, Phillips was whisked almost 70 miles toward Buffalo where he is scheduled to be arraigned at 10 a.m. Saturday in federal court as a fugitive, Bennett said. Late Friday, Phillips was scheduled to arrive at the same Erie County jail he broke out of five months ago.

"What I can tell you is he won't get away from us while we're transporting him," Bennett promised.

After his court appearance, Phillips will be taken to Chemung County to be arraigned on an attempted murder charge for allegedly shooting Brown.

Phillips did not appear to be injured, Bennett said. No law enforcement officers were reported injured.

"Our job is to apprehend him," Bennett said. "If necessary, we were prepared to kill him."

In a statement, Gov. George E. Pataki thanked law enforcement, adding, "The streets are much safer and the citizens of New York can sleep much sounder tonight."

Before midnight, at the White Horse Inn on the village line of Cassadaga, near where Baker and Longobardo were shot, the marquee outside already read, "Bye Bye Bucky, Bye Bye."

Jordan Carleo-Evangelist can be reached at 454-5445 or by e-mail at jcarleo-evangelist@ timesunion.com.

Around The Nation (WT)

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Police capture escaped convict

CARROLL, N.Y. -- A fugitive suspected of fatally shooting a New York state trooper and wounding two others while on the run for more than five months surrendered to police who had cornered him in a field just over the Pennsylvania border last night.

Ralph "Bucky" Phillips walked out with his hands up, ending a manhunt for the 44-year-old career thief who broke out of a Buffalo-area jail in April, New York State Police investigator Gary Colon said.

Phillips, who was on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted List, was being taken to a jail in Buffalo and is to be arraigned this morning. He faces a charge of attempted murder in connection with the shooting of a state trooper on June 10.

Businessman tied to lawmaker sentenced

A Kentucky businessman who admitted paying more than $400,000 in bribes to a Louisiana congressman was sentenced yesterday to more than seven years in prison.

Vernon Jackson, 54, of Louisville, is a key figure in the federal investigation of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat. The chief executive of the telecommunications firm IGate Inc. said he paid the bribes to gain the congressman's help in obtaining business deals in Africa.

The bribes paid by Jackson, including stocks and cash paid to a company controlled by Mr. Jefferson's family, had a value of $400,000 to $1 million, according to court records.

Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing.

Schwarzenegger apologizes for remarks

SANTA MONICA, Calif. -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized yesterday for saying during a closed-door meeting that Cubans and Puerto Ricans are naturally feisty and temperamental because of their combination of "black blood" and "Latino blood."

He said the tape-recorded comments "made me cringe" when he read them in yesterday's Los Angeles Times.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I'm sorry, I apologize," Mr. Schwarzenegger said. He added that if he heard his children make similar comments, "I would be upset."

FDA fines Red Cross millions in safety case

The government said yesterday it was fining the American Red Cross $4.2 million for violating blood-safety laws.

DOJ_NMG_0061106

The violations include failing to ask appropriate questions of potential donors and not following test procedures, said the Food and Drug Administration. The FDA said it had no evidence of serious health consequences resulting from the violations.

The fine was the largest single penalty assessed so far under terms of a 2003 court settlement, which allows large fines when the Red Cross violates FDA rules. Previously, the FDA had fined the Red Cross a total of $5.7 million.

In a statement, the American Red Cross said its senior management "is committed to full compliance with the amended consent decree and all applicable federal regulations." It planned to respond to the FDA within 20 days.

WTC families seek help for survivors

NEW YORK -- The father of a police detective who died after breathing in dust from ground zero wreckage told lawmakers yesterday that the government has spent too much time studying the health problems that killed his son.

"We must make the first priority the treatment of the heroes to improve their heath and save their lives. The studies should be secondary," Joseph Zadroga, father of New York Police Department Detective James Zadroga, told a House subcommittee hearing near the World Trade Center.

Public pressure has been growing for the government to deal with health problems blamed on the toxic dust from the site of the September 11, 2001, attacks.

This week, a hospital study concluded nearly 70 percent of ground zero workers had lung problems, and many of them would likely be sick for the rest of their lives.

From staff reports and wire dispatches

CIVIL LAW:

Iraq Contractor Inflated Costs, Lawsuit Alleges (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A former employee of a Halliburton subsidiary claims that she was fired for revealing to her managers that the company was charging the government fraudulently inflated costs for military facilities it ran in Iraq, according to court papers unsealed yesterday.

At bases in Anbar Province, the desert homeland of Iraq's bitter Sunni-led insurgency, company employees faked head counts to inflate its charges for operating recreational and dining facilities, and led a relatively lavish lifestyle by appropriating food and equipment meant for the troops, the papers charge.

The suit in federal court by the former employee, Julie McBride, is the second corporate whistleblower case to emerge from Iraq. In the first, a jury found the security company Custer Battles guilty of inflating invoices by $3 million, but the case is now going to appeal after a judge held up the settlement.

A spokeswoman for Halliburton, Cathy Mann, said that there had been no wrongdoing by the subsidiary, KBR, formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root.

"The claims included in this lawsuit clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts as well as a lack of understanding of KBR's contractual agreements with its customer, the U.S. Army," Ms. Mann said in a written statement.

Ms. Mann said that the company's charges to the government did not depend on head counts and that KBR employees were contractually entitled to use the food and recreational equipment at camps in Iraq, just as the troops were.

Those assertions were disputed by a lawyer in the case, Alan Grayson, of Grayson & Kubli in McLean, Va., the same firm that represented whistleblowers in the Custer Battles case. He asserted that the KBR employees enjoyed indulgences ranging from cases of soda and tubs of food to big-screen TV's and exercise equipment.

The case is being brought under the False Claims Act, which allows the government to collect triple any damages that a jury might award. The law allows Ms. McBride, as a whistleblower, to collect anywhere from 15 to 30 percent of that assessment if her case is successful. Ms. McBride was not immediately available for comment, but Mr. Grayson said that she is a former lawyer who has two children and now lives in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0061107

Whistle-blower Slams Iraq Contractor (AP-Y)

By Deborah Hastings

AP, September 9, 2006

Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg, Brown & Root charged millions to the government for recreational services never provided to U.S. troops in Iraq, including giant tubs of chicken wings and tacos, a widescreen TV, and cheese sticks meant for a military Super Bowl party, according to a federal whistle-blower suit unsealed Friday.

Instead, the suit alleges, KBR used the military's supplies for its own football party.

Filed last year in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., by former KBR employee Julie McBride, the lawsuit claims the giant defense contractor billed the government for thousands of meals it never served, inflated the number of soldiers using its fitness and Internet centers, and regularly siphoned off great quantities of supplies destined for American soldiers.

McBride was hired by KBR in 2004 as a "morale, welfare and recreation" coordinator at Camp Fallujah, a Marine installation about 35 miles west of Baghdad. She was fired the next year after making several complaints about KBR's accounting practices, the suit says, and was kept under guard until she was escorted to an airplane and flown out of the country.

Halliburton denied McBride's allegations.

"The claims included in this lawsuit clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts as well as a lack of understanding of KBR's contractual agreements with its customer," said company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

The Super Bowl incident occurred in January 2005, the suit said. "McBride witnessed a large amount of food that was ordered specifically for a Super Bowl party for the military" taken instead to the company's lodgings. "About 10 large metal tubs full of tacos, chicken wings, (and) cheese sticks were taken from the military party site to a KBR camp for a KBR Super Bowl Party for KBR employees," according to the complaint. A widescreen TV was also removed.

McBride worked 12-hour shifts, seven days a week, at Camp Fallujah's recreation center, where the government was billed according to the number of soldiers using the contractor's facilities, which included a weight room, video games, Internet cafe, a library and phone bank, the suit says. She alleges that KBR deliberately overstated the number of military personnel using its services by counting the same person several times. For example, a person who used a computer was counted as one. If that person went on the weight room, another count was added to the list of patrons.

"It wasn't double-dipping, but triple dipping or even quadruple billing," the suit claims.

Attorney Alan Grayson, who represents McBride, said "millions of dollars have been submitted by Halliburton for recreational services" not provided.

The "qui tam" suit, filed under the federal False Claims Act, allows citizens to sue on behalf of the government against contractors who make false claims for payment. The plaintiffs are eligible to receive a percentage of awarded damages, which are tripled in this type of suit.

Such suits are usually sealed for 60 days while the Justice Department investigates the claims and decides whether the U.S. Attorney's office will sign on as a co-plaintiff.

The Justice Department declined comment Friday on why it chose not to participate in McBride's suit.

McBride is not the first Halliburton employee to allege fraudulent billing practices. The company has steadfastly denied wrongdoing.

Rory Mayberry, who worked for KBR in 2004, testified from Iraq via videotape to a group of Democratic members of Congress investigating contractor fraud.

As food manager at another military camp in Iraq, Mayberry said he witnessed KBR employees serving spoiled food to American troops, including food from trucks that had been bombed and shot at. Workers were told to pick out the shrapnel, and then serve the food, Mayberry testified.

He also claimed KBR charged the government for meals it never served.

In July 2004, former KBR planner Marie DeYoung testified before the House Committee on Government Reform. She said she witnessed "significant waste and overpricing" while working for the contractor in Kuwait, including paying a subcontractor $100 per 15 pounds of laundry, costs which were passed on to the government.

Halliburton, which holds more than 50 percent of rebuilding contracts in Iraq, was headed by Dick Cheney before he took office as vice president. He has denied any government favoritism toward his former company.

Halliburton Fraud Lawsuit Details Super Bowl Party (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Halliburton Co. executives ordered a big-screen television and 10 large tubs of tacos, chicken wings and cheese sticks delivered to Iraq for last year's Super Bowl, then billed U.S. taxpayers for their party, according to a lawsuit unsealed Friday.

The Houston-based company also defrauded the government by double- and triple-billing for Internet, food and gym services for soldiers, according to the lawsuit by a former employee for KBR, the Halliburton subsidiary that runs dining halls for troops in Iraq.

"The administration is not enforcing the laws against fraud when it comes to contractors in Iraq," said Alan Grayson, the attorney who filed the suit. "When it comes to seeing that the law is executed, the Bush administration is a no-show."

Halliburton denied the allegations, filed under the False Claims Act. Designed to prevent war profiteering, such lawsuits allow citizens to sue on behalf of the government and recover a portion of any damages.

The company did not deny ordering the TV and the food; it set up snack buffets and screenings at military bases throughout Iraq for the 2005 Super Bowl. But KBR noted that its contract allowed the firm to provide recreation and morale-boosting services for its employees and for American soldiers.

"The claims included in this lawsuit clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts as well as a lack of understanding of KBR's contractual agreements with its customer, the U.S. Army," Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said.

The accusations in the lawsuit are the latest involving Halliburton's controversial multibillion-dollar contract to feed and house American soldiers in Iraq. Democrats have been quick to criticize the company, which was run by Vice President Dick Cheney from 1995 to 2000.

In June, a KBR subcontractor was indicted on kickback charges involving the dining halls, which feed tens of thousands of soldiers a day in camps throughout Iraq and Kuwait. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has withheld $55.1 million out of a total of $13.7 billion in payments on the contract as a result of disputed costs.

The Department of Justice chose not to join the lawsuit against Halliburton after conducting an investigation. Justice officials declined to elaborate Friday, but in legal circles such a decision is usually considered indication of a weak case.

Grayson accused the department of shirking its duties in the middle of a political season. Several dozen lawsuits alleging fraud in Iraq are believed to have been filed, but they remain under seal until the department completes its investigations.

Grayson is best known for having won another fraud case, which Justice officials also passed up, against a private security company named Custer Battles. That decision was recently overturned by a federal judge and is now on appeal.

Grayson, who recently lost a primary race for a House seat in Florida running as a Democrat, denied any political motivations in pursuing the case against Halliburton, noting that he had filed it before deciding to run for office.

He said that the whistle-blower in the case, Julie McBride, came forward only after KBR officials ignored her complaints. McBride said in the lawsuit that she was placed under armed guard and then fired after she raised questions about Halliburton's billing practices. She could not be reached for comment Friday.

Justice Department officials "are stonewalling and keeping these cases under seal unnecessarily," Grayson said.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), who has been the leader in Congress in attacking Halliburton, said that the charges were further proof of war profiteering by the oil services giant.

"One former Halliburton employee after another tells the same story of outrageous and intentional overcharging," Waxman said in a statement. "Yet no one in the Bush administration seems to care."

Government Won't Join Lawsuit (HC/BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly, Bloomberg News

Houston Chronicle, September 9, 2006

Whistle-blower says Halliburton overcharged for Iraqi recreation

The Justice Department declined to join a whistle-blower suit against Halliburton Co. that accuses the Houston-based company of overcharging the government in contracts to operate recreation facilities for soldiers in Iraq.

Julie McBride, a morale, welfare and recreation coordinator employed by a Halliburton unit in Iraq, alleged in an April 26 complaint unsealed Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington that the company sought to artificially inflate revenue by overestimating the number of soldiers using its facilities.

On June 27, the U.S. declined to take part in the case, according to court records. The False Claims Act allows individual whistle-blowers to sue on behalf of the government and recover part of any settlement or verdict. The Justice Department then decides whether to take part, and while plaintiffs may continue to pursue a case if the U.S. declines to join, they must do so at their own expense.

"I think it is irresponsible," Alan Grayson, McBride's lawyer, said of the government's decision. He said his client will continue to pursue the case.

Cynthia Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the complaint but said the agency "diligently investigates all allegations before determining whether or not to intervene."

The government often doesn't join false claim cases, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a nonprofit policy group.

KBR vehemently denied the allegations of fraud.

"We intend to vigorously defend our position," spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said in a prepared statement.

The lawsuit also accused Halliburton executives of ordering a big-screen TV and 10 large tubs of tacos, chicken wings and cheese sticks delivered to Iraq for last year's Super Bowl, then billing taxpayers.

The company did not deny ordering the television and the food; it set up snack buffets and special screenings at military bases throughout Iraq for the 2005 Super Bowl. But KBR noted that its contract allowed the company to provide recreation and morale-boosting services for its own employees, as well as American soldiers.

Halliburton's KBR subsidiary helps run dozens of military camps across Iraq where it operates facilities, including fitness centers and Internet cafes. The Army through July has placed $17 billion worth of orders for Iraq services and paid Halliburton $15 billion.

The Army said in July it will end Halliburton's multibillion-dollar agreement to handle troop services in Iraq later this year and put the five-year contract up for bid.

Grayson, who recently lost a primary race for a House seat in Florida running as a Democrat, denied any political motivations in pursuing the case.

The Los Angeles Times contributed to this report.

Pfizer Wins Dismissal Of Suit By Former Executive (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly And Shannon Pettypiece

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Pfizer Inc., the world's largest drugmaker, won dismissal of a ``whistleblower" lawsuit by a former executive who accused the company of promoting unapproved uses for Genotropin, a growth hormone.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Tauro in Boston dismissed the suit by Peter Rost, who was a vice president of marketing at Pfizer until he was fired in December 2005. Rost said in a telephone interview that he plans to appeal.

Rost sued Pfizer in 2003 under the False Claims Act, alleging the New York-based company illegally promoted Genotropin for so-called off-label uses and gained sales of $50 million in 2002 as a result. Rost has criticized the drug industry, including Pfizer, for positions such as opposing legislation that would allow Americans to buy drugs abroad. He is also suing Pfizer for wrongful termination in a separate case.

Rost's suit ``fails to identify one actual false claim that was submitted to the government for the reimbursement of an off-label prescription of Genotropin," Tauro said in his Aug. 30 order. ``No matter how likely the existence of false claims, this court cannot speculate that such claims inevitably flowed from defendants' activities."

Pfizer spokesman Paul Fitzhenry said the court ruling ``sends a very clear message" about the merits of the case by dismissing it in its entirety without giving Rost an opportunity to amend his complaint.

The Justice Department in December said it wouldn't join Rost's suit. He was fired the same day.

Genotropin Approval

The Food and Drug Administration approved Genotropin for medical conditions including growth deficiency in children and adults. Rost alleged Pfizer promoted the drug as an anti-aging treatment for adults and for short stature in children that wasn't caused by hormone deficiency.

``We will amend our complaint with the requested data and expect to prevail with an appeal," Rost said.

Shares of Pfizer rose 14 cents to $27.59 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They've risen 18 percent this year.

The False Claims Act allows individuals, known as whistleblowers, to sue for fraud on behalf of the government and recover part of any settlement or verdict. The government reviews such cases and decides whether to take part.

Rost has had a series of disputes with employers. He publicly criticized Pfizer and the pharmaceutical industry in 2004 for opposing legislation that would allow U.S. citizens to buy drugs abroad. In 2001 he sued Wyeth, where he'd worked previously, claiming he was forced to quit his job at the drugmaker after he told superiors that managers were helping workers evade taxes in Sweden. Rost settled the case with Wyeth.

The case is Rost v. Pfizer, 05cv10384, U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

To contact the reporter on this story: Cary O'Reilly in Washington at caryoreilly@bloomberg.net ; Shannon Pettypiece in Washington at spettypiece@bloomberg.net

ANTITRUST:

Michaels Sale Wins Antitrust Approval (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

The $6 billion sale of Michaels Stores Inc. to Bain Capital LLC and Blackstone Group LP won U.S. antitrust clearance, according to a list of terminated merger reviews published by the government.

The sale of the biggest U.S. arts and craft retailer to the two private-equity firms was on the list published by the Federal Trade Commission. Bain Capital and Blackstone agreed June 30 to purchase equal shares of Michaels Stores, based in Irving.

Under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, transactions of more than $56 million must be reported to the Justice Department and FTC to give the agencies an opportunity to determine if they might violate antitrust laws. The agencies have 30 days to decide whether to open an investigation or terminate the merger review.

The Justice Department is investigating Michaels' granting of stock options since 1996. A company spokesman said yesterday that an internal review conducted by an independent legal counsel found no evidence to support a conclusion that there was intentional misconduct.

Michaels Buyout Wins Antitrust Clearance (DALBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 9, 2006

Arts and crafts retailer Michaels Stores Inc.'s $6 billion sale to private equity firms The Blackstone Group and Bain Capital has gained approval from anti-trust regulators, according to a government listing of terminated merger reviews.

The move was published on the Federal Trade Commissions list of early termination notices. An early termination is granted only when the FTC and the Department of Justice Antitrust Division have completed their review of the deal and determined not to take any action.

The deal is expected to close late during the third quarter or early in the fourth quarter.

Michaels (NYSE: MIK - News) is the subject of a Justice Department investigation related to its granting of stock options that is ongoing.

DOJ_NMG_0061111

The company also faces shareholder lawsuits alleging infractions in the granting of stock options to certain officers and directors from 1994 through 2000, and class-action allegations regarding the proposed buyout of the company.

Alltel To Sell Operations In Rural Minnesota As Part Of Midwest Purchase (RCRWN)

By Jeffrey Silva

RCR Wireless News, September 8, 2006

WASHINGTON—The Justice Department said Alltel Corp. agreed to sell wireless assets in several rural Minnesota markets as a condition to antitrust approval of its $1 billion purchase of regional operator Midwest Wireless.

"The department's action ensures that wireless telephone consumers will continue to obtain the benefits of competition—lower prices and higher quality," said Thomas Barnett, chief of the department's antitrust division. "The required divestitures preserve competition in rural areas where consumers often have fewer choices for wireless telephone services."

The state of Minnesota supports the divestiture, in which Alltel will get rid of mobile phone systems in four rural markets where Midwest also offers service, and the issue is now headed to a federal judge for consideration. The Federal Communications Commission too is expected to rule on the Alltel-Midwest Wireless deal by month's end.

U.S. Cellular Corp. previously warned the FCC that an Alltel-Midwest tie-up would hurt competition in southern Minnesota.

Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., is the nation's fifth-largest mobile phone operator, serving around 11 million customers. Alltel also provides roaming and other wireless services in 35 states to other mobile wireless providers who use CDMA, TDMA and GSM technologies. Alltel had wireless revenues of approximately $6.6 billion last year.

Midwest Wireless, headquartered in Mankato, Minn., serves around 440,000 wireless customers in three states. Midwest Wireless also provides roaming and other wireless services to other mobile wireless providers who use CDMA technology. Last year Midwest Wireless earned about $264 million in revenues.

Government Pressuring Realtors To Include All Listings Online (MJS)

By Michele Derus Mderus@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 9, 2006

Documents indicate southeast Wisconsin among areas targeted by federal commission on antitrust grounds

America's online home shoppers might get a broader view of their choices, because of the Federal Trade Commission.

Regulators want Multiple Listing Service operations to publicly market all "for sale" listings - not just the ones that guarantee Realtors full sales commissions. Realtors, a trademarked group, created and run the nation's estimated 900 MLS databanks, which showcase all houses for sale listed by Realtors.

"We say people should be free to choose," said Patrick J. Roach, deputy assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Competition.

"Upwards of three-quarters of people who buy homes use the Internet, and most of what's out there are sites fed by MLS," Roach said. "If its rule says that, if you vary from the traditional form of listing agreement, this house is not going to be visible to the general public - well, from an antitrust perspective, that means a bunch of competitors are dictating terms for all agreements."

Roach said his Washington, D.C., agency is challenging such rules where it finds them. In the past week, it logged its first two victories.

The Austin, Texas, Board of Realtors signed a consent order agreeing to treat all listings equally, and the Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin said it would begin sending exclusive agency listings to www.realtor .com, the biggest public-access site, and the Internet Data Exchange clearinghouse for brokers' sites.

"Exclusive agency" contracts are a tiny part of the $60 billion-plus annual home-selling trade - suppressed because MLS operators often don't make them publicly available, said antitrust lawyer David Barry. In such contracts, the listing agent's commission is reduced or waived if the homeowner snags a buyer without assistance.

"Those agents can tell the seller, 'If you find the buyer, you don't have to pay me a nickel.' But if they find the buyer, they get their full commission," said Barry, senior attorney at Barry & Associates in San Francisco.

Some MLS systems feed exclusive agency listings to publicly accessible industry Web sites, such as the 3 million-listing www.realtor.com.

Others exclude them. Lawyers for the National Association of Realtors and its state chapter in Wisconsin say they don't know how many don't grant public access - but federal regulators are tracking them down.

Shielding this money-saving type of listing from public view, while promoting the full-fee type, is illegal, the trade commission's Roach said.

His agency charged the Austin Board of Realtors with antitrust violations and, this week, the parties announced a consent order that no listing would be kept private. Last week, the Appleton-based Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin announced that, in light of a Federal Trade Commission inquiry, it would change its ways, too.

Both realty organizations denied doing anything wrong. But, as Margery Chapman, executive director of the Appleton group, put it: "This change (should) eliminate any doubt." Southeast Wisconsin in focus

Will southeast Wisconsin's Metro MLS be next?

The Journal Sentinel obtained paperwork this week indicating that this market is a Federal Trade Commission target. Officials at Metro MLS and the trade commission declined to confirm or deny that, however.

Peter Shuttleworth, executive vice president of Wauwatosa-based Metro MLS, said: "We do not publish exclusive agency listings on public Web sites or the Internet, and we've had that rule since 1984. This is a broker-to-broker cooperative. We have no obligation to market FSBOs, which is what some of these are."

FSBO means "For Sale By Owner," a direct seller-to-buyer deal. Some FSBOs can buy their way into an MLS through cut-rate deals with Realtors.

That means there is no listing-broker commission - the same scenario that might occur with an exclusive listings agreement.

FSBO deals represent about 10% to 15% of all home sales, depending on locale and market conditions, experts say. Most such sellers do offer to pay a commission to any realty broker who supplies the buyer - typically 2% to 3% of sales price or a flat fee.

FSBOs have long been a sore point in the realty industry. Lately, so have the realty brokers who provide services to them. Now federal regulators, nosing into sometimes long-held rules on exclusive agency listings, are getting on industry nerves, as well.

"The rule has a legally defensible rationale," said Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors. "Why would you want to advertise that kind of listing? We're not in the business of helping sellers sell their homes and cut brokers out of their compensation."

Nonetheless, the national trade group doesn't dictate policy on this, Janik said.

"If an MLS wishes to exclude these from public advertising display, fine," she said. "If they don't want to, that's fine, too."

It's not fine with the Federal Trade Commission, Roach said.

"We've made it clear that we're looking at other places," he said.

At least 14 places so far, Janik said, though she wouldn't name them.

Critics say the realty industry is overdue for change. At congressional hearings this summer, regulators, consumer groups and industry entrepreneurs accused the powerful National Association of Realtors of stifling money-saving changes.

Among them was attorney Barry, who said the industry's market stranglehold has cost consumers billions of dollars a year.

"The FTC deserves kudos for pushing this issue," Barry said. Their victories in Texas and Wisconsin "may wake up consumers all over America (and) the lawyers that advise these boards of Realtors."

Information on Federal Trade Commission action regarding the realty industry is online at www.ftc.gov (under Hot Topics, click on Real Estate Competition) Information on Federal Trade Commission action is online at www.ftc.gov (under Hot Topics, click on Real Estate Competition)From the Sept. 9, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Have an opinion on this story? Write a letter to the editor or start an online forum.

Subscribe today and receive 4 weeks free! Sign up now.

GE Gets Antitrust OK To Buy Kinder Morgan Natural Gas Unit (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061113

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- General Electric Co. (GE) has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the natural gas unit of Kinder Morgan Inc. (KMI).

The FTC said Friday that it granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law.

General Electric's energy unit will buy Kinder Morgan's U.S. natural gas retail operation for $710 million.

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires under certain circumstances that prospective acquirers of voting securities or assets apply for clearance from regulators. Requests for early termination or clearance are granted when the Federal Trade Commission and the antitrust division of the Department of Justice have determined that they won't take enforcement action during the waiting period.

Shares of General Electric recently traded at $33.95, down 9 cents, while Kinder Morgan shares recently traded at $104.23, up 2 cents.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Department Rejects Interim Plan For Nuclear Waste (NYT)

By Martin Stolz And Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

SKULL VALLEY, Utah, Sept. 8 — The Interior Department has moved to block a huge "interim" nuclear waste storage plant on an Indian reservation here, citing a lack of confidence that it would truly be temporary because there is so much doubt about completion of a permanent repository, at Yucca Mountain, Nev.

But sponsors of the project, which was granted a license by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in February, said that the Interior Department decision had numerous errors and that they were considering an appeal.

A consortium of eight utilities negotiated a lease 10 years ago for an 800-acre corner of the reservation that belongs to the Goshute band, a tiny tribe, about 50 miles west of Salt Lake City. The lease would run for 25 years with an option for another 25, and the waste would be stored in above-ground casks of a type already used at reactors around the country.

Some waste is so old that the reactors that generated it have been torn down. And many nuclear power plants still operating have expanding fields of storage casks and no place to ship them.

But in a decision issued Thursday, the Interior Department said that acting as a "prudent" trustee of Indian lands, it could "derive no confidence from the public record" that there would be someplace for the fuel ultimately to go.

"Construction of Yucca Mountain could be indefinitely delayed by any number of factors, including protracted litigation," the department said, adding that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission "acknowledges that 'decades' are the most relevant unit of time for predicting the completion date."

The decision was hailed by many elected officials in Utah, which has no reactors, and where many non-Indians oppose the plan.

But John D. Parkyn, the chairman of the board of Private Fuel Storage, the consortium, said in a telephone interview on Friday that the opinion about Yucca Mountain was contrary to federal policy and that there were various errors in the decision.

One, Mr. Parkyn said, is that the decision said development on the reservation would require a tribal police force. But in fact, he said, the plant would have only about 20 employees, and most of those would be guards. If tribal police were somehow required, he said, the project would pay for them.

The decision also cites the environmental impact of two extra-large trucks per week going to the site, but the Interior Department has already approved a garbage dump on the site that requires about 1,000 truckloads a week, Mr. Parkyn said.

He said that the Interior Department had told him a decision had been made but that he had not given him a copy. He received one from a reporter, he said, and had not finished analyzing it.

DOJ_NMG_0061114

The tribe is divided over the project. A proponent, Garth Jerry Bear, said Friday at his home on the reservation that the plant would provide hope for the desperately poor members, good-paying jobs and money for schools. "This is a third-world country, right here in the United States," Mr. Bear said.

He added that the county, state and federal government were usurping tribal sovereignty because of resentment over not getting their share of the lucrative contract.

"It's like the broken treaties," Mr. Bear said.

Sammy Blackbear, an opponent of the storage plan, said he was elated by the decision.

"It should have come a long time ago,'' Mr. Blackbear said, "but this is better late than never."

Denise Chancellor, an assistant attorney general in Utah, said that the law gave the Interior Department wide discretion in deciding about leases, and that "it's got to be fairly blatant before a court will step in and overturn it."

The Interior Department's decision is "the final nail" in killing the project, Ms. Chancellor said.

At the Energy Department, a spokesman, Craig Stevens, said the Yucca Mountain repository would be finished by 2017.

But nuclear waste may yet go elsewhere. Mr. Stevens said the department had received dozens of proposals for sites for interim storage and then reprocessing, in which uranium and plutonium are recovered for future use.

Nuclear experts said, however, that given the experience of the Skull Valley project, it would take years for any of the sites to get a license.

The department is under pressure to find some way to accept nuclear waste, because it signed contracts with utilities in the early 80's, promising to do so beginning in 1998, in exchange for payments by the utilities of one-tenth of a cent per kilowatt-hour generated at their reactors.

The Skull Valley partners offered that site to the Energy Department, but Mr. Parkyn said the Energy Department had not responded.

Valero Refinery To Clean Up Air With New System (WILNJ)

By Jeff Montgomery, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, September 9, 2006

A multi-million dollar system that will tame one of Delaware's largest single air-pollution sources is expected to start up next week at the refinery near Delaware City.

The Valero refinery near Delaware City lit up the sky when it flared off chemicals in July. (Buy photo) The News Journal file/JON P. ZAIMES

A multi-million dollar system that will tame one of Delaware's largest single air-pollution sources is expected to start up next week at the Valero refinery near Delaware City.

The new sulfur dioxide "scrubber" on Valero's petroleum "coking" unit will demote its smokestack from one of the nation's top refinery sources of acid rain, smog and dust-forming emissions to something more typical of other nearby crude oil processors.

Valero planned to notify by letter thousands of residents who live within 5 miles of the development.

"It's going to take out 19,000 tons a year of sulfur dioxide -- it's a huge amount, absolutely," said Ravi Rangan, an environmental program manager for the Department of Natural Resources and Environmental Control.

Rangan was one of the DNREC officials who helped pursue the refinery's various owners for years over uncontrolled sulfur dioxide emissions and other pollution offenses. The effort eventually wound up in federal and state courts, producing corporate agreements to install two sulfur scrubbers now slated to start up before the end of the year.

The Environmental Protection Agency, DNREC and state and federal justice departments collaborated on the settlements and related penalties -- approved in early 2001 and later amended. Recent estimates of the scrubber costs to the refinery have ranged as high as $400 million.

Deadlines for the original agreement were set back in part by public objections to the refinery's first scrubber design. That system would have flushed more than 100,000 tons of sodium sulfate into the Delaware River annually, along with traces of mercury and other contaminants.

DOJ_NMG_0061115

A substitute design developed for the refinery will convert sulfur dioxide gases into elemental sulfur that Valero can sell for other industrial uses. For complete coverage see The News Journal on Saturday or www.delawareonline.com

Contact Jeff Montgomery at 678-4277 or jmontgomery@delawareonline.com

Judge Halts Petroleum Lease Sales (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeannette J. Lee, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

(AP) - ANCHORAGE, Alaska-Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne expressed confidence in an upcoming oil lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska when he visited the North Slope last week. "We're set to go forward," Kempthorne said after taking a helicopter ride over a section of the vast reserve. But that sale will likely have to wait.

A judge on Thursday temporarily halted lease sales of more than 1 million acres in the NPR-A that environmentalists say are essential feeding and breeding grounds for caribou and migratory birds.

Nearly 13 million acres of the reserve in northern Alaska are available for lease sale or have been sold to oil companies, most notably ConocoPhillips. The company hopes to augment waning crude stocks in the Prudhoe Bay fields east of the NPR-A.

Environmentalists filed the lawsuit against the Department of the Interior, the state of Alaska and oil companies in hopes of cordoning off about 600,000 acres of the 23-million acre reserve from more exploratory drilling. The government had planned to open bids on Sept. 27 for about 1.7 million acres, which encompass the area targeted by environmentalists.

ConocoPhillips has its eye on the contested area, which holds a potential 2 billion barrels of oil beneath the permafrost near Lake Teshekpuk.

The order, filed in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, said the government had not adequately considered the cumulative environmental effects of the lease sales in the eastern and western sections of the reserve.

Environmental impact statements addressed the effects of leasing individual parcels, but those reports were too narrow in scope because they did not consider how leasing in the northeastern part of the reserve would affect land and wildlife in the northwestern section, according to the order.

U.S. District Judge James Singleton chastised the defendants for the oversight, writing that they "violated the National Environmental Protection Act."

The Department of the Interior and ConocoPhillips did not immediately return messages left late Thursday.

Singleton is expected to make a final ruling the last week of September, said Charles Clusen, director of the Alaska project for the Natural Resources Defense Council based in Washington, D.C., one of the plaintiffs.

The government set aside the NPR-A in 1923 for energy development.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, whose department is in charge of the lease sale, flew over the lake area last week. He said afterward that he was convinced a restricted drilling plan could accommodate energy development and wildlife protection.

The lease plan would allow for caribou migration by banning some areas to drilling and set up buffers to protect geese molting areas, Henri Bisson, the Bureau of Land Management's Alaska director, has said.

Environmental groups said they only want to preserve the most sensitive fractions of land and don't aim to block exploration in the arctic oil reserve.

"Kempthorne can go ahead with the lease sale of the northwest and the rest of the northeast sections, but he has to leave this part alone," Clusen said. "We're not asking to shut everything down, we're just going after the most valuable wildlife area."

Other plaintiffs are the National Audobon Society, the Alaska Wilderness League, Center for Biological Diversity, Northern Alaska Environmental Center, Sierra Club and the Wilderness Society.

Primary defendants include the federal Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Stresses GOP's Immigration Efforts (WP)

By Charles Babington

DOJ_NMG_0061116

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Congress will not address major immigration revisions before the Nov. 7 election, the Senate's top Republican said yesterday, but he and his allies hope to limit political damage to their party by telling voters they have poured millions of dollars into one component of the controversy: tightening the border with Mexico.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) acknowledged that a broad-based immigration bill, backed by President Bush and passed by the Senate, is dead for now. But Republican leaders have added money for border fences and patrol agents to recent spending measures dealing with the Pentagon and homeland security. Frist said he thinks that step may lessen public anger over the porous border and the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country.

"We need to message very well the fact that we have increased over the last two years . . . the level of funding for immigration and border control fourfold, the fact that by the time we finish here in four weeks we will have 375 miles of fence being built and being funded . . . and the fact that stopping people at the border coming across has increased . . . by 25 to 30 percent in the last eight months," Frist told reporters.

The effort omits many of the provisions that he and Bush backed in the Senate bill, Frist conceded, including pathways to legal status for many illegal immigrants. However, he said, most Americans "just want to see the fence going up."

The legislative standoff amounts, in part, to a back-door victory for House Republicans, who have insisted on tougher enforcement of immigration laws before tackling broader revisions. Several prominent GOP senators have criticized that approach, saying voters expect their party to address all major aspects of the immigration debate. They include a larger temporary-worker program, improved record-keeping and worker verification procedures, and strategies for dealing with illegal immigrants without trying to deport them all.

"If it is perceived by the public that the Republican Party -- which owns the House, the Senate and the White House -- cannot solve hard problems working with Democrats, then we will lose our majorities," Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) said earlier this year.

Frist, briefing a half-dozen reporters in his Capitol office yesterday, predicted that voters will give his party more time.

"We have to address the 12 million people, the temporary-worker program and work-site enforcement, as well as border security," said Frist, who is not seeking reelection but may run for president in 2008. "We're not going to be able to do that before the election." The delay will not hurt GOP incumbents this fall, he said, because "what Republicans expect us to do is be firm on the border, secure the border, and we intend to do that," primarily through military and homeland security appropriations bills "and other bills that may come forward."

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who is poised to succeed Frist as the Republican leader next year, told the reporters that if he were a GOP senator asked about immigration in a debate, "whether I voted against that comprehensive Senate bill or voted for it, as [Frist] and I did, here would be my answer." He then read from a list compiled by the Senate Budget Committee of spending measures in the past two years: 3,736 new Border Patrol agents, 9,150 new detention beds for arrested illegal immigrants, 370 miles of fence along the Mexican border.

"I think that's the way our candidates are going to handle it this fall," McConnell said.

The Senate's immigration bill called for about 350 miles of new fencing along the 1,950-mile border with Mexico. The House bill called for 700 miles of fence. The two bills were never sent to a conference committee for reconciliation efforts.

Graham and other GOP supporters of multifaceted immigration legislation have opposed enforcement-only approaches. They feared they would lose leverage with House conservatives if enforcement measures were not linked to other goals such as possible citizenship for illegal immigrants with longtime employment and clean criminal records. However, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said this week that the recent spending measures do not amount to a de facto House victory because legislators realize they eventually must confront the broader aspects of the immigration problem.

Democratic strategists said Congress's failure to enact a major immigration bill this year is proof of the Republican Party's ineffectiveness.

"They don't have a single accomplishment, yet they have control of the government," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), leader of his party's drive to regain control of the House this fall. He cited government findings that between 1999 and 2003, worksite enforcement operations were scaled back 95 percent by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, while the number of employers prosecuted for unlawfully hiring immigrants dropped from 182 in 1999 to four in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0061117

"I wish their actions were as tough as their rhetoric," Emanuel said.

Stalled Bills Might Have Cut Mall Rally Crowd, Some Say (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman And Allison Klein

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

In April, Jose Martinez was among the giddiest participants in a pro-immigration rally that attracted more than 100,000 demonstrators to the Mall.

Spurred by promotions on his favorite Spanish radio program, the Salvadoran-born mechanic persuaded nearly every co-worker at his Southeast Washington auto repair shop to march with him. He brought along T-shirts emblazoned with American flags for his friends to wear. And he vowed to treasure his own shirt forever "as a memory of this day."

But Thursday afternoon, while immigrants and their supporters were convening on the Mall for a reprise of the April 10 rally, Martinez, 43, was back in the auto shop, working out the dents in the door of a silver Chevrolet Monte Carlo.

"No, I'm not going. I'm not motivated this time," said Martinez, who is a legal permanent resident but who has friends in the country illegally. "I really expected a change to the immigration law by now, but we haven't gained anything since [the spring]. . . . All I've seen is an increase in the arrests of immigrants."

It was a refrain repeated across the Washington region as immigrants sought to explain how a demonstration that organizers had predicted would mobilize hundreds of thousands fizzled into a gathering of less than 5,000 demonstrators, most from out of town. Rallies in other cities this week drew similar numbers.

Many locals who did participate Thursday appeared to be union members bused in by their leaders.

Maya Bhullar, who, like many in the crowd, wore the orange cap of the Service Employees International Union, speculated that fewer people might have shown up because a restrictive immigration bill that loomed large in the spring had stalled after winning House approval.

That legislation, which, among other measures, would make it a felony to be in the country illegally or to assist illegal immigrants, alarmed many previously apolitical immigrants. They appeared by the hundreds of thousands at rallies in cities across the country in the spring.

"I don't think people's anger has died down," said Bhullar, 31, who is a U.S. citizen of Indian descent and lives in Northwest Washington. "[But] last time our message was so much about the [House] bill."

Meanwhile, a Senate bill that would permit illegal immigrants to legalize their status after paying a fine also stalled, causing some immigrants to lose faith in rallies as engines of change.

"At the beginning, I thought [demonstrating] was positive," said Enrique Torres, 26, an Arlington resident who chose to work rather than attend the rally Thursday. "Then I realized they were increasing deportations. So it's been negative, too."

The subdued mood also seemed to have affected local Spanish-language radio shows, which had played a pivotal role in urging listeners to go to the rally in April.

"Last time, I heard about the rally everywhere -- even on TV," said Rene Garcia, 22, a Mexican construction worker living in Falls Church who attended the demonstration Thursday. "For this rally, I didn't even hear about it on the radio. I don't know what happened."

Michael Ahn Paarlsberg, 26, a Korean American living in Fairfax, said there was little promotion in the Asian media, despite outreach efforts by organizers that yielded at least a few articles about the rally in Korean-language newspapers.

Rally organizers said they were satisfied with the turnout, which they estimated at 50,000.

Jaime Contreras, chairman of the National Capital Immigration Coalition, who organized the rally, said, "We're very proud of the people that came out despite the fact that [President] Bush's scare tactics of sending [immigration agents] to our neighborhoods has put some fear in people's minds."

Contreras said advocates have shifted their focus from rallies to voter registration drives and cautioned politicians not to conclude that the movement has lost steam just because its rallies are attracting fewer demonstrators.

DOJ_NMG_0061118

"If they do, they're going to be sadly mistaken come election time," he said.

Staff writers Ernesto LondoÃ±o, Josh Partlow, Nick Miroff, Tom Jackman and Karin Brulliard contributed to this report.

Boston Tests System Connecting Fingerprints To Records Of Immigration Violations (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — Immigration officials will automatically be notified anytime the local or state police do a federal fingerprint check on a suspect who also happens to be wanted for serious immigration violations, under a new system being tested in Boston.

The automated notification is part of a Department of Homeland Security program that could expand the role that the local and state police nationwide play in the immigration enforcement effort.

To federal officials, it is a natural next step as police forces have hundreds of thousands of officers who routinely come into contact with illegal immigrants, while Immigration and Customs Enforcement has a squad of only about 6,000 criminal investigators.

"We are giving more information to more people who can act on the information," said Robert A. Mocny, acting director of US-Visit, the Department of Homeland Security program coordinating the effort. "It only makes sense."

But some immigration and civil liberties advocates objected.

"Once the police become viewed as immigration agents, as opposed to simply safety and law enforcement patrols, they will lose the cooperation and trust of a significant portion of the communities they serve," said Marshall Fitz, director of advocacy at the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "That ultimately undermines all of our security interest."

Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program at the American Civil Liberties Union, said he was also concerned. The Homeland Security Department's records rely upon just two fingerprints, instead of 10, and are therefore more subject to error, Mr. Steinhardt said, which could result in someone's being wrongly detained on immigration charges.

"It is an unreliable system being run by a barely competent agency," Mr. Steinhardt said.

The new program has started off in a relatively modest way. When the Boston Police Department does a fingerprint check of federal criminal records for crime suspects, it will also check a Homeland Security Department database of 420,000 people who have violated immigration laws. The federal list includes people who have been previously deported from the United States or tried to enter but were denied a visa.

If the police happen to stop one of those people, both the Boston Police Department and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a division of the Homeland Security Department, will be notified. The department may then ask the Boston police to hold the person for up to 48 hours, until the federal authorities can take him into custody or otherwise begin deportation proceedings, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman said.

Eventually, as more cities and states participate, the Homeland Security Department intends to add nine million sets of fingerprints to the database to include people with less serious immigration records, like someone caught trying to cross the border from Mexico who then voluntarily returned home, Mr. Mocny said.

The local and state police in many cities, including Boston, already routinely contact Immigration and Customs Enforcement to see if suspects they have detained might also be wanted on federal immigration violations. Federal criminal databases already include some people wanted on felony immigration violations.

But the immigration-related inquiries have previously been based on a names and dates of birth, which may be forged. And the checks are not frequently done on every arrest and fingerprint check, as is now the case in Boston."You can't hide from the fingerprint," Mr. Mocny said.

Mr. Fitz, of the immigration lawyers group, said he had no objection if the fingerprints were checked for immigration violations only after an individual had been charged with another crime.

His concern, he said, is that the local police might begin to submit these kinds of requests routinely during traffic stops or patrols simply to determine if someone was in the United States legally.

William M. Casey, deputy superintendent of the Boston police, said Boston did not plan to take such a step.

"We are doing nothing differently than we were doing before last Sunday," Mr. Casey said. "We are enforcing the laws the Boston police always enforce."

Mr. Mocny said the Homeland Security Department was already moving to a 10-fingerprint system to address the potential for fingerprint mismatches. He added that he understood that this new program might provoke debate.

It is also unclear how much demand it will place on the federal immigration enforcement authorities in detaining illegal immigrants and conducting deportation proceedings.

That is why the project is being tested in Boston before being expanded nationally over the next two years.

"Eventually,'' Mr. Mocny said, "it will be all violators of all immigration laws. But we are going to give this 22 months to cook to make sure that we are getting it right."

Pa. City OKs Illegal Immigration Overhaul (AP-Y)

By Michael Rubinkam

AP, September 9, 2006

The City Council gave tentative approval Friday to an overhaul of an anti-illegal-immigration law considered to be one of the nation's toughest, hoping to put the measure on sounder legal footing.

Like the version it will replace if granted final approval Tuesday, the new ordinance punishes businesses that employ illegal immigrants and landlords who rent to them.

The revisions, however, remove much of the burden that had been placed on businesses. They soften penalties, give landlords and businesses time to correct violations and leaving it to city officials to verify workers' immigration status with the federal government.

Since the council adopted the original law in July, many municipalities around the nation have approved or considered similar measures.

Last week, the city of 31,000 residents agreed not to enforce the original law after the American Civil Liberties Union and Hispanic groups sued in federal court to overturn it. In return, the plaintiffs agreed not to seek an injunction against the city.

Under the agreement, Hazleton must give the plaintiffs at least 20 days' notice before it begins enforcing the replacement law — enough time for the ACLU to head back into court to try to stop it.

David Vaida, a civil rights lawyer who also sued the city, said the new ordinance has the same flaws as the old one.

"It is pre-empted by federal law. The United States has exclusive and sole jurisdiction over immigration," he told the council.

Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, predicted that the law will exacerbate tensions in the city by encouraging neighbors to inform on one another.

"The neighbor and co-worker snitching system will almost certainly exacerbate the polarization in the community based on race, ethnicity and national origin," he said.

Mayor Lou Barletta, however, said the law specifically forbids the city from investigating any complaint based solely on a person's ethnicity or race.

It is not clear how many illegal immigrants live in Hazleton, about 80 miles northwest of Philadelphia, but the city's Hispanic population has soared in recent years. Barletta, who proposed the ordinance after two illegal immigrants were charged with shooting and killing a man, has said the new law has already spurred many illegal immigrants to leave the city.

TAX:

Guilty Plea In $200m Tax Fraud Case (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Walter Anderson, a US telecommunications businessman, on Friday pleaded guilty to evading over $100m in taxes in biggest criminal tax fraud in US history.

DOJ_NMG_0061120

Mr Anderson was indicted last year on charges that he evaded over $200m in federal income taxes over five years, partly by hiding $450m in earnings at Barclays Bank in the Channel Islands and other offshore accounts.

Prosecutors alleged he concealed his identity as owner of two telecommunications companies in the 1990s through an elaborate web of private mail boxes, including one in the Netherlands.

A search of his home in Washington, DC revealed he had created seven aliases. Officials seized manuals showing how to disguise identities, including one entitled: "Poof! How to Disappear and Create a New Identity."

Mr Anderson was also alleged in 1999 to have failed to report investment income of $238m from investments that he derived from two companies, Gold & Appel and Iceberg Transport.

The indictment said Mr Anderson, also a widely travelled art collector, failed to file tax forms on two paintings he bought – one a $1.2m Rene Magritte work bought at a Christie's auction and a second painting by Salvador Dali.

Appearing in an orange jumpsuit at a court in Washington, Mr Anderson admitted his guilt in a plea arrangement with government prosecutors on two counts of tax evasion and a third count of fraud.

Government prosecutors agreed to cap any sentence to 10 years. At the time of his indictment, Mr Anderson was reported to have been eligible for up to 80 years in jail.

In exchange, Mr Anderson agreed that prosecutors had enough evidence to prove that he evaded taxes worth over $100m.

While accepting the thrust of the prosecution's case in the counts where he pleaded guilty, Mr Anderson told the court through his defence counsel, Michelle Peterson, that he disputed some of the allegations.

He said he had always intended to use some of the funds he had amassed for charitable purposes and to fund "privatisation of space travel and exploration".

Ms Peterson sought to persuade judge Paul Friedman that there was no longer any risk that Mr Anderson would flee the country to escape sentencing.

She argued that the last year a half he had spent in jail had resulted in him being "broken down in the most unbelievably harsh conditions".

She told the judge he needed time to complete community service, get his personal affairs in order and spend time with his parents. "I know his mother is anxious for him to clear out their garage," she said.

Mr Friedman declined to release Mr Anderson, who continues to be held without bail. Sentencing is expected in January.

Guilty Plea In Big U.S. Tax-Evasion Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 (AP) — A telecommunications entrepreneur, Walter Anderson, pleaded guilty to tax evasion and fraud Friday in connection with what authorities said was the nation's largest-ever criminal tax case.

Mr. Anderson was indicted in 2005 on charges he evaded $200 million in federal and local taxes. Prosecutors said Mr. Anderson used offshore corporations and bank accounts to hide income from tax collectors.

He pleaded guilty to two counts of tax evasion and one count of fraud Friday. He admitted hiding hundreds of millions of dollars in income from the Internal Revenue Service and from Washington, D.C., tax collectors during 1998 and 1999.

Under a plea deal with prosecutors, he faces up to 10 years in prison.

Mr. Anderson started a long-distance telecommunications business in the 1980's as the industry was being deregulated. When his first company, Mid-Atlantic Telecom, merged with another company in 1992, Mr. Anderson formed corporations in the British Virgin Islands to hide the income, prosecutors said.

Authorities said Mr. Anderson used other offshore corporations to disguise his ownership in other telecommunications companies that earned more than $450 million from 1995 to 1999.

Mr. Anderson, who prosecutors said did not file federal income tax returns from 1987 to 1993, has been held without bail since his arrest. Prosecutors say he owes $170 million in federal taxes and $40 million in Washington income taxes.

In court documents, the government said Mr. Anderson could be linked to at least seven aliases and that officials seized forged identification and manuals detailing ways to create fake identification and to hide from authorities.

Among them were “Poof! How to Disappear and Create a New Identity” and “The ID Forger: Homemade Birth Certificates and Other Documents Explained,” the court documents said.

Among the taxes said to be owed to Washington are use taxes, equivalent to sales taxes, on art, jewelry and wine. The indictment states that Mr. Anderson bought a painting by Salvador Dalí and several paintings by René Magritte, an 18-karat gold bracelet and more than $47,000 in fine wines, then had them shipped to a Virginia address to avoid Washington taxes.

Telecom Mogul Guilty Of Tax Scam (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Defendant Admits To $365 Million In Hidden Income

A former telecommunications tycoon accused by prosecutors of being the biggest tax cheat in U.S. history pleaded guilty yesterday in a deal that calls for him to serve no more than 10 years in prison.

Walter C. Anderson, a Washington-based businessman who amassed a fortune during the tech boom of the 1980s and 1990s, admitted to hiding $365 million in income by using aliases, shell companies, offshore tax havens, secret accounts and drop boxes in the Netherlands. He was so wealthy that he talked at one point about leasing the Russian space station Mir -- all the while dodging his taxes, officials said.

Prosecutors said Anderson avoided paying $200 million in taxes from 1995 through 1999 in what they say is the largest personal income tax evasion case brought in the United States. As part of his plea deal, Anderson agreed that the court could order restitution. But how much the government can collect is a big question: The onetime mogul, 52, who had a multimillion-dollar art collection and other trappings of success, has filed for bankruptcy.

Anderson pleaded guilty at the federal courthouse in Washington to three felony charges -- two for evading federal taxes and one for defrauding the D.C. government with a phony tax return. Among other things, Anderson admitted earning more than $126 million in 1998, a year that he claimed an income of $67,939 on his federal tax return. He paid $495 in taxes that year, authorities said.

"This case sends a strong signal to anyone thinking about going offshore to avoid taxes," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a statement. "We have stepped up our efforts to pursue high-income tax cheating, whether it takes place in the United States or overseas."

In return for his guilty plea, prosecutors dropped nine felony charges. According to the agreement, Anderson and prosecutors have settled on a maximum sentence of 10 years. In court yesterday, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman indicated that he will go along with the agreement at sentencing Jan. 16.

Anderson, rail-thin with a thinning crown of silver hair, has been jailed without bond since his arrest Feb. 26, 2005, at Dulles International Airport, where he was returning from a trip to London.

His attorneys -- including a federal public defender -- have repeatedly sought to have Anderson released on bond. They urged the judge yesterday to cut him loose until sentencing, saying Anderson needed the time to, among other tasks, clean up his aging parents' garage and file his taxes.

Prosecutors said Anderson should be kept behind bars, saying they think he still has plenty of money socked away and homes, contacts and girlfriends around the world. In searches of Anderson's Georgetown apartment during their criminal investigation, authorities found fake documents and books titled "Poof!" and "Disappear Without a Trace."

Friedman turned down Anderson's request to be freed pending sentencing.

Anderson's admission of guilt was a turnaround for a defendant who maintained his innocence and was openly scornful of the prosecutors' case. At one early hearing, he defiantly stood up to complain about the government's case.

In an interview with Washington Post reporters at the D.C. jail soon after his arrest, Anderson denied any wrongdoing and mocked the prosecution. "I don't need to steal money from the U.S. government to be successful," he said.

Even during yesterday's hearing, Anderson could be overheard complaining about prosecutors to his attorneys. But he turned down an opportunity to address the court, telling the judge, "I'll probably have a lot to say at the sentencing hearing."

DOJ_NMG_0061122

Anderson grew up in Silver Spring and graduated in 1971 from W.T. Woodson High School in Fairfax. He was one of the original employees of MCI Corp. and founded a series of telecommunications companies, including Mid Atlantic Telecom Inc., Esprit Telecom Group PLC and Telco Communications Group Inc., which he sold for huge profits.

According to prosecutors, Anderson invented a detailed web of financial schemes designed to hide $450 million he made from business ventures from 1995 and 1999. He formed Gold & Appel in the British Virgin Islands and used the alias Mark Roth to hire a third party to form Iceberg Transport in Panama. He used other measures to conceal his ownership and control of these entities. He then transferred ownership of his telecom companies to offshore companies.

He did not disclose his ownership interest or income from the companies on his federal or D.C. tax forms, prosecutors said.

Anderson used some of his money to indulge his passion for private space exploration. He was an investor in a group that tried to privatize the aging Mir space station. In 1997, he founded an organization that issued grants for the search for extraterrestrial intelligence, the tracking of near-Earth asteroids and plans for a human outpost on the moon.

Anderson has said the money is gone and so are the days of private jets, 19,000-square-foot mansions and original paintings by Salvador Dali and Rene Magritte. But prosecutors doubt that Anderson's pockets are empty.

"There is enough evidence that there is money out there," Assistant U.S. Attorney Susan B. Menzer said. "There are people willing to help him."

This much was clear yesterday: Anderson can afford to pay a special assessment levied by the court. He agreed to turn over $200 within 10 days of his sentencing.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Delays Summit With Automakers (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 9, 2006

President Bush delayed a summit with the Big Three automakers, but he called a Ford Motor Co. executive as he flew here to raise funds for a Republican facing a tough Senate race.

The call from Air Force One was aimed at easing tensions in a state where economic concerns are a key issue in the upcoming congressional elections. Democrats — and Dick DeVos, the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Michigan — say the delay in scheduling the meeting shows Bush is not taking seriously the concerns of a major manufacturing sector and its employees.

"This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich. "President Bush insists on showing a lack of urgency as good paying American jobs are shipped overseas," she said.

Along the motorcade route, a half-dozen protesters, turning their backs to Bush, held a sign that read, "Mr. President, you've let us down" and urged him to meet with the automakers.

White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said Bush telephoned Bill Ford Jr., who quit as chief executive of Ford Motor Co. this week after struggling for five years to steer it toward financial stability. The company was founded by his great-grandfather.

"They are friends, and the president wanted to check in with him especially after Ford's news this week about the changes at the company," Perino said. "The Big Three meeting with the president will happen after the election since the idea of a meeting had gotten mired in politics."

On Tuesday, Ford introduced Alan Mulally, executive vice president of Boeing aerospace company, as the new president and chief executive officer of the nation's No. 2 automaker.

Bush was in Michigan for a luncheon fundraiser for Mike Bouchard, the sheriff of Oakland County in suburban Detroit, who is running against Stabenow.

DOJ_NMG_0061123

The luncheon fundraiser raised $1.5 million for the Michigan Republican Party and Bouchard, who greeted Bush at the airport and rode in the motorcade to a 220-acre wooded lot that has horses and two private lakes. It is the home of Pam and David V. Johnson, an entrepreneur and luxury community developer who is chairman of Victor International Corp. and Bay Harbor Co.

Later, Bush traveled to Kansas City, Mo., where he raised $600,000 at another private event for Sen. Jim Talent, who is facing a difficult re-election challenge from Democratic state Auditor Claire McCaskill.

The fundraiser drew hundreds of protesters — some carrying signs that said "Bring 'em home" and "No Iran War" — to a grassy median strip of a boulevard that runs near the affluent home of Scott Ward, co-president of Russell Stover Candies Inc.

"The event is really in support of the Missouri Republican Party, so the sum total of the connection we'll have with the president is probably going to be a picture," said the host's brother, Tom Ward, a co-president of Russell Stover and longtime Republican Party member.

The White House says events at supporters' homes routinely are closed to the public. Democrats said the events were private because GOP candidates do not want to be seen campaigning in public with Bush, given his low approval ratings.

"Instead of misleading Missourians, Jim Talent should stand up and admit to being one of the president's men," said Missouri Democratic Party spokesman Jack Cardetti.

When he returned to Andrews Air Force Base, Bush shook hands on the tarmac with some Marine reservists who were among a group of 156 leaving shortly after midnight on seven-month deployment to Iraq. They are part of the 4th Civil Affairs Group, which will be helping rebuild Iraq and establish democratic institutions.

Ford Chairman Receives Call From Bush (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

DETROIT, Sept. 7 — Although he has put off a meeting with Detroit automotive leaders until after the November elections, President Bush called the chairman of Ford Motor on Friday, only days after the struggling automaker named a new chief executive.

The phone call came the same day that Ford disclosed details of its employment agreement with the new chief, Alan R. Mulally, the former Boeing Company executive whose appointment was announced this week.

Ford said Mr. Mulally would receive a salary of $2 million a year, plus a $7.5 million signing bonus. He will also receive $11 million to offset performance awards and stock options that he forfeited by leaving Boeing, where he was chief executive of the commercial airplanes business.

Mr. Bush's call to the Ford chairman, William Clay Ford Jr., came as the President flew to the Detroit area, where he attended a fund-raising event north of Detroit for Mike Bouchard, the Republican candidate for the United States Senate. Mr. Bouchard is challenging Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Democrat who is completing her first term.

During the call, Mr. Bush discussed the changes taking place at Ford, which is struggling to hang on to second place in the American car market. As soon as next week, Ford will announce new steps under its restructuring plan, called the Way Forward, which are expected to include more plant closings, job cuts, and buyout offers. Ford's directors are scheduled to meet Thursday to consider the moves.

White House officials said Mr. Bush phoned Mr. Ford because the two are friends. Mr. Ford contributed $2,000 to Mr. Bush's re-election campaign in 2003, federal election records show, but has supported both Democrats and Republicans in other races.

Mr. Bush, on the call, reiterated that a long-sought meeting with leaders of the three Detroit auto companies would take place after the elections. Mr. Bush does not want the meeting to become "mired in politics," said a White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

A Ford spokesman declined to discuss the nature of the conversation but the subjects were summarized in a report from the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0061124

The president was originally set to meet with Detroit automotive leaders, including Mr. Ford, in May. The session, at which the executives hoped to discuss issues like the environment, was put off two more times after that.

The White House said the cancellations were not meant as disrespectful, but the cancellations drew criticism from both Michigan's Democratic governor, Jennifer M. Granholm, and the state's Republican gubernatorial candidate, Richard Devos Jr.

This week, with the President's trip to Michigan approaching, the White House announced the meeting would take place this fall.

Now, Ford Motor will presumably be represented at the meeting by its new chief executive, Mr. Mulally. In a regulatory filing Friday, Ford disclosed that Mr. Mulally signed his employment agreement a week ago, although his appointment was not announced until Tuesday.

His $2 million salary is more than double the $825,000 he received at Boeing last year, where his total compensation was $9.96 million, including his long-term incentive awards.

Mr. Ford has not drawn a salary for more than a year, vowing not to accept one until Ford ends its losses in North America. The chief executive at General Motors, Rick Wagoner, receives $2.2 million a year in salary.

The news about Ford came as its closest rival, Toyota, broke ground in York Township, Mich., on its new North American design center. The center, which will also include a crash testing plant, was a victory for the state's governor, Ms. Granholm.

Her administration pushed an incentive package through the Legislature, and went to court so that Toyota, instead of a local developer, could obtain the 700-acre site.

The $187 million plant is scheduled to open in two years. It is scheduled to have 400 employees by 2010. Toyota's North American technical center is in Ann Arbor, about 20 minutes north of the York Township site, once home to a state mental institution.

Hi Bill Ford, It's George Calling (FREEP)

By Justin Hyde

Detroit Free Press, September 9, 2006

Raising money for a Senate candidate may have been President George W. Bush's motivation for visiting Michigan on Friday, but he spent at least a few minutes discussing Detroit's auto industry.

Bush called Ford Motor Co. Chairman Bill Ford to personally deliver a pledge to meet with the heads of the Detroit automakers after Election Day, aiming yet again to calm the tempest stirred by Michigan Democrats over the lack of a date for the meeting.

According to the White House, Bush called Ford from Air Force One en route to a fund-raiser for Republican Senate candidate Mike Bouchard at a home in Clarkston to talk about Ford's hiring of a new chief executive, former Boeing executive Alan Mulally, earlier this week.

"While the White House maintains regular contact with the Big Three, the president reiterated he's looking forward to meeting with the Big Three executives after the elections," White House spokesman Alex Conant said.

The call lasted several minutes, Conant said, and Bush talked with Ford because the two are "friends." Spokesmen for the two friends declined to divulge any more details about their chat.

All three Detroit automakers -- Ford, General Motors Corp. and the Chrysler Group -- have felt a little chagrined ever since the possibility of a meeting with the president on trade and energy issues first surfaced in April. The original date of May 18 hadn't been confirmed by the White House, and when that date fell through and a new one couldn't be hammered out among three globe-trotting executives and the leader of the free world, the issue began to fester.

GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner told the Free Press earlier this week that the automakers wanted to meet with Bush to discuss issues affecting all of U.S. manufacturers, not just the auto industry.

"Would I have liked to have done it sooner? Sure. But, we'll do it as soon as he's able to schedule it," Wagoner said.

Many Democrats, including Gov. Jennifer Granholm, accused Bush of ignoring problems facing Detroit's automakers on several fronts, including health care and trade. Bush suggested in some interviews and comments that the Detroit automakers needed to be more competitive.

DOJ_NMG_0061125

The lack of a meeting date suggested to some Washington operatives that the administration did not want to highlight struggling corporations and massive job cuts just before an election, despite the political trouble that the delay created in Michigan.

Last month, Republican gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos blistered the White House over the delay, while Bouchard had said he was pleased Bush would meet with the automakers "because the issues facing our state are too important to be used for political gain."

"If the president doesn't convene a White House meeting on the subject most on Michigan residents' minds, it becomes a fair game for that to become a Michigan partisan political issue," said Craig Ruff of the Lansing-based Public Sector Consultants. "It has not made sense to Michigan that the White House has seemed indifferent."

The administration attempted to lance the political boil by saying earlier this week it had agreed with the automakers to push the meeting back to an unspecified date after Nov. 7, officially pledging for the first time to have Bush sit down with the executives.

But that pledge has not been sufficient for some. As the president's motorcade passed a group of protesters outside the Flint airport Friday, Art Reyes and fellow union members turned their backs.

"I find it disgusting that the president doesn't have time to talk with executives or workers affected by his economic and trade policies but would go to a fund-raiser where they were trying to make a million dollars," said Reyes, an electrician at Delphi Corp.'s Flint East plant, whose workforce has been decimated by the firm's bankruptcy.

Democrats have continued to harp on the move, saying it reflects the administration's priorities.

"This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow, whose defeat is the target of Bush's fund-raising visit.

Ruff said the administration's moves could allow DeVos to claim some credit for pushing the White House to act, while defusing an issue that Democrats were using to their advantage.

"I don't think it has the traction that it did when there was no outreach to auto manufacturers," he said.

One other question remains about the meeting with Bush: Now that Bill Ford has given up the CEO job, will he be replaced or joined at the get-together by Mulally?

Bush Calls Ford Amid Criticism (DNw)

By Charlie Cain And David Shepardson

DNEWS, September 9, 2006

CLARKSTON -- President Bush placed a midflight phone call to Ford Motor Co. Executive Chairman Bill Ford on his way to Michigan on Friday, but it did little to douse the firestorm of criticism from state Democrats that the White House has turned a deaf ear to Detroit's automakers.

Bush, who traveled to Michigan to help raise money for the uphill U.S. Senate campaign of Oakland County Sheriff Mike Bouchard, made the call amid mounting criticism that he has refused to schedule a meeting with executives from the Big Three to discuss domestic carmakers' problems.

White House spokesman Alex Conant said the president called Ford because the two men are friends.

"He looks forward to meeting with the Big Three CEOs after the election," Conant said. Bush and Ford also talked about the recent hiring of Alan Mulally as the new CEO and president of Ford.

Bush told Ford he wanted to delay the meeting until after Nov. 7 to "to avoid getting it mired in politics," Conant said.

U.S. Rep. John Dingell, D-Dearborn, who has repeatedly criticized the president for his dealings with domestic automakers, was not impressed by the phone call.

"The auto industry wonders who's he working for: us or the foreign automakers," Dingell said.

Ford Motor Co. spokesman Josh Gottheimer said the company doesn't comment on Bill Ford's private phone calls. GM and Chrysler declined to talk about the meeting.

U.S. Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Lansing, who faces Bouchard in the November election, was also critical of the president.

DOJ_NMG_0061126

"This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need," Stabenow said.

At Friday's groundbreaking for the $187 million Toyota Technical Center expansion on 690 acres in York Township, Gov. Jennifer Granholm said it is "time for state and frankly federal government to step up to save American jobs."

"I would encourage the president of the United States, who is in Michigan today, to meet me to have an industrial policy at the federal level that supports these manufacturers."

Bush, she said, "needs to be a hands-on player and not a hands-off player."

John Truscott, a spokesman for Republican gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos, said the phone call between Bush and Ford was a good sign. DeVos would like a meeting of the president and automakers to occur sooner, but said he didn't think this would be a significant issue in the election.

He said Granholm was using this as an issue "to distract from the fact that Michigan's lost 100,000 jobs under her watch."

The president was the drawing card for a $2,100-a-person fundraiser at the Clarkston home of David Johnson, chairman of Victor International Corp. More than 500 people attended the reception and the Bouchard campaign said the event netted them more than $1 million.

The fundraiser was closed to the media and the president made no public remarks during his visit.

On the drive from Flint's Bishop International Airport to Clarkston, the president's motorcade passed by supporters and protesters who lined the streets. Some applauded, some faced the other way showing the president their backs. "God bless you Mr. President" read one banner, while another proclaimed: "Let's try Democracy here."

As he concluded his 3 1/2 -hour visit to Michigan, Bush met with the Mattawan Little League girls softball team on the tarmac beside Air Force One.

The team, from a town of 2,500 west of Kalamazoo, captured the world championship last month, capping a 23-0 season.

The girls, ages 11 to 13, and three of their coaches had their pictures taken with Bush, who autographed the straps on the championship medallions.

"He said 'Congratulations, it's a great accomplishment' and stuff like that," said Bekka Crow, a 13-year-old left fielder. "It was awesome. I never thought that I would meet the president of the United States.

Silencing A Skeptic (NSWK)

Newsweek, September 9, 2006

As the White House pressed its case for war against Iraq in the fall of 2002, one senior GOP lawmaker agonized about what to do. In this exclusive excerpt from 'Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War,' a new book by Michael Isikoff and David Corn, is the previously untold story of how Dick Armey, who was then House majority leader and a silent skeptic about Iraq, succumbed to Vice President Dick Cheney's pressure—much to Armey's later regret.

The president's message was direct. There was no time to wait. The showdown with Saddam Hussein, the dictator of Iraq, had to start right away.

It was the morning of September 4, 2002, and George W. Bush had summoned eighteen senior members of the House and Senate to the Cabinet Room of the White House. When the lawmakers took their seats at the imposing oval mahogany table, they were given copies of a letter from the president. "America and the civilized world face a critical decision in the months ahead," it began. "The decision is how to disarm an outlaw regime that continues to possess and develop weapons of mass destruction." Bush told the assembled leaders he needed a quick vote in Congress on a resolution that would grant him the authority to take on Saddam—perhaps with military action. He wanted this vote within six weeks—before Congress left town so members could campaign for reelection. It was the start of an extraordinary public relations campaign by the White House to persuade the American people—and the world—that Saddam was such a pressing threat that war might be the only option.

Listening to the president, Senator Majority Leader Tom Daschle felt trapped. House and Senate members were gearing up for the final stretch of the campaign—with control of the Senate up for grabs. Bush was informing them that the national debate would now focus on Iraq, not health care, not tax cuts, not the environment or anything the Democrats wanted to talk about. Daschle pressed Bush on why there was a need to move quickly. Sure, Saddam was a problem that had to be addressed. But what was new? How immediate was the threat? Where was the tangible evidence?

DOJ_NMG_0061127

As he did so, Daschle was thinking of one man: Karl Rove. The previous January, Rove, Bush's master strategist, had telegraphed his intention to use terrorism and national security issues to hammer Democrats in the fall campaign. “We can go to the country on this issue,” Rove had proclaimed at a Republican gathering, because the American people "trust the Republican Party to do a better job of strengthening America’s military might and thereby protecting America.” Daschle wondered whether Bush was cynically pushing the Iraq threat as a campaign gambit.

The day before, Daschle had attended a breakfast with Bush in the president's private dining room with Cheney, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Senate minority leader Trent Lott, and House minority leader Dick Gephardt. And he had put the same questions to the president. Wouldn’t it be better, he asked, to postpone this until after the election and take politics out of the question? Bush had looked at Cheney who shot the president what Daschle would describe as a “half-smile.” Then Bush turned back to Daschle and said, “We just have to do it now.” That was it, Daschle would later recall: “He didn’t answer the question.” But Bush’s sidelong glance to Cheney told Daschle that the two of them had thought this through.

Now in the Cabinet Room, within a larger group of legislators, Daschle received no more satisfying a reply, as Bush insisted that the House and Senate proceed quickly. "The issue isn't going away," Bush told the congressional leaders. "You can't let it linger."

****

Daschle was not the only congressional leader in the White House feeling uneasy that morning. Although it never got reported at the time, the most critical comments came from a Republican leader who rarely weighed in on national security issues: House Majority Leader Dick Armey, the number two Republican in the House. A month earlier, Armey, a Texan, had bluntly voiced his own misgivings about a war against Iraq. While campaigning in Iowa for a GOP congressional candidate, Armey told reporters that Saddam was “a blowhard.” But as long as the Iraqi dictator didn’t bother anybody outside his own borders, Armey had said, he couldn’t see any basis for invading Iraq: “We Americans don’t make unprovoked attacks."

Armey’s Iowa comments had generated a brief flurry of media attention. They also upset the White House. Dan Bartlett, a deputy to White House communications director Karen Hughes, called Terry Holt, Armey’s press secretary, and complained. “It isn’t helpful for Armey to be out there speaking out against the president,” Bartlett said, according to Holt. Armey dropped the issue. Armey was a plain-speaking, free-market-over-all economist, with an endless passion for country music. Neither he—nor anyone else in Washington—considered Armey a foreign policy wizard. But the notion of going to war with Iraq made no sense to him. He assumed the administration's war talk was merely bluster on Bush’s part—an effort to intimidate Saddam into accepting the return of United Nations weapons inspectors.

But in the Cabinet Room , watching Bush pressure his congressional colleagues, Armey realized that Bush was serious, that he seemed committed to launching a war and overthrowing Saddam. He thought of another president from Texas, Lyndon Johnson, and what a reckless war had done to his administration. Armey, who had not said anything else about Iraq after his Iowa outburst, decided this was the moment to speak his mind directly to Bush. "Mr. President," he said, "if you go in there, you're likely to be stuck in a quagmire that will endanger your domestic agenda for the rest of your presidency."

As he explained his thinking, Armey got worked up and ended his comments with a bowdlerized line from Shakespeare he had gleaned from a country music song: "Our fears make cowards of us all." What did he mean by this? Armey believed that Bush and other administration officials were over-reacting to the country’s post-9/11 fears. It was as if the Iraq warriors were gripped with what he later called a "he-man macho psychosis where they felt the need to go out and shoot somebody to show you’re the tough guy on the block." Armey could tell his comments were not going over well. "I was the skunk in the garden party," he said later.

When Armey finished, Cheney spoke. It would be a good idea, the vice president said curtly, if Armey would not dissent from the president’s position in public. Frankly, Armey replied, I didn’t realize there was a specific White House position yet. Then Bush, according to Armey, "asked me if I would withhold any public comments until I had all the briefings. So I could understand how necessary this was." The president was saying, wait until you've seen the intelligence. That would prove why urgent action—maybe even a war—was required.

DOJ_NMG_0061128

Had Armey spoken up after leaving the Cabinet Room, he might have sparked a ruckus that could have complicated the White House's upcoming efforts. But out of deference to Bush and Cheney, he agreed to hold his fire. “I won’t speak publicly about this again,” Armey promised the president, “until I’m fully briefed.”*

Upon exiting the meeting, the congressional leaders stood on the White House driveway and issued brief remarks for the assembled reporters. Senator John McCain said Bush had made a “convincing case” for action. House Speaker Dennis Hastert commented that he expected Congress would vote on a resolution before the elections. House minority leader Dick Gephardt, who during the meeting had indicated he was willing to work with Bush to convince Americans that Saddam's WMDs were a real danger, said that Bush had to demonstrate to the public that “this is something that we need to do and to take seriously.” Daschle, more guarded, repeated the concerns he had raised inside: “What new information exists? What has changed in recent months or years?” He added that he was “hoping for more information and greater clarity” in the weeks ahead. Armey walked by the TV cameras, saying nothing. But he still had his questions. Why a war? Why now?

****

By late September, the White House was stepping up the pressure. Nearly every day, administration officials were trekking up to Capitol Hill to offer briefings, hoping to coax unsure lawmakers and bolster those already aboard. They would begin citing new claims— about Saddam providing chemical weapons training for Al Qaeda and building a fleet of mobile biological weapons labs. At the same time, Bush seemed to be viewing the cause in stark and personal terms.

On the afternoon of September 26, 2002, Bush was at a Houston fundraiser for Republican senatorial candidate John Cornyn. Surrounded by old friends from Texas, he made his most bellicose public comments about Saddam yet. There would be “no discussion, no debate, no negotiation” with the Iraqi dictator. He repeated the standard litany: Saddam had tortured his own citizens, gassed the Kurds, invaded his neighbors: "There’s no doubt his hatred is mainly directed at us. There’s no doubt he can’t stand us.” But it was one particular line in this speech that would grab worldwide attention: “After all, this is a guy that tried to kill my dad at one time.”

Bush was referring to a plot by a group of Iraqis and Kuwaitis who had been arrested walking in the Kuwaiti dessert one night in April 1993. They were later charged by the Kuwaiti government with conspiring to assassinate George H.W. Bush with a car bomb during a ceremonial visit the former president and his family had made to Kuwait that month.

The Kuwaitis rested their case on the discovery of a car bomb and a confession made the by alleged ringleader, Wali al-Ghazali, after four days in Kuwaiti custody. But much about the case was hazy. Amnesty International questioned whether al-Ghazali had been tortured—a practice not unheard of in Kuwaiti jails. A classified CIA report, leaked at the time to the Boston Globe, expressed skepticism about the Kuwaiti government’s claims, noting that Kuwait may have "cooked the books." No testimony or documents ever tied Saddam to the plot. “I had no evidence of any direct order” by Saddam, the U.S. ambassador at the time, Edward (Skip) Gnehm, acknowledged in a 2006 interview (although Gnehm, and the Clinton administration, endorsed the Kuwaiti verdict of Iraqi complicity.)

The fact that Bush was pointing to the incident nine years later to explain his current policy made some members of Congress uncomfortable. Armey later said he “just cringed” when he read about the president’s comment. “Wow,” he remarked to his wife, “I hope that’s not what this is all about."

****

At one point, other members of Congress were able to witness Bush's intense feelings about Saddam up close. At a breakfast with a few congressional leaders in late September, Bush expressed exasperation when the issue of a diplomatic settlement arose. Saddam had shown his contempt for the United States, he told the legislators. There was no use in talking to him. “Do you want to know what the foreign policy of Iraq is to the United States is?” Bush asked angrily. The president then answered his own question by raising his middle finger and thrusting it inches in front Senator Daschle's face, according to a witness. “F--k the United States!" Bush continued. "That’s what it is—and that’s why we’re going to get him!"

****

"Trust me on this, Dick," Vice President Dick Cheney told House Majority Leader Dick Armey. “When I get done with this briefing, you’re going to be with me.”

DOJ_NMG_0061129

It was an afternoon late in September, and Armey had been invited over to the vice president's small hideaway office in the U.S. Capitol. This was the briefing Bush had promised Armey three weeks earlier. Ever since then, Armey had bowed to the president's wishes and not said anything in public about his doubts about the Bush's stand. But the White House understood Armey's importance. He was the number two Republican in the House. If he broke ranks, that would be a problem. So Cheney was dispatched to do the job himself.

Armey thought Cheney's opening remark was odd: "He didn't say you're going to be with us. He didn't say you're going to be with the president. He said you're going to be with me."

Over the next half hour, Cheney, surrounded by aides, pointed to pictures of the aluminum tubes, showed overhead images of nuclear sites supposedly under construction, displayed drawings of mobile biological labs and photographs of UAVs that could hit Israel and spread mass death. He talked about the "associations" and "relationships" between Saddam and al Qaeda. He noted that the Iraqis could slip miniaturized biological weapons (that fit in suitcases) to terrorists, who could bring them into the United States and kill thousands.

As Armey listened to Cheney and stared at the photos, it occurred to him that he couldn't really see anything in the pictures. They were aerial shots of buildings and other sites. Who knew what was in those buildings? Armey realized he had to rely on what Cheney was telling him. "It wasn't very convincing," Armey later recalled. "If I had gotten the same briefing from President Clinton or Al Gore, I probably would have said, 'Ah, bulls--t.' But you don't do that with your own people." He assumed Cheney was leveling him; it never occurred to Armey that the vice president was not telling him the whole story.

Armey asked few questions at the briefing; he didn't challenge Cheney on any point. As the briefing concluded, Armey thanked Cheney cordially and promised to mull over the matter. He didn't commit to voting for the resolution. But he was coming around.

****

As the White House stepped up the heat, Armey was being muscled by his own aides. His chief of staff laid it out for him: "This war is going to happen with your or without you". The train was leaving the station—no matter what he said or did. Armey concluded, he later said, that he could "participate in the process and give it guidance or I could be a cranky voice on the outside and lose control." Armey decided to get on the train. He even agreed to introduce the Iraq resolution on the floor of the House.

****

After a week of debating, on October 10, the House was poised to voted on the legislation that would grant Bush the power to use military force "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and to "enforce all relevant" UN Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq.

Armey, who had questioned the need for a war and Bush's motivations, gave the final emotional address before the members voted. Armey echoed the arguments that Cheney had made to him two weeks earlier. He talked about how Saddam with his "ongoing working relationships with a myriad of evil terrorist organizations" could provide them with biological weapons that would be concealed in suitcases that could be left "in a train depot, a service station, an airport." He declared that Saddam could attack Israel at any time and "to me, an attack on Israel is an attack on America." Armey closed his remarks with an impassioned plead to the president to use his new power wisely Choking up with tears, Armey referred to American troops and said, "Mr. President, we trust to you the best we have to give.

The measure passed easily in the House on a 296 to 133 vote, with all Republicans but six voting for the measure. The Democrats split, with 126 voting nay, and 81 siding with Bush. (The next day, the Senate voted 77 to 23 for the resolution, with Daschle too casting his vote with the president.) .

Armey had succumbed to Cheney's pressure. He had decided to be the good soldier, the loyal partisan. But this vote weighed upon him. For weeks afterward, he would agonize about it and try to convince himself that he had not actually voted for a war. He wanted to believe that he had merely given Bush the option to use military force, to strengthen the president's hand in pursuing a diplomatic solution to the Saddam problem. "I'll tell my grandchildren that," he later said. "I'll split that hair until hell freezes over." But Armey suspected he was lying to himself. In December of that year, he would be driving along a stretch of Texas highway when a country song would come on about a fellow who looked in the mirror and saw a stranger. The line hit him hard. He had voted for the war against his better instincts, Armey now thought, and he had become that stranger. Disappointed with himself, Armey was thankful he had a year ago decided to leave the House at the end of this term. Six years later, the vote on Iraq still weighed on him—one of the biggest regrets of his public life.

DOJ_NMG_0061130

From "HUBRIS: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War" by Michael Isikoff and David Corn. Copyright © 2006. Available from Crown Publishers, a division of Random House, Inc.

Join Michael Isikoff for a Live Talk at noon ET on Wed., Sept. 13, 2006

The Affluent Soon Will Be Paying More For Medicare (MCT)

By Tony Pugh

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - After 41 years of charging most older Americans the same price for the same care, Medicare will require affluent seniors to pay higher monthly premiums for coverage of doctors' visits, diagnostic tests and outpatient hospital care beginning in 2007.

A little-known provision of the 2003 Medicare Modernization Act calls for an estimated 1.5 million seniors to face premium hikes ranging from 10 to 55 percent over the next three years if they earn at least $80,000 a year, or $160,000 for married couples. Seniors who earn more than $200,000 and couples with incomes over $400,000 will see their so-called "Part B" premiums rise the most.

The move, designed to help shore up Medicare's shaky finances, has enraged many because it was adopted without public debate. A Republican-led conference committee added the measure to the Medicare bill even though neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate version contained it.

Medicare, the national health plan for the elderly and people with disabilities, faces an uncertain future due to rising health-care costs, a growing number of beneficiaries who utilize more services and a dwindling tax base to support the program.

The premium increases are expected to boost revenue by about $7.7 billion from 2007 to 2011, and $20.8 billion from 2007 to 2016.

The 2007 "Medicare and You" handbook, which will be mailed to all beneficiaries in October, will explain the changes. The Social Security Administration will mail out reminders in November.

Outgoing Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan said that gradually increasing the share that high-income beneficiaries paid was necessary to sustain the program.

"We don't want people to pay a large share of their income for their Medicare benefits, but we also want to make sure these benefits are available for everyone for many years to come," he said.

Senior advocacy groups such as AARP, the Medicare Rights Center and the Senior Citizens League oppose the change. They say high-income beneficiaries paid more into Medicare during their working lives and shouldn't have to pay more now. They also argue that the higher rates will dissuade seniors from seeking jobs.

Even more troubling, they say, is that Congress increased the premiums without public debate.

"This was slipped in in the dead of night behind closed doors," said Robert Hayes, the director of the Medicare Rights Center.

Others worry that the new premiums could lead healthier, wealthier seniors to depart the Part B program, leading to higher costs for those who remain. "With fewer people in it, the price has to go up to sustain the system," said Shannon Benton, the executive director of the Senior Citizens League. "Our fear is it will increase premiums for even the lower-income people."

McClellan said the added expense could cause up to 50,000 seniors to leave the program next year and even more after that. But he said their exodus wouldn't alter the program's risk pool enough to increase the cost of coverage dramatically.

Other opponents of the move say the premium increases don't address the real problem of rising health-care costs but merely shift the burden of paying for them.

"Continually shifting the cost onto the people is not the answer," said David Certner, the legislative policy director at AARP. "We need to figure out why we're spending so much more as a nation on health care and our health outcomes are no better than average."

DOJ_NMG_0061131

Medicare and Social Security enjoy great popularity and political support because of their themes of universal coverage. Medicare advocates fear that the income-related rate hikes could chip away at that foundation, making it easier for Medicare opponents to further erode program benefits.

"The beauty of these programs is you have everybody paying in and everybody getting benefits," Certner said. "If you make (Medicare) less valuable to some people, there's more of a chance that they won't want to be in the program and that they won't want to support the program as well."

The income thresholds that trigger the higher premium rates will be adjusted for inflation each year. President Bush's 2007 budget proposal calls for eliminating those adjustments, however. Doing so could nearly double the number of affected seniors to 8 percent of beneficiaries by 2016, McClellan said.

Seniors who drop their Part B coverage can re-enroll later but must pay penalties to make up for premiums they missed, McClellan said.

Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., has introduced legislation to repeal the rate hikes, but the bill has stalled in a House committee.

Medicare premiums are updated annually under a formula set by statute. The law requires that Part B beneficiaries pay 25 percent of the program's premium costs; the federal government pays the other 75 percent.

In 2006, beneficiaries' Part B premiums were $88.50 a month. Medicare officials expect that to rise to $98.40 when they announce the 2007 rates later this month.

Seniors who earn $80,000 to $100,000 a year - and married couples with incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 - will pay an even higher rate, about 28.3 percent of the total premium cost. That works out to roughly $111.38 per month based on Medicare projections. In 2008, those same beneficiaries will pay 31.6 percent of total premium costs, and 35 percent in 2009.

Individuals who earn $100,000 to $150,000 - and married couples with incomes of $200,000 to $300,000 - will see their premium costs increase by 25 percent - roughly 8.3 percent a year - from 2007 to 2009. Their 2007 Part B premiums will increase to roughly $131.06.

Individuals earning $150,000 to $200,000 - and couples with incomes of $300,000 to $400,000 - will face premium increases of 40 percent - about 13.3 percent a year - from 2007 to 2009. That works out to a 2007 premium of roughly $150.74 a month.

Individuals who earn $200,000 or more and couples who earn more than $400,000 will face the largest increases. Their Part B premiums will jump 55 percent over the next three years, about 18.3 percent a year. That works out to a premium of roughly $170.42 in 2007 based on current Medicare projections.

Shuttle, Delayed By Faulty Sensor, Will Try Again Saturday (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Sept. 8 — NASA will try on Saturday for a fifth time to launch the space shuttle Atlantis after a faulty fuel tank sensor forced managers to call off Friday's attempt with the six astronauts already on board.

The effort on Saturday, scheduled for 11:14 a.m., will be the shuttle's last chance before the end of the month to lift off for an 11-day mission to resume construction of the International Space Station.

Weather forecasters said conditions at the Kennedy Space Center here should be very good on Saturday morning, with only a slight chance of showers.

The sensor problem that interrupted Friday's countdown, just 45 minutes before liftoff, was a familiar one. The shuttle Discovery's mission in July 2005 — the first since the 2003 Columbia disaster — was delayed two weeks while engineers swapped fuel tanks and wrestled with a faulty sensor. Since then, NASA has been using newer versions of the sensors and putting them under closer scrutiny for flaws.

Early Friday morning, an engine cutoff sensor inside the giant external tank failed a routine test as technicians loaded more than 500,000 pounds of liquid hydrogen and liquid oxygen. The sensor is one of four in the liquid hydrogen section of the tank that monitor the level of fuel.

DOJ_NMG_0061132

If the fuel tanks were to run unexpectedly low during ascent, the sensors would set off a controlled shutdown of the engines so they did not run on empty, which could result in a disastrous explosion. Malfunctioning sensors could also cause the engines to cut off prematurely, endangering the chance to reach orbit.

NASA rules state that if a single cutoff sensor fails, engineers need to drain the fuel tank and verify that all the sensors are working as they go dry. If the other sensors and system work as expected then or during refueling, the Atlantis could be cleared to launch with three of four working sensors on Saturday.

"We feel very good that we really need only three of those engine sensors to work," N. Wayne Hale Jr., the director of the shuttle program, said at a news conference. "If everything is performing as expected and we just have one sensor that continues to be a bad actor, we'll launch tomorrow."

If the Atlantis misses this last launching opportunity, it will have to wait until at least late September or early October for another chance, and that would require changing a requirement for daylight launchings. After the Columbia disaster, NASA was required to limit launchings to daytime so photographs could be taken of potentially damaging debris from the external fuel tank, the type that damaged and doomed the Columbia.

Any launching after Saturday and before the end of the month would conflict with Russia's plan to launch a Soyuz spacecraft on Sept. 18 to carry a new crew to the space station and to return the laboratory's departing crew on Sept. 29.

Russian and American space officials have agreed that if the Atlantis launches on Saturday, it must leave the station on the day of the Soyuz launching instead of the day before, as had previously been planned.

Construction of the half-built space station stopped when shuttles were grounded because of the Columbia accident. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is eager to resume building the orbiting outpost by having the Atlantis take up a 30,000-pound girder section that includes a new set of solar power arrays.

Before Friday's problem with the fuel tank sensor, the flight of the Atlantis had been delayed for nearly two weeks by a lightning bolt that struck the launching pad; by Tropical Storm Ernesto; and by an erratic electrical reading in one of three fuel cells that produces electricity and water for shuttles in flight.

Last-Ditch Launch Attempt (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Atlantis could go up this morning. If not, the mission would be delayed for weeks.

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — After nearly two weeks of delays caused by bad weather and faulty electrical equipment, NASA on Friday scheduled a last-ditch attempt to launch the space shuttle Atlantis today at 11:15 a.m.

If the space agency can't get the shuttle off the pad, the launch will have to be put off for weeks, increasing the scheduling pressure on NASA as it works to finish construction of the International Space Station before the shuttle is retired in 2010.

The launch window closes after today because a later launch would conflict with the arrival at the space station of a Russian Soyuz craft, which is carrying a new crew.

Even if Atlantis launches on schedule, it will be undocking from the space station only 12 hours or so before the arrival of the Soyuz flight.

Atlantis' Friday liftoff was called off because of a balky fuel sensor.

The fuel sensor is one of four engine-cutoff sensors designed to shut down the shuttle's main engines when the fuel level gets low. One sensor gave a bad reading during a test early Friday, showing the tank was full when it was supposed to show empty.

A bad sensor could shut an engine down early, preventing the shuttle from reaching orbit, a potential disaster for the crew. It could also fail to shut down the engines when the fuel ran low, which would destroy the engine.

Backup sensors are designed to prevent those things from happening. The launch of Discovery in July — the first shuttle launch after Columbia was destroyed on reentry in 2003 — was delayed by a similar problem. Discovery finally took off when the sensor corrected itself.

DOJ_NMG_0061133

After that incident, NASA adopted a requirement that in case of a similar problem, a launch be delayed at least a day so mission managers would not be making decisions in the heat of a countdown.

On Friday, a number of mission managers were ready to waive the rule and launch anyway.

The final decision to scrub came after a representative of the astronaut office objected during a closed-door meeting of the Mission Management Team, which has final launch authority.

Atlantis was originally scheduled to launch Aug. 27, but a lightning strike to the pad and the approach of Tropical Storm Ernesto forced delays. Next came an electrical short in a pump motor connected to one of three fuel cells supplying electricity for the craft.

NASA officials decided this week that the craft could still launch because the short did not pose a safety threat.

Atlantis is carrying 17 tons of construction equipment in its payload bay for the space station. Its 11-day mission includes three spacewalks to install a new truss on the station, as well as solar power arrays that will double the amount of power produced by the station.

*

john.johnson@latimes.com

Atlantis Launch Scrubbed As Fuel Gauge Issues Persist (USAT)

By Traci Watson, Usa Today

USA Today, September 9, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL — A persistent fuel-gauge problem that NASA engineers thought they had finally solved cropped up again today, forcing space officials to cancel the launch of space shuttle Atlantis less than an hour before liftoff.

The launch was rescheduled for Saturday at 11:15 a.m. ET. Otherwise, NASA will have to wait until Sept. 29 at the earliest for the next launch opportunity.

The hatch already had been sealed on Atlantis' crew compartment in preparation for a 11:41 a.m. ET blastoff when launch director Michael Leinbach came onto the radio at 10:54 a.m. ET to break the news. He told the six astronauts that technicians will drain the shuttle's fuel tank and prepare for a possible launch Saturday.

"We're going to detank this vehicle, come back in tomorrow, fill back up and see how (the sensors) behave and see if we can get more confidence in that system for tomorrow's attempt," Leinbach said. "We ought to feel good about the attempt we made today."

"We understand, and we concur 100%," said Atlantis commander Brent Jett. "It's the right thing to do, and coming out here today we got a good check, at least as far as we could get, on all the systems."

The crew, also including pilot Chris Ferguson, mission specialists Joe Tanner, Dan Burbank, Heidemarie Stefanyshyn-Piper and Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean, already had been strapped into their seats for several hours when the decision was made.

"We had a lot of discussion. ... We followed the rules," Leinbach told the crew. "Ought to feel good that we did that." In order to fly, NASA would have to waive a rule allowing the shuttle to launch with one malfunctioning sensor only after draining the tank and refilling it again the next day.

Atlantis' launch, originally scheduled for Aug. 27, has been delayed by a lightning strike, a tropical storm and a troubling reading from one of the spacecraft's fuel cells.

The latest problem cropped up before dawn this morning as technicians filled the shuttle's giant orange fuel tank with liquid hydrogen and liquid oxygen, the fuels that power the ship as it hurls itself into orbit. During routine tests, technicians sent commands that should have caused the four hydrogen gauges to indicate a low fuel level. But one sensor improperly indicated plenty of fuel.

An incorrect fuel-gauge reading also caused the postponement of the 2005 launch of shuttle Discovery, the first mission after shuttle Columbia disintegrated on its way home in 2003. Problems with the fuel gauge also led NASA to delay the launch of the second flight after the accident. That mission eventually launched in July.

DOJ_NMG_0061134

A major fuel-gauge malfunction could be catastrophic. The gauges are supposed to tell the engines to shut down if the fuel tank becomes empty prematurely. Otherwise, the engine could explode or a fire could erupt. On the other hand, if the gauges needlessly signal an engine shutdown despite plenty of fuel, the shuttle could fail to reach orbit and be forced to do a risky emergency landing.

NASA officials said this spring that they thought they had traced the problem to a batch of gauges that had a defect in the connection between the gauge and its wires. That led them to replace the sensors on the tank for the Atlantis mission and the tank that flew on the July shuttle mission.

For years, the agency's launch rules said that all four gauges must be working for the shuttle to be cleared for liftoff. In 2005, managers decided to bend the rule to allow for a launch if only three of the four gauges were working correctly, as long as the failed gauge was behaving in a way consistent with engineers' explanations for what could be wrong.

"We feel very good that we really need only three of those engine sensors to work," Wayne Hale, shuttle program manager, said at a news conference. "If everything is performing as expected and we just have one sensor that continues to be a bad ac tor, we?ll launch tomorrow."

A launch rule written in June requires NASA to drain the tank and refill it before launching with one malfunctioning sensor. Yet at a meeting this morning, many NASA managers voted to ignore the rule and launch the shuttle today. Only a representative of the astronaut office and the leader of the mission management team voted against launch.

NASA has highlighted Atlantis' mission as the first in nearly four years to add significant components to the International Space Station. Construction of the half-built station was put on hold by the Columbia accident. NASA faces a tight deadline of 2010 to complete the station, which is made up of such massive pieces that only the shuttle can lift them into orbit.

NASA had only five-minute launch windows today and tomorrow — and Saturday was a last-minute addition after talks with Russian space officials — before it had to scrap its plans for at least two-and-a-half weeks.

The Russians are launching a three-person Soyuz capsule to the space station on Sept. 18, and Atlantis has to leave the station before the Soyuz arrives to prevent a cosmic traffic jam.

A Saturday launch would create a delicate job for above-the-air traffic controllers because within 21 hours three spaceships would come and go from the space station. If Atlantis launches Saturday, it would undock from the space station at 9 a.m. ET on Sept. 18, just nine hours after the Soyuz would launch. And 12 hours after the shuttle undocks an unmanned Progress resupply ship also leaves the space station.

If the launch isn't completed by Saturday, NASA could open up launching opportunities in late September and early October by relaxing a requirement that launches take place in daylight.

The rule was implemented for the first few flights after the Columbia accident so NASA can check if foam comes off the external fuel tank and could damage the shuttle's heat shield as it did Columbia's.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Industrials Climb 60.67 As Oil Drops (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Stocks rallied to end an otherwise rocky week of trading, helped by a decline in crude-oil prices to a five-month low and comments by the president of the Cleveland Federal Reserve.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 60.67 points, or 0.5%, to 11392.11. It was off 0.6% on the week. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.4%, or 4.90 points, to 1298.92, off 0.9% on the week. And the technology-laden Nasdaq Composite Index was up 0.5%, or 10.50 points, to 2165.79, off 1.3% on the week.

Oil's selloff capped a weeklong downturn during which many of the bugaboos that have plagued energy markets faded. Crude-oil futures contracts guaranteeing October delivery slid $1.07, or 1.6%, to $66.25 a barrel, off 4.2% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0061135

In particular, traders celebrated the fact that, as the weekend approached, no major storms were threatening offshore drilling facilities in the Gulf of Mexico. On many Fridays in the past, traders have bought futures in order not to be "caught short" in the event of a crisis while markets were closed over the weekend.

But with much of this year's hurricane season past, such pressures have eased. At the same time, U.S. oil inventories have been robust, a tenuous cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah has held, and geopolitical tensions with Iran over its nuclear program haven't boiled over.

"I'm not ready yet to call a top to the crude market," said energy analyst Phil Flynn, of the futures brokerage Alaron Trading in Chicago. "But we have definitely reached a major crossroads in the long-term bull market."

In a speech, Cleveland Fed President Sandra Pianalto, who sits on the U.S. central bank's rate-setting committee, said that while she remains concerned about inflation, the Fed's previous efforts to fight such a general rise in prices, including more than two years of interest-rate increases, are still taking hold as the economy slows.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks1 and bond prices rose2. The 10-year note gained 2/32 point, or $0.63 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.781%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 116.90 yen, compared with 116.43. The euro fell to $1.2671 from $1.2734.

U.S. Stocks Rise On Drop In Oil, Fed Official's Rate Comment (BLOOM)

By Hilary Johnson

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rebounded from two days of losses as oil fell to a five-month low and a Federal Reserve policy maker signaled the central bank is in no hurry to raise interest rates again.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest retailer, led the advance as the drop in energy costs suggested consumer spending will increase. Technology shares rose on speculation that Texas Instruments Inc., the No. 1 maker of semiconductors for mobile phones, may raise its earnings forecast next week. Stocks had their biggest weekly loss in a month.

Investors will ``start to price in a reacceleration in the economy," said Larry Adam, chief investment strategist at Deutsche Bank Alex. Brown in Baltimore, which manages $58 billion. ``The market has come around to what we've been feeling for a while, and that's that the Fed has completed this tightening cycle."

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 4.90, or 0.4 percent, to 1298.92. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 60.67, or 0.5 percent, to 11,392.11. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 10.50, or 0.5 percent, to 2165.79.

Lennar Corp., the second-largest U.S. homebuilder by market value, declined after reporting quarterly profit dropped for the first time in six years.

Weekly Decline

Stocks fell for the week as builders' earnings showed a housing slump is deepening and economic reports pointed toward accelerating inflation.

The S&P 500 dropped 0.9 percent since last Friday, the biggest decline since the period ended Aug. 11. The Dow average lost 0.6 percent and the Nasdaq retreated 1.3 percent.

Investors gained renewed confidence in the interest-rate outlook today following Cleveland Federal Reserve Bank President Sandra Pianalto's comments.

Pianalto, a member of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee, said the full effect of past increases has yet to take hold and last month's pause was ``appropriate." The Fed ended a two-year series of rate increases on Aug. 8 when policy makers decided to hold the benchmark at 5.25 percent.

Her views appear to concur with those of San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen, who yesterday said the central bank needs time to assess the impact of past rate increases.

A Bloomberg News survey of economists shows that the faltering property market may lead to an end of rate rises through the first half of next year because housing's slowdown will be more of a drag on growth than expected, economists said.

DOJ_NMG_0061136

Gross domestic product is expected to expand at an average rate of 2.7 percent in the first half of 2007, down slightly from last month's survey as economists shaved a 10th of a point off their second-quarter forecasts.

Wal-Mart

Wal-Mart gained $1.18 to $46.72. Its 2.6 percent rally was the second-biggest in the Dow average. Target Corp., the No. 2 U.S. discount merchant, added $1.88 to $50.56. An S&P 500 measure of retailers rose 1.2 percent.

Crude oil plunged 1.6 percent to $66.25 a barrel in New York on speculation U.S. fuel inventories will be sufficient as economic growth in the world's biggest energy consumer slows. That's the lowest close since April 4.

Texas Instruments added 50 cents to $31. The company will update its third-quarter sales and profit forecast following the Sept. 11 market close.

The last time Texas Instruments offered a quarterly update, on June 8, it raised its sales and profit forecasts due to strong demand for handsets in India and China.

Lennar

Lennar fell 54 cents to $42.71 after the homebuilder became the fourth such company this week to report lower earnings or cut its forecast. Third-quarter profit was as much as $1.35 a share, below the $1.81 average estimate of analysts in a Thomson Financial survey. Lennar said preliminary net new orders slid 5 percent in the quarter.

About three stocks rose for every two that dropped on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.31 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 16 percent less than the three-month daily average.

A measure of computer-related companies advanced 1.1 percent for the best performance among 10 industry groups. For the year, technology shares have lost 2.9 percent, the only decline among the 10 S&P 500 groups.

International Business Machines Corp., the biggest computer-services provider, gained $1.26 to $80.66.

Microsoft Corp. added 17 cents to $25.60. The software maker plans to sell a cheaper version of its Xbox 360 game console in Japan from Nov. 2, a week before Sony Corp. releases its rival PlayStation 3, to boost sales during the Christmas season.

Gateway

Gateway Inc. gained 3 cents to $1.89. The No. 3 U.S. personal-computer maker named J. Edward Coleman chief executive officer, ending a nine-month search to replace Wayne Inouye.

Amazon.com Inc. jumped 78 cents to $30.51. The world's largest online retailer unveiled a service that will sell movies and television shows from 30 studios and networks. It will compete with Apple Computer Inc.

Shares of technology companies may have benefited from lower oil prices, said Wayne Wilbanks, who helps manage $1.1 billion as chief investment officer of Wilbanks Smith & Thomas Asset Management.

Looking Toward Technology

Investors looking for stocks with above-average returns buy computer-related shares when ``you've got the potential bloom coming off the energy sector," said the Norfolk, Virginia-based Wilbanks. ``If you're a high-growth investor, you're naturally going to look to tech."

Not all computer-related stocks gained.

Broadcom Corp. declined 34 cents to $26.09. The maker of chips for consumer devices discovered more instances of stock- option backdating that will require it to at least double its charges for the practice to $1.5 billion.

Shares of energy producers dropped 1.9 percent for the only decline among 10 industry groups in the S&P 500.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, lost 88 cents to $66.81. Sunoco Inc., the largest refiner in the U.S. northeast, dropped $2.22 to $65.50.

Equifax Inc. jumped $3.92, or 12 percent, to $36.34 for the biggest advance in the S&P 500. The consumer-credit information company raised its profit estimate for this year to more than $2 a share, higher than its projection of as much as $1.99. The company also lowered its forecast for capital expenditures.

Ford Motor Co. rose 19 cents to $8.77, after Mazda Motor Corp., which is a third owned by the second-largest automaker, said it is raising production capacity of engines on increased demand. UBS AG said it now expects Ford shares to reach $9 within 12 months, up from $7.

DOJ_NMG_0061137

Ford, Borders

The company also said it will pay at least $20.5 million to new Chief Executive Officer Alan Mulally in the first year.

Borders Group Inc., the second-largest U.S. bookstore chain, climbed $1.38 to $20.60 after Credit Suisse upgraded the stock to ``outperform" on confidence in new CEO George Jones.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, rose 37 cents to $130.28. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, gained 24 cents to $38.72.

S&P 500 futures expiring in September rose 3.1 to 1310.50 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures advanced 2.75 to 1589.50.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $612 million, added 0.3 percent to 708.54. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, gained 42.33, or 0.3 percent, to 12,977.52. Based on its increase, the value of stocks rose by $52.9 billion.

Amazon.com Inc. (AMZN US) Broadcom Corp. (BRCM US) Equifax Inc. (EFX US) Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM US) Ford Motor Co. (F US) Gateway Inc. (GTW US) International Business Machines Corp. (IBM US) Lennar Corp. (LEN US) Microsoft Corp. (MSFT US) National Semiconductor Corp. (NSM US) Sunoco Inc. (SUN US) Texas Instruments Inc. (TXN US) Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT US)

A Brief Rebound But Losses For The Week (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

Wall Street rebounded moderately yesterday from two losing sessions as oil prices dropped further and investors mostly shrugged off another warning from a home builder about declining demand. The major indexes ended the week with losses.

Investors apparently took in stride the Lennar Corporation's announcement that it was lowering its third-quarter profit forecast, joining several rivals in pointing to lackluster demand in a slowing housing market. Warnings earlier in the week from companies like Beazer Homes USA and Hovnanian Enterprises left Wall Street unnerved at the prospect of a sharp economic slowdown.

With relatively little in the way of market-moving economic news to chew on, investors got their biggest clue about the economy from the home builders. A few speeches from Fed officials also kept Wall Street guessing about the central bank's future.

"It's the third warning in three days from the home building industry and it's a sign that the damage on the rest of the economy is all still in front of us," said Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist at J. P. Morgan Asset and Wealth Management.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 60.67 points, or 0.54 percent, to 11,392.11.

Broader stock indicators extended their gains. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 4.90 points, or 0.38 percent, at 1,298.92, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 10.50 points, or 0.49 percent, to 2,165.79.

Bonds rose, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note gaining 3/32, to 10025/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, falling to 4.77 percent from 4.78 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

The major indexes ended the erratic, holiday-shortened week with losses amid a dismal outlook of an economic slowdown accompanied by higher inflation; investors' dismay at the home builders' warnings was compounded by government data showing a jump in wage inflation during the second quarter.

For the week, the Dow lost 0.63 percent, the S.& P. shed 0.92 percent, and the Nasdaq dropped 1.25 percent.

But yesterday, Wall Street, which has been hoping the Federal Reserve will temper its efforts to hold back inflation should the economy show further signs of slowing, appeared to regard comments from the Cleveland Federal Reserve president, Sandra Pianalto, as acceptable.

She was quoted by news services as saying it was crucial that the Fed "anchor inflation expectations in order to best promote sustainable economic growth."

DOJ_NMG_0061138

Ms. Pianalto's speech followed remarks from the San Francisco Fed president, Janet L. Yellen, on Thursday that some on Wall Street saw as indicating that further interest rate increases were likely.

Many investors are wary of more rate increases, contending the Fed's previous string of 17 straight increases have already slowed the economy too quickly. The Fed, which left rates unchanged at its last meeting, plans to meet again Sept. 20.

Mr. Schweitzer predicted that a cooling economy could lead to a rate cut in the first half of next year.

"I think the market is in a tug of war between the potential benefits and problems from a slowdown in the economy," he said.

Falling oil prices also helped stocks yesterday. Oil, which had recently been above $70 a barrel, has fallen in recent days as inventory figures showed increases and as tensions with Iran over its nuclear ambitions eased. The end of the summer driving period and a relatively uneventful hurricane season have also helped lower prices. Light crude oil was down $1.07, at $66.25 a barrel.

Lennar fell 54 cents, or 1.2 percent, to $42.71 after saying it expected to earn $1.25 to $1.35 a share for the third quarter, well below the $2.06 a share the company earned in the comparable quarter last year. Wall Street had been expecting $1.81 a share. Beazer Homes USA declined 9 cents, to $37.24, while Hovnanian Enterprises shed 92 cents, or 3.4 percent, to $26.17.

AirTran Holdings, which operates the low-fare carrier AirTran Airways, fell $1.19, or 11 percent, to $9.48 after the airline cut its third-quarter revenue forecast amid falling demand.

Equifax, a credit-reporting and marketing company, rose $3.92, or 12 percent, to $36.34, after it said its full-year earnings would exceed $2 a share; it had previously forecast a profit of $1.90 to $1.99 a share.

Consumer Credit Slowed In July As Higher Wages Provided Cash (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

Consumer borrowing increased less than expected in July as higher incomes allowed Americans to reduce their credit card use.

Consumer credit, or nonmortgage loans to individuals, rose 2.8 percent at an annual rate, to $2.35 trillion, the Federal Reserve said yesterday in Washington. In June, consumer debt increased at a rate of 7.3 percent.

Rising wages gave Americans more cash to spend as they went to shopping malls and auto dealerships in July. Consumer borrowing and spending may slow in coming months as the cooling housing market dents confidence and household wealth.

"Consumers have seen a pickup in their wages lately and this may be one reason they are not overdoing it when it comes to paying the bills with their credit cards," said Chris Rupkey, an economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ in New York. "They are not overextending themselves to make purchases."

Total consumer borrowing increased by $5.5 billion in July, the report showed. Economists had forecast an increase of $6.8 billion after an initially reported gain of $10.3 billion in June, according to a median of forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey.

Nonrevolving debt, including loans to buy cars, rose $3.1 billion in July after increasing $5.01 billion in June. Revolving debt, which includes credit cards, rose $2.4 billion after gaining $9.1 billion.

Home sales have been depressed by rising borrowing costs. The Federal Reserve raised its benchmark lending rate to 5.25 percent on June 29, the 17th straight increase since June 2004. The prime lending rate, the basis for home equity loans and other consumer debt, has risen to 8.25 percent from a four-decade low of 4 percent at the start of the Fed increases.

At the same time, cooling home prices have made home equity loans less attractive

"Credit card borrowing has been going down for the last few years mainly because people have been refinancing credit card debt into their mortgages," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York. "That is going to go in the other direction."

Consumer Borrowing Slows In July (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061139

Americans increased their borrowing in July at the slowest pace in four months as the gain in credit card debt fell off sharply.

The Federal Reserve reported Friday that consumer borrowing rose at an annual rate of 2.8 percent in July, down from an increase of 7.3 percent in June.

The slowdown was led by a sharp deceleration in credit card debt, which rose by just 3.4 percent in July after gains of 13.2 percent in June and 13 percent in May.

Borrowing to buy autos also slowed in July to an annual rate of gain of just 2.5 percent after an increase of 4 percent in June.

All of the increases pushed debt up by $5.5 billion after a much larger increase of $14.1 billion in June, which had been originally reported as a gain of $10.3 billion. The July increase was slightly below the $6.5 billion advance economists had been forecasting.

The increases left consumer credit at a record level of $2.35 trillion. The Fed's measure of consumer credit does not include mortgages and other loans secured by property.

Consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of the total economy, slowed abruptly in the spring, pushing overall economic growth down to a 2.9 percent rate of increase.

Analysts believe consumer spending will remain sluggish in coming months as Americans struggle with high energy prices and interest rates and a cooling housing market.

States Must Find Welfare Recipients Jobs (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 9, 2006

The welfare rolls aren't dropping as fast as they used to, and that could pose a big money problem for states from coast to coast after a new federal law takes effect next month.

The states' task: find jobs for tens of thousands of people on welfare or risk losing millions in federal money. More than two dozen states have work to do, including Pennsylvania, California and Michigan.

The law requires states to place into job training, community service or other work activities 50 percent of their households that get welfare aid — and 90 percent of two-parent households that receive assistance.

"About half the states are in pretty good shape," said Wade Horn, assistant secretary at the Department of Health and Human Services. "About a quarter of the states are really going to have to work hard."

Pennsylvania will have to add nearly 23,000 recipients to the work rolls, which amounts to a 220 percent increase in work participation, according to federal estimates obtained by The Associated Press.

California has to find work activities for more than 60,000 people_ a 100 percent increase in its work participation rate.

Michigan must add nearly 11,500, a 117 percent increase.

Several other large states, including Texas, Florida and Georgia, will meet the requirements easily, according to the federal estimates.

The requirements are part of broad rules that more strictly define what constitutes work and require states to verify that adults are doing the activities the states say they are.

This week, five Democrats on the House Ways and Means Committee said the rules had placed new challenges on the states that would make the program more expensive and difficult to administer. They are asking for a congressional hearing.

Some analysts also are concerned that states will penalize beneficiaries as a way to get to 50 percent work participation, rather than help recipients land and keep jobs.

"The people who have the most barriers to employment, the most issues in their life, they tend to be sanctioned more than others," said Evelyn Ganzglass of the Center for Law and Social Policy. "But they often have problems that prevent them from complying. These can be mental health problems, physical disabilities, all kinds of issues that these families face."

Pennsylvania officials say their state has made significant strides since March, the last month included in the federal figures. Work participation is now up to about 32 percent instead of the 15 percent cited by the federal government, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0061140

"We're confident we're going to hit the number," said Ted Dallas, executive deputy secretary for the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare.

Dallas said the new regulations have forced Pennsylvania to re-evaluate its program. He said there has been more one-on-one counseling and more accountability from contractors. He also said more recipients have been penalized when they did not comply with state requirements.

States can kick recipients out of the program if they have not met certain requirements, such as attending appointments with counselors or going to job interviews. Sanctions in Pennsylvania rose from 1,030 in February to 2,327 in July, state officials said. A sanctioned recipient in Pennsylvania becomes ineligible for benefits, such as cash assistance.

Horn stresses that states do not have to be at 50 percent work participation come Oct. 1, just at that average over the course of the year. Then, states will have a chance to take corrective action. The earliest that penalties could begin is 2009.

Those penalties could be severe. States face a reduction of their welfare block grant of up to 5 percent the first year they fail to meet the new threshold, and 2 percentage points for each additional year.

Pennsylvania, for example, gets $719 million. If it fails to meet the work requirement, it could lose as much as $36 million in federal funds in 2009.

One important feature of the 50 percent threshold is that states get extra credit when they reduce the number of welfare recipients. If a state's caseload drops by 5 percent from 2005 levels, then the work participation requirement will also drop by 5 percent.

Under the current welfare law, states are also supposed to have 50 percent work participation, but the extra credit that states got stemmed from caseload reductions since 1996. As a result, many states could have 10 or 20 percent work participation, such as Pennsylvania did, and still easily meet the federal requirements.

States that have reduced the number of welfare cases over the past year include Georgia, 22.8 percent, and Texas, 19.2 percent. That means those two states would need to have only about a third of their welfare rolls in work activities to meet the new guidelines, Horn said.

Larry Jones, communications director of the Texas Workforce Commission, said various factors play a role in reducing welfare rolls. The state's economy is strong, generating about 630,000 jobs in the past three years. The state also has stricter time limits in place than most states, with some beneficiaries allowed to collect cash assistance a maximum of one year before they have to work.

But mostly, Jones said, the state has been successful placing recipients into the work force.

He said that about three-quarters of participants get jobs and, of that group, 71 percent have those same jobs six months later. Jones said the jobs pay more than $7 an hour and recipients can continue to get food stamps, state-subsidized child care, Medicaid and other benefits.

"We very strongly emphasize work and a quick attachment to the work force," Jones said. "Through work, one builds the skills needed to stay employed and build a career."

Bush's Speech Called Uplifting And Warm (FREEP)

By Tina Lam

Detroit Free Press, September 9, 2006

President George W. Bush swooped in Friday afternoon for a fund-raiser at a palatial house in Clarkston, pleasing listeners with a casual, upbeat speech.

Linda Lee-Williams, a state worker from Lansing, was thrilled with her first-ever chat with the president.

"I told him I had been praying for him since he took office," she said. "He gave me a kiss on the cheek."

U.S. Rep Mike Rogers, a Brighton Republican, described Bush's remarks as relaxed, uplifting and warm.

"He talked a little about terrorism and the economy but spent more time talking about the trials and tribulations of being a wartime president," Rogers said.

The event was closed to reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0061141

Bush flew to Michigan to help raise $1 million for Republican Senate candidate Mike Bouchard and the state Republican Party. Rogers said about 400 people were there and that he believed the event brought in close to its goal.

Bush Zips In For Feel-good Visit (KCS)

By Dave Helling, Steve Kraske, And Scott Canon

The Kansas City Star, September 9, 2006

Air Force One landed uneventfully at Kansas City International Airport about 3:40 p.m. Friday and took off the same way at 6:31.

In between, hands were shaken, politics were discussed, large checks were discreetly handled.

On Ward Parkway, protesters protested. Across the street, reporters and photographers cooled their heels in a mansion under rehab.

But it's always news when the POTUS rolls into town.

Did he make a speech?

Nothing for the public, nor any impromptu news conferences. He didn't stop at a barbecue pit, either. (He never does. What's up with that, anyway?) So no national ripples; don't go surfing CNN or FOX.

Of course, it was pretty exciting if you were one of the 450 folks who were shuttled to the Scott Ward home at 1217 W. 55th St. and got to grip and grin with the big dog, the leader of the free world.

Or you were Bradley Fisher and Taylor Mayes, both 17-year-old seniors at Smithville High School, who were presented Volunteer Service Awards at KCI for their work to prevent teen substance abuse.

Or you were U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, who collected perhaps $600,000 for his re-election bid.

So everyone had "a really cool experience," as Fisher reported ?

Maybe not those folks who hadn't counted on a presidential motorcade complicating Friday-night rush hour between the Country Club Plaza and the airport.

The president's had a pretty big week. He moved some Sept. 11 plotters to Guantanamo, near the five-year anniversary of the attacks; he pushed Congress to write new legal rules for the war on terror; he wants to speak to the nation Monday; and his poll numbers have bounced back a bit. Did he discuss any of this?

Yes. People who attended said Bush spoke about 45 minutes, mixing politics with policy, although he did not take questions. He told the gathering that Talent and Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who also was there, would provide the help he needs to pass legislation expanding his authority to prosecute the war on terror.

Former U.S. Rep. Wendell Bailey said Bush talked about his "commitment to the presidency rather than being the president. He's just hard to beat in that venue."

Who is Scott Ward, the host of the fundraiser?

He's the co-president of Russell Stover Candies. He and other members of the Ward family are longtime contributors to the Republican Party and Republican causes: Since 1998, he's given more than $57,000 to Republican candidates and committees, according to a campaign cash Web site.

Why was the fundraiser closed to the media?

Critics have said Talent held it in a private home to avoid news coverage — particularly photographs and video — of him standing next to Bush. For the record: Many high-level fundraisers are off-limits to reporters. But this year, the Democrats are flogging the issue because of the poor polling of the president and his party. Some note that Talent's yard signs neglect to mention his party.

What does Talent say to this?

"Now, this is the third time he's come in to campaign for me. That's a strange way to distance myself from him," Talent said at news conference before the event. "People have plenty of film of us together if that's what they want to use."

Asked why reporters were not allowed in to see them together, Talent said: "That was a decision the White House made."

Does the Republican Party or Talent's campaign pay for this political jaunt?

DOJ_NMG_0061142

Bush is doing a lot of flying and fundraising, trying to keep the GOP in control of the Congress. And you're helping the president elect Republicans, just as you helped his predecessor elect Democrats.

The Federal Election Commission requires Talent's campaign to pay only the equivalent of a first-class air ticket for all political travelers on Air Force One. So Talent's few thousand dollars won't begin to cover the cost of bringing in that Boeing 747, Secret Service agents, nonpolitical staff and two limos.

As usual, Kansas City police officers provided security "as part of their normal workday," said spokesman Rich Lockhart. "There will be no additional overtime costs."

What did guests get for their $1,000?

"Finger food and beverages," reported Rich Chrismer, Talent's spokesman. "It's a reception."

Any Russell Stover candy put out?

Of course.

But, proving that revenge in politics is, well, sweet, contributors to a Web site called buyblue.org suggest "progressives" should stop buying Russell Stover chocolates.

Surely not those pecan turtles?

Apparently.

Who wrote the checks?

We won't know for sure until campaign fundraising disclosures are filed Oct. 15.

So Talent sees dollar signs when Bush shows up?

Better believe it. In late June, Bush went to a $2,000-a-head event in St. Louis, raising an estimated $750,000. The topper, however, was a similar event in 2005 that brought in more than $1 million — a state record — for Talent.

The overall fundraising scorecard? Through the end of June, Talent has raised $9,935,711; Claire McCaskill, $4,572,707, according to the Federal Election Commission.

Will McCaskill get any high-powered fundraising help for herself?

Yes. Former President Bill Clinton will appear today in St. Louis, where he's expected to help gather $1 million for McCaskill.

So what's the Democrats' line?

Jack Cardetti, Missouri party spokesman: "With each million-dollar fundraiser, Jim Talent grows more indebted to President Bush and less likely to stand up to the president."

How many protesters showed up?

About 400, assembling on the Ward Parkway median.

How many Republicans does it take to rile up the Bush protesters?

Just one, but about 20 showed up, mostly waving Talent placards. One had a "Students 4 Bush" sign. Most appeared to be in their 20s. Clearly the most senior was 81-year-old W.C. Wissmueller of Kansas City. He waved a sizable American flag and at one point poked his staff at a bullhorn being used to lead the protesters in a chant. Cooler heads prevailed.

"I wanted to make sure somebody was here to support the president," Wissmueller said. "These people (the Bush protesters) are crazy."

What did some of those protesters' signs say?

"Emperor Bush, stop fiddling. Iraq burns"; "Mission accomplished? Where's Osama?" "Missouri needs a raise"; "Liar, liar, world on fire."

So the Iraq war was a major theme here, as it is in the national campaign?

Just ask Patrick Farnan of Weston. He was protesting with his wife, Deann. They lost their only son, Colby, to an improvised bomb near Taji, Iraq, on Feb. 25, 2005. The 22-year-old Army specialist is one of dozens of casualties from Missouri.

"It's 54. You've got to know that stuff. We all need to know that stuff," Patrick said.

They think their son died in an unnecessary war and came to Ward Parkway, they said, to hold the president accountable. "My son thought the war was all about oil," Deann Farnan said, "and I'm not sure he wasn't right."

Did Bush get to see the protesters?

DOJ_NMG_0061143

For a couple of seconds, as his limo made the corner onto the parkway.

Cheney Visit Is Met By Traffic, Protests (BOS)

By Raja Mishra And Michael Levenson

The Boston Globe, September 9, 2006

Avoided in public by the state's leading Republicans, Vice President Dick Cheney arrived in Boston yesterday and was greeted by a boisterous protest and a well-heeled GOP crowd in the Back Bay.

When Cheney's plane touched down at Logan International Airport, he was greeted by a little-known state representative from Shrewsbury and a small band of local officials.

Governor Mitt Romney and Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey were nowhere in sight, and the vice president, whose poll numbers make him among the least popular political figures in the country, was whisked away in a black limousine.

Cheney's visit created traffic snarls, and for a few afternoon hours, Back Bay became a congested circus. Sign-waving protesters chanted into bullhorns. A massive retinue of police officers and Secret Service agents lined the streets. Afternoon traffic stood still. Flowing through it all were hundreds of Red Sox fans slowly making their way to Fenway Park.

The protests produced numerous confrontations, as guests to the fund-raiser, which cost $2,500 per person, had to walk through a gantlet of virulent anti-Cheney activists on their way to the Harvard Club in Boston, where Cheney spoke.

``Shame! Shame!" the protesters chanted at the Republican supporters streaming by.

Grace Ross , the Green-Rainbow Party candidate for governor, began giving a speech excoriating Cheney when police confiscated her microphone and speakers, citing noise ordinances.

Inside the Harvard Club, Cheney spoke for about 20 minutes to nearly 300 guests, giving a public service award to Richard J. Egan , the founder of the Hopkinton-based EMC Corp. and a stalwart Bush supporter. He also spoke about the war on terrorism.

``He talked about the need to stay the course," said Brian Dodge , executive director of the state Republican Party.

The event was closed to the public. In attendance yesterday were Romney , Healey , former governor Paul Cellucci and the new Turnpike Authority head, John Cogliano.

Cheney arrived at Logan at about 4 p.m., greeted there by a small entourage of Republican officials. State Representative Karyn E. Polito , a Shrewsbury Republican who was in the welcoming party, recalled her brief exchange with Cheney.

``I said, `I'm a Republican state representative, a wife, and a mother, and my family sleeps easy at night knowing you and President Bush are in the corner office,' " Polito said in an interview on the tarmac, just after Cheney left. ``He said, `Thank you for running for office. I'm happy to be here.' "

The Harvard Club sits just off the intersection of Commonwealth and Massachusetts avenues, among the most congested crossroads in the city, and Cheney's visit exacerbated the typically nightmarish traffic that clots there on a Friday afternoon when the Red Sox are playing at home.

There were rolling road closures throughout the late afternoon and early evening, and downtown traffic was backed up and barely moving along long stretches of Back Bay starting at just before 4 p.m. Motorists were asked by police on foot to stop and remain stopped for as long as 30 minutes.

Parts of Commonwealth Avenue were shut off to motorists, with cars being diverted under Massachusetts Avenue, creating confusion among school bus drivers, trolley drivers, and others looking to escape the snarl.

At the same time, traffic on Interstate 93 south backed up to the Zakim Bridge late yesterday while Leverett Connector traffic headed toward Storrow Drive and Leverett Circle backed up as well.

Police kept protesters about 50 feet away from the Harvard Club entrance, with many of them spilling out onto Massachusetts Avenue.

``This war [in Iraq] has everything to do with greed ," said Alice Brown , 68, of Canton, whose son, Lieutenant Colonel David Floyd, recently returned from service in Iraq.

Some guests at the Eliot Hotel next door gathered on the hotel steps to watch the festivities.

DOJ_NMG_0061144

``I don't believe they have much intellect or understanding of the issues," John Hanron , 68, said of the protesters. He was in town from Lincoln, Calif., for a family reunion. ``I'm disappointed that we have this subversion going on."

But Janet Minkin , 60, on vacation from Milwaukee, didn't seem to mind. ``I agree with the protesters 100 percent," she said. ``I had a little trouble getting through to the hotel. But I'm glad to see them there."

Lieberman Points Out A Turnabout By Lamont (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Sept. 8 — Ned Lamont, who this week chastised Senator Joseph I. Lieberman for his public rebuke of President Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal, wrote to Mr. Lieberman at the time praising the eloquence of his speech on the Senate floor.

"I supported your statement because Clinton's behavior was outrageous: a Democrat had to stand up and state as much, and I hoped that your statement was the beginning of the end," Mr. Lamont, then a cable television executive, wrote in an e-mail message to the senator's Washington office on Sept. 16, 1998, two weeks after Mr. Lieberman's speech.

Mr. Lamont defeated Mr. Lieberman in last month's Democratic primary in Connecticut, but will face the incumbent — now running on his own party line — in November. In an interview with reporters and editors on Wednesday night in Washington, Mr. Lamont said he shared Mr. Lieberman's "moral outrage" over Mr. Clinton's sexual misbehavior but thought the senator should have handled it behind closed doors before making a public speech.

"You don't go to the floor of the Senate and turn this into a media spectacle," Mr. Lamont said of Mr. Lieberman's remarks. "You go up there, you sit down with one of your oldest friends and say you're embarrassing yourself, you're embarrassing your presidency, you're embarrassing your family, and it's got to stop."

At the time, Mr. Lamont wrote that he had "supported the moral outrage" Mr. Lieberman expressed reluctantly because he "thought it might make matters worse," adding that "unfortunately, the statement was the beginning of a process that has turned more political and morally offensive." He urged Mr. Lieberman to "stand up and use your moral authority to put an end to this snowballing mess," and suggested that "It's time for you to make up your mind and speak your mind as you did so eloquently last Thursday."

"I'm the father of three and the thought that Clinton testifying about oral sex before the grand jury may be broadcast into my living room is outrageous," Mr. Lamont wrote. "This sorry episode is an embarrassment to me as a father and to us as a nation."

A campaign aide to Mr. Lieberman alerted a reporter to the e-mail late Friday, after an article about Mr. Lamont's recent comments appeared in The New York Times. Mr. Lieberman's Senate office then faxed a copy of the message.

Casey Aden-Wansbury, a spokesman for Mr. Lieberman, said that after Mr. Lamont announced his candidacy, the senator recalled corresponding with him, and the staff culled old files. She said the 1998 missive was the only correspondence found from Mr. Lamont.

Mr. Lieberman's campaign aides pointed out Friday night that Mr. Lamont contributed $500 to his campaign shortly after the speech, in 1999, and did not donate to Mr. Clinton's legal defense fund.

Mr. Lamont, who declined to discuss the 1998 speech when an Associated Press reporter asked about it on Friday, was unavailable to explain the apparent discrepancy between his recent remarks and his e-mail at the time.

His campaign manager, Tom Swan, did not address the content of the message, but said in response: "It is clear that Senator Lieberman would prefer to try to cloud Ned's statements from eight years ago, instead of talking about the important issues of national security, the war in Iraq and health care. It is shocking to see that his Senate staff, at taxpayer expense, is spending their time trying to make up dirt on Ned Lamont."

Senator Lieberman, asked about Mr. Lamont's recent comments, said on Friday that "it was important for someone who was a Democrat to stand up and call on him publicly to accept more responsibility for what he had done."

Back in 1998, he wrote to thank Mr. Lamont, saying his "kind comments and words of support mean a great deal to me."

"This was the most difficult statement I have had to make in my 10 years as a senator," Mr. Lieberman wrote, adding a handwritten "Thanks, Ned" at the bottom. "So it is very reassuring that you feel I made the right decision in speaking out."

DOJ_NMG_0061145

Lieberman Defends 1998 Rebuke Of Clinton (AP-Y)

By John Christoffersen

AP, September 9, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman defended his reprimand of former President Clinton for his involvement with a White House intern, dismissing rival Ned Lamont's claim that he turned the 1998 rebuke into a spectacle.

"It was important for someone who was a Democrat to stand up and call on him publicly to accept more responsibility for what he had done," Lieberman said Friday. "In that case, I stood up and did what I believed was right for our country."

In September 1998, as the sex scandal raged, the Connecticut senator was the first prominent Democratic lawmaker to openly criticize Clinton's conduct with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. On the Senate floor, Lieberman spoke about being "personally angry because Clinton had, by his disgraceful behavior, jeopardized his administration's historic record of accomplishment."

The senator said his personal dismay evolved into "a larger, graver sense of loss for our country, a reckoning of the damage that the president's conduct has done to the proud legacy of his presidency."

Lamont, who defeated Lieberman in the Democratic primary Aug. 8, criticized the incumbent in an interview with The New York Times.

"You don't go to the floor of the Senate and turn this into a media spectacle," Lamont told reporters and editors from the newspaper during a dinner meeting Wednesday night.

"You go up there, you sit down with one of your oldest friends and say, 'You're embarrassing yourself, you're embarrassing your presidency, you're embarrassing your family, and it's got to stop,'" Lamont said.

Lamont, campaigning in Naugatuck on Friday, said he would have told Clinton what he thought before he said anything publicly.

"That's just the way I am," Lamont told The Associated Press. "I don't want to get into this issue anymore, though."

Lieberman, who is running as an independent after losing to Lamont, said his speech helped diffuse what had been partisan divisions over the scandal. He called it one of the toughest decisions of his life, but said he has no regrets.

Days before the Connecticut primary, Clinton joined Lieberman at a campaign rally.

"It's time for Ned to stop running a negative campaign and start talking about what he would do for the people of Connecticut over the next six years," Lieberman said. "He had to go back to 1998. Hey Ned, it's 2006."

Polls show Lieberman leading Lamont in a three-way race that includes Republican Alan Schlesinger.

As Outsider, Lieberman Walks A Tricky Path (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina And Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Sept. 8 — It was the sort of awkward moment that Senator Joseph I. Lieberman now faces regularly: He and the mayor of Stamford, both Democrats, recently appeared in a city park that Mr. Lieberman helped win millions for, and talked about their long friendship — and about how the mayor is not supporting him for re-election this fall.

“Joe Lieberman has a right to come to Stamford — it’s his town and his state,” said the mayor, Dannel P. Malloy, who, like many Democratic officials, has abandoned Mr. Lieberman for the party’s new Senate nominee, Ned Lamont. “When you do good work, you deserve to come and visit the projects you’re working on.”

Mr. Lieberman, as a three-term incumbent, never needed anyone to explain his right to visit Stamford before. But the senator is now running on his own party line, and he has begun a complicated, occasionally clumsy tango as he tries to woo Democrats, Republicans and unaffiliated voters without the backing of any party.

Since his defeat in the Aug. 8 Democratic primary, Mr. Lieberman has been seeking Democrats while appealing to Republicans with tough talk about terrorism that is similar to President Bush’s. He is mulling creating nonpartisan “citizen town committees” because he must build a new voter-turnout operation from scratch. And he is calibrating his language to try to appeal across party lines without seeming inconsistent or awkward — though, at times, he does.

DOJ_NMG_0061146

No longer the Democratic nominee, he has lost a handful of union endorsements, and his allies in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. may stay neutral. His campaign must replace and train hundreds of field workers that the state party usually deploys to help turn out voters. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, usually on his side, is now providing fund-raising and strategy help to Mr. Lamont. And there is no party organization that can quickly gather its members for the large campaign rallies that can be a shot in the arm.

Independent candidacies are rare, because party affiliation provides so many advantages: Fund-raising aid, battle-tested organizers, policy and strategy assistance, volunteers and an apparatus that can attack the candidate's opponent without the candidate appearing negative.

But interviews with Mr. Lieberman and his advisers make it clear that he has made a strategic bet: That his stature, name recognition, appeal among Republicans and power to deliver federal money to Connecticut will more than compensate for the lack of a party behind him. He has spent much of August highlighting federal projects he has supported — such as the $6 million park expansion that he and Mayor Malloy celebrated — and suggesting that a Senator Lamont, as a liberal in a Republican-controlled chamber, would not deliver as much. Mr. Lieberman said that if he is re-elected, he will continue to caucus with Senate Democrats.

Yet as Mr. Lieberman acknowledges, there is an element of making it all up as he goes along.

He hesitated when asked in a recent interview if there was any Republican endorsement he would not accept, knowing that his ties to President Bush have cost him before. He is trying to strike a balance between Republican and Democratic endorsements and appearances; for instance, he suggested, he was waiting for the right timing and opportunity to invite a Republican friend, Senator John McCain of Arizona, to campaign with him.

"I haven't asked him — yet," Mr. Lieberman said in a recent interview.

"This is a very different kind of race than anything that's been run before," he added. "Maine had an independent governor, and there was Jesse Ventura of Minnesota. I've taken a look at those. But as far as we can tell, we're doing something different here. The moment is different. So we're putting together a campaign in a way that makes sense for the moment."

Mr. Lieberman has hammered away at polarizing partisans in his campaign, though he is reluctant to say just whom he is referring to, other than Mr. Lamont, whom he once criticized as having too many ties to Republicans.

"People are sick of the partisanship and sick of the old party rules," Mr. Lieberman said on Friday.

Mr. Lieberman has managed to hire one prominent Democratic media consultant, Josh Isay, who demonstrated partisan flexibility by working for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg last year. (He already has a Republican pollster, who also works for Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.) Yet other Democrats have left his campaign, leaving Mr. Lieberman's staff of loyalists to shoulder many new tasks — in particular, building its own get-out-the-vote operation without relying on state and town Democratic organizations that can move voters to the polls.

Sherry Brown, who took over as Mr. Lieberman's campaign manager last month, said her team needed new ways to identify and mobilize voters beyond using the traditional lists of registered voters that the parties use to plan turnout strategy. The citizen committees are one idea; she also said the senator would rely more than usual on assistance from unions, environmentalists and other groups that have endorsed him, such as the Chamber of Commerce.

Vets for Freedom, a group with ties to top Republican strategists, is also planning to rally Republicans to vote for Mr. Lieberman, using commercials and other organizing tools. Alan Schlesinger, the Republican challenger, is trailing far behind, with only nominal support from his party leaders.

"The biggest question for us is the ground war: Where do you target for votes and how do you find and move people without a party organization?" said Ms. Brown, who oversees a paid staff of 25. "It's something we have to develop."

Lieberman advisers declined to discuss their strategy in detail, saying they did not want to tip their hand. But Ms. Brown said the senator would go after voters in the two major parties — and Connecticut's many independents — and would highlight his support for a higher minimum wage and access to better health care for the working class.

She said that Mr. Lieberman's popularity was strong enough across party lines to counter setbacks; she said invitations to him to march in local Democratic parades have been fewer than before, but added that he has received more invitations overall than he could ever accept.

DOJ_NMG_0061147

Mr. Lieberman's loss last month was also, to some extent, a loss for the state's Democratic Party apparatus. He has been a consistent fund-raiser for the party, helping add as much as $1 million to its coffers in some election years. He could tap his national base of donors for help, too. The newcomer, Mr. Lamont, may now end up devoting money and precious time to aiding the party.

Connecticut voters have a history of embracing independent candidates, most notably Lowell Weicker, a former Republican senator elected governor as an independent in 1990. And the makeup of the electorate appears hospitable to an independent bid: The largest bloc of registered voters, nearly 830,000, belongs to neither party, while there are 657,860 Democrats and 413,093 Republicans, as of last month.

"Connecticut tends to support mavericks — Chris Shays, Weicker, Lieberman — who show an independent streak and are willing to buck their own party," said Douglas Schwartz, director of the Quinnipiac University Poll.

While Mr. Lieberman has, as Mr. Weicker did, two advantages to help overcome the lack of a party — broad name recognition and a centrist image — the political dynamics have changed. The electorate today is sharply divided over the record and conduct of the Bush administration, and Mr. Lieberman appears to some as a sore loser who has tried to have it both ways — running as a Democrat and then as an independent. (Mr. Weicker became an independent before his 1990 run.)

"Lieberman's fate as an independent will depend on how he is viewed, and I think the bloom is off the rose as far as his image in the state," said Mr. Weicker, who lost his Senate race to Mr. Lieberman in 1988 and who is supporting Mr. Lamont this fall.

Mr. Lieberman said he hoped to create the sort of grass-roots, nonpartisan political movement that helped support the third-party former governors that he has looked to — Angus King of Maine and Mr. Ventura of Minnesota. Asked if there was enough time to do this, with less than 10 weeks until the general election, Mr. Lieberman said he was not sure.

"It's an open question," he said. "But it's my desire to create a real, independent citizens' movement in this race."

Tom Swan, Mr. Lamont's campaign manager, said there was no evidence that Mr. Lieberman could inspire such citizen brigades.

"How does he come across as anything but a whiny self-centered career politician trying to cling to power?" Mr. Swan asked.

Mr. Lieberman has walked a political tightrope at almost all of his campaign appearances, and has sometimes stumbled. Recently he called himself a "noncombatant" in the three Congressional races where Democrats are challenging incumbent Republicans; his aides amended the statement a day later, saying he would support the Democrats.

Lieberman advisers acknowledged that this episode was awkward, saying the senator was working through the right language to describe his support for Democratic Congressional candidates who have endorsed his rival, Mr. Lamont.

Adding to the confusion, two days after the "noncombatant" comment, Mr. Lieberman attended a motorcycle rally with one of the Republican incumbents, Congressman Christopher R. Shays, a close ally. Lieberman aides did not alert the press corps to the joint appearance, but according to a report on Fox News, Mr. Lieberman said that the Democrats should have considered the effects of his independent bid on their Congressional candidates before electing Mr. Lamont.

"Well, I guess I should say they should have thought of that during the primary," Mr. Lieberman said in the Fox segment. "But here we are."

At other times, Mr. Lieberman has reasserted his party credentials, calling himself a "proud Democrat."

Yet there is a fine line between party fidelity and his new pride as an independent, with Lamont supporters accusing him of caring only about "the party of one."

During a campaign stop in New London this week, Mr. Lieberman was dogged by reporters pressing him to explain whom he saw as his base of support.

"People treat the parties as if they are the only thing that matters," Mr. Lieberman said, adding that he hoped his run would show that there was a "higher loyalty to our state and our country."

Nancy Reagan Asks Webb To Pull Ad With Her Husband (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

DOJ_NMG_0061148

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 8 -- Former first lady Nancy Reagan on Friday asked Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb to not use a television commercial that shows former president Ronald Reagan praising Webb, his former Navy secretary.

In a letter faxed to Webb at 5 p.m., the chief of staff of the Reagan Library in California urged him to not use footage from a speech by the former president at the Naval Academy in 1985. Webb is trying to unseat Sen. George Allen (R) in November's election. The speech lauded Webb and his achievements.

"Using the president's name, image or likeness implies endorsement which is neither fair nor respectful of any candidate, certainly not after President Reagan's death," wrote Joanne Drake. "At the direction of Mrs. Reagan, please refrain."

The ad shows Reagan saying: "James's gallantry as a Marine officer in Vietnam won him the Navy Cross and other decorations." An announcer's voice continues as Reagan's image morphs into pictures of Webb as a Marine.

Webb's campaign immediately rejected the criticism and said it intended to proceed as planned by running the commercial in Norfolk, Roanoke and Northern Virginia. Spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd accused Allen's campaign of playing partisan politics.

"It doesn't imply an endorsement," Todd said. "It's Reagan in his own words. What Reagan said about Jim Webb, that belongs to Jim Webb, frankly."

The library's letter could hurt Webb's effort to woo moderates by wrapping himself in Reagan's legacy. But it could also give much broader attention to the ad, which Webb has paid less than $100,000 to run in just three television markets for a limited time.

The Reagan Library has often asked campaigns to refrain from using the former president's image. It made a similar request to the conservative Club for Growth in 2004, when the group ran an ad comparing Reagan to President Bush and criticizing Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.). An official at the library, Kirby Hanson, said Nancy Reagan was aware of the Webb ad and asked for the letter to be written. Hanson said the same would be asked of "any political campaign."

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said he hoped "the Webb campaign would respect the clear request of Mrs. Reagan."

But he declined to say whether Allen would remove a photo from his campaign Web site that shows Reagan and a young Allen shaking hands. It appears next to a Reagan quote.

"We do not have a television ad that is trying to convey the false impression that the late president has endorsed a candidate in this race. Only one campaign is trying to do that," Wadhams said.

Hanson declined to say whether the library would request that Reagan's image be taken down from Allen's Web site.

Earlier in the day, Allen unveiled a plan that he said would reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

In a speech from the Senate floor, Allen urged further exploration of oil and gas reserves in the United States, including in an Alaska wildlife area. And he called for more international cooperation to isolate oil-rich nations with which the United States is in conflict.

"In each challenge to our self-determination and freedom, we not only declared our independence, we mustered the resolve and the resources to achieve it," Allen said. "And it is time to declare our independence again."

Allen linked energy independence to the fight against terrorism, saying, "Today, many of our gasoline dollars now go to finance the war efforts of our enemies."

The speech coincided with Allen's new 30-second television advertisement, in which he says, "We need to be developing and exploring for more oil and gas in our own country." Allen advisers said the ad is running statewide.

Todd called Allen's proposals "rhetoric" without serious substance.

"It sounds like Allen is just trying to take care of his oil buddies to us," Todd said.

Concerns about energy and oil became issues in the race as gasoline prices surged this summer and the candidates traded barbs about connections to profitable oil companies.

Webb has accused Allen of taking $800,000 in campaign contributions from oil companies and has demanded that Allen give the money back. Allen, in turn, accused Webb of owning more than $64,000 in oil company stock.

DOJ_NMG_0061149

Webb has called for a windfall tax on oil company profits. Allen dismissed the idea, saying higher taxes would slow the economy.

In an interview after the speech, Allen dismissed critics who say some aspects of his proposal, such as drilling in the Artic National Wildlife Refuge, could endanger the environment.

"You would think [the refuge] was Yosemite or Yellowstone," Allen said. "There are not trees. It's barren. It's flat. It's tundra."

Nancy Reagan Objects To Campaign Ad (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 9, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb has a television ad ready to air featuring praise from his late boss Ronald Reagan — and Nancy Reagan called on him Friday to cancel it.

Webb, who was Reagan's Navy secretary before Webb switched to the Democratic Party, uses the ultimate GOP icon to send a sentimental message to conservatives and moderates courted by his Republican opponent, Sen. George Allen. The ad is scheduled to begin airing next week.

But a three-paragraph letter from the former first lady's office said the use of footage of Reagan, who died in 2004, is "neither authorized nor appropriate."

The 30-second ad opens with video of Reagan praising Webb during a commencement address at the U.S. Naval Academy in 1985, when Reagan was president and Webb, a Navy grad, was an assistant secretary of defense.

"James' gallantry as a Marine in Vietnam won him the Navy Cross and other decorations," Reagan says on the video.

Webb was campaigning in southwestern Virginia on Friday and was not immediately available for comment on the criticism. His campaign spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd, said the ad was fair.

"At this time, we are not changing our plans," Denny Todd said.

The first lady's letter, sent from the Ronald Reagan Presidential Foundation in Simi Valley, Calif., said use of his name and image implies endorsement of the candidate.

"At the direction of Mrs. Reagan, please refrain from the use of her husband's name, video footage, photograph, likeness, and/or quotes in any further campaign materials, including television advertisements," it concluded.

In a telephone interview, Edwin Meese, attorney general under Reagan, called use of the footage "improper, unethical and very possibly illegal. ... For him to use video of Ronald Reagan to appear in a campaign ad to favor him is fraud."

The ad debuts days after Allen mailed campaign brochures that include a photo of a boyish looking Allen standing beside Reagan. The same photo and a Reagan quote appear on Allen's campaign Web site.

"So, I guess this means George Allen is going to take down all the images he has on his Web site of him with Ronald Reagan?" Denny Todd said. "Where's the cease-and-desist order there?"

Webb became Navy secretary in 1987 but resigned the following year, refusing to reduce the Navy fleet after congressional budget cuts. More recently, he left the GOP over President Bush's decision to invade Iraq and other issues. He won a contentious Senate primary in June.

Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, called the ads "disingenuous and terribly hypocritical" and cited Webb's 1988 resignation, saying he "quit on Ronald Reagan after he did not get his way as Navy secretary."

Allen, seeking a second term, began airing his own biographical ads last month while Webb scrambled to raise money. Allen's campaign had more than $6.6 million on hand at the start of July compared with $424,245 for Webb.

Bellwether Community Still Handicapping Hopefuls (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

BEDFORD, Va. -- Voters here know how to pick winners in statewide elections.

This community of nearly 6,300 residents has picked the Republican winners -- President Bush and Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner -- and Democratic winners Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner in Virginia's presidential, congressional and gubernatorial races since 2000.

"We vote for the man, not the party," Grace Nichols, 69, told The Washington Times along with her husband, Ray, 76, at a local Hardee's -- a morning hangout for the city's older crowd.

With less than two months until voters choose among Mr. Allen, Democrat James H. Webb Jr. and Independent Green Party candidate Gail Parker in the race for one of Virginia's U.S. Senate seats, many residents in this city roughly 25 miles east of Roanoke feel disconnected from Capitol Hill, and are disappointed in the federal government's handling of the war in Iraq, immigration and other domestic issues.

"If I had my choice, I'd run every ... one of them out of the legislature," said Clarence Lawler, 76, a former Fairfax County teacher who now is a member of the Elks National Home retirement community. "They've sat ... all year long and done nothing."

Others say elected leaders don't live in the real world.

"You have 535 individuals living in a glass house inside the [Capital] Beltway, and it is all fogged for them," said Jim Revell, an independent who voted for Mr. Allen in 2000. "They can't see out into the real world."

Donna Keler, 50, agreed. "I make $663 a month on disability. Let them come down off their high horses and live on $663 a month."

Aside from the die-hard party faithful who are pretty much decided which candidate will get their vote, other residents seem hesitant to trade the familiar face of Mr. Allen for the unfamiliar face of Mr. Webb.

"I like Webb, but if I were to vote today it is still kind of a tossup," said Mr. Revell, 57, a Vietnam War veteran.

Mr. Lawler, a Republican who supports Mr. Allen, agreed. "I don't think that people down in this part of the country know Mr. Webb at all."

Local Democrats acknowledge Mr. Webb's limited name recognition is a problem.

"I don't know as much about [Mr. Webb] as I'd like to know," said Craig Amo, 60, a Democrat who owns Cup-a-Joe coffee house downtown. "To get the word out in the entire state takes money and he didn't have it until recently. I think between now and November we will get a lot more information out of Jim Webb."

Mr. Webb, Navy secretary under President Reagan, missed a chance to push his message in this part of the state on Labor Day, when he skipped the traditional campaign kick-off parade for statewide elections in nearby Buena Vista. Mr. Webb opted to spend time with his son, Jimmy, a 24-year-old Marine lance corporal, before he deployed to Iraq on Tuesday.

Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, is scheduled to appear in this part of the state at a variety of events today, and will begin airing his first 30-second campaign ad in Northern Virginia, Norfolk and Roanoke media markets showing a video clip of Mr. Reagan praising his military record.

Yesterday, former first lady Nancy Reagan told Mr. Webb in a three-paragraph letter not to use video of her husband praising him in the ad, the Associated Press reported.

The letter from Mrs. Reagan's office said using footage of Mr. Reagan was "neither authorized nor appropriate," the AP reported.

Mrs. Reagan's letter came the same day as two former members of the Reagan administration and the chairman of Mr. Reagan's presidential campaigns said they were displeased with the ad.

"James Webb is dishonoring the memory of President Reagan by using an old video clip to imply that Ronald Reagan would be supporting him," they said in a statement.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Webb told AP the ad was fair and the attacks against it were politically inspired by Mr. Allen.

"At this time, we are not changing our plans," spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said.

Residents here say that Mr. Webb still needs to sell them on what separates him from Mr. Allen.

"I saw [Mr. Webb] in debate and it was 'me too-isms,'" Mr. Lawler said. "[Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen] both spoke almost identically."

When asked why people still support Mr. Allen, the residents said the senator was a "great governor" who touts the conservative values people here hold dear.

For others, the reasons were simpler.

"On TV he looks straight at you," said Betty Miller, 74. "I like that."

DOJ_NMG_0061151

Still, Mr. Webb's military background plays well with others around the city of Bedford, home of the National D-Day Memorial.

A Marine who returned from Iraq last month and supported Mr. Allen in 2000 hinted he was leaning toward supporting Mr. Webb, a former Marine.

"Once a Marine, always a Marine," said the Marine, who did not want to be identified because of his military status.

New Jersey's Sen. Robert Menendez Faces Tough Challenge (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

NORTH PLAINFIELD, N.J. - The audience had listened politely. But people began to applaud loudly as Sen. Robert Menendez decried the war in Iraq.

"If I could not vote to send my son or daughter to war, I would not vote to send anyone else's son or daughter to war," the New Jersey Democrat said as the congregation at Shiloh Baptist Church - "A Place of Peace," as it bills itself - nodded in agreement.

Menendez - the son of Cuban immigrants and a sitting senator since his appointment to the post last January - is staking his campaign to keep his Senate seat on staunch opposition to the war, lacing his speeches with the body count and price tag of the conflict.

It's a strategy that Democrats hope to use to oust Republican incumbents. And it strikes a chord in this heavily Democratic state, where polls suggest that the war is increasingly unpopular. But Menendez's race - crucial to Democratic efforts to capture the Senate - has turned into an unexpectedly close and increasingly contentious contest, to the puzzlement of strategists, who wonder whether his ethnicity is a factor.

"New Jersey is behaving very, very oddly," noted Charles Cook, a nonpartisan handicapper who publishes the Cook Political Report. The seat, he said, may be the only Democratic Senate seat in jeopardy.

A former congressman, Menendez voted against the war in Iraq, and he's outdone his opponent 3-to-1 in fundraising. Still, he finds himself neck and neck with Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr., a state senator with a brief record but an outsized name.

Kean's father is former New Jersey Gov. Tom Kean, who chaired the Sept. 11 commission and is so revered that beachgoers along the Jersey shore over the Labor Day weekend needed to know only the familial ties to pledge support to his son.

"If you're half the person your father was, you've got my vote," Rosemary Sullivan, 67, a Fairfield retiree, called after the younger Kean as he worked the crowd in Lavallette.

Some question whether Menendez's Hispanic roots - and surname - are playing a role in dampening the polls.

"Sad to say, but I do think the Latino surname may be hurting him on the margins," said David Rebovich, a political science professor at New Jersey's Rider University Institute for New Jersey Politics. "And there's a lot of skepticism about the Hudson County ties."

The campaign in many ways has revolved around Hudson County, a gritty collection of cities hard by the New York skyline that for years has welcomed newly arrived immigrants - and earned a reputation for political corruption. Menendez is a former mayor of Union City, the second-largest city in Hudson County and the second-largest Cuban-American stronghold in the United States, after Miami.

Kean, who lives in suburban Westfield, denounces Menendez as a pol who muscled his way up the county ranks, calling him in an interview "nothing but a partisan Hudson County Democratic party boss." He's seized on newspaper accounts that Menendez collected $300,000 in rent from a nonprofit agency for which he helped land federal money, accusing him of a conflict of interest.

Menendez, charging that Kean is practicing the "politics of personal destruction," says the House Ethics Committee cleared the arrangement.

DOJ_NMG_0061152

Menendez says his campaign is "looking carefully" at statements that Kean and other Republicans have made, suggesting that they're thinly veiled attempts to denigrate the senator's Hispanic roots. New Jersey has never elected a Hispanic or black candidate statewide.

Menendez's campaign hopes for a comfortable vote cushion out of Hudson County, telling voters there that the Kean campaign is disparaging the county, which is increasingly Hispanic.

"I was one of three Hispanics in my elementary school. My brother was the second," Union City Mayor Albio Sires said. "Now the county is overwhelmingly Hispanic. It's really angering people that they're seeming to say people from Hudson County are no good."

Kean, who in campaign speeches accuses Menendez of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants by backing a Senate immigration bill, says he's not criticizing Hudson County, simply looking "to protect the hardworking people of Hudson County from the Democratic machine that is hurting New Jersey."

Menendez was appointed to the Senate to fill the term of Jon Corzine, who was elected governor.

His elevation to the Senate opens the way for the election of another Cuban-American congressman: Sires, who came to the United States from Cuba in 1962 at age 11.

Should Sires, a Democrat, win his race for Menendez's former House seat - and there are no signs that he won't - he'd be the fourth congressman with Cuban ties, along with Reps. Lincoln and Mario Diaz-Balart and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, all Florida Republicans.

"We'll be over-represented population-wise," rejoiced Cuban-American lobbyist Mauricio Claver-Carone, referring to the U.S. Cuban population, which numbers fewer than 2 million. "And that's just fine with us. We hope to be even more over-represented."

To that end, Claver-Carone's group, the U.S.-Cuba Democracy Political Action Committee, has maxed out contributions to Menendez, arguing that the community would benefit from a Republican Cuban-American senator, Mel Martinez of Florida, and a Democrat, Menendez.

Cuba, though, hasn't figured in the New Jersey race. Menendez said it rarely came up on the trail. "This is not Miami," he noted with a broad grin. Indeed, most of New Jersey's Cuban-Americans are loyal Democrats, Sires said.

Kean suggested that Cuba probably is the only area on which the two candidates agree. He said he had an aunt who'd fled Cuba, and he pledges he'd be staunchly pro-embargo.

The national parties are watching the race carefully. Democrats expect to hold the seat, central to their hope of taking control of the Senate.

But should the numbers continue to look rosy for Kean, national Republicans could throw some money his way, strategists suggest, though other states had looked more viable.

That New Jersey could be in play is worrying Democrats.

"The war could do it for him," said Ed Hughes, 72, a diehard Democrat who came to hear Menendez at a campaign event to quell doubts created by the ethics charges. "But they're going to try to take those machine ties and strangle him."

Inquiry Said To Involve An Agency's Links To Senator Menendez (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TRENTON, Sept. 8 — Federal prosecutors are reportedly examining the records of a nonprofit community agency in Hudson County that paid more than $300,000 in rent to Senator Robert Menendez while also getting millions of dollars in federal grants with Mr. Menendez's help.

WNBC-TV and The Star-Ledger of Newark reported on Thursday that the United States attorney's office had issued subpoenas to the agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, in Union City, this week. A spokesman for the United States attorney declined to confirm or deny those reports on Friday, and repeated attempts to reach the North Hudson Community Action Corporation were unsuccessful.

DOJ_NMG_0061153

But Mr. Menendez, speaking on Friday at the annual convention of the Democratic State Committee in Atlantic City, criticized the timing of the subpoenas as being politically motivated, and repeated his earlier assertions that he did nothing either illegal or unethical in renting the house to the agency for use as office space.

Mr. Menendez is in a tight race for a full six-year term against his Republican opponent, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. The United States attorney who issued the subpoenas, Christopher J. Christie, is a Republican appointed by President Bush.

"We have seen an orchestrated series of leaks, bogus ethics complaints and outright fabrications since the beginning of this campaign," said Mr. Menendez, adding that he personally had not been subpoenaed.

Jill Hazelbaker, Mr. Kean's communications director, dismissed Mr. Menendez's criticism.

"It's disturbing that despite an ongoing investigation by federal authorities, Bob Menendez refuses to take responsibility for his ethical failings," she said. "He's desperate and his campaign is imploding."

The landlord-tenant arrangement between Mr. Menendez and the agency is the latest flash point in a Senate race that has been dominated by accusations of ethical lapses.

Last month, two Republican assemblymen filed a federal ethics complaint claiming that Mr. Menendez had skirted conflict-of-interest rules in the transaction.

But Mr. Menendez repeated on Friday that he received oral permission from the House's ethics committee, and that the agency had received federal funds long before he was elected to Congress. He has also said that the agency, which provides various health and social services, had continued to receive funds, though he sold the house three years ago.

Mr. Menendez, who was appointed to the Senate by Gov. Jon S. Corzine to finish his term, was selected over several other Democrats, including Representative Robert E. Andrews of Camden County.

So when news of the subpoena spread on Friday, reporters asked Mr. Menendez and Mr. Andrews whether Mr. Menendez was under pressure to drop out of the race and be replaced by the congressman.

"In the end, this is all beside the point," Mr. Andrews said. "Menendez is going to win the election because of substance."

For his part, Mr. Menendez said that no one had asked him to drop out. "I think that if you heard all the speeches, the question need not be asked," he said, referring to those delivered by Democratic colleagues at the Atlantic City convention. "The answer is no."

Cardin, Mfume Seek To Distinguish Campaigns (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

One question remained after the two leading Democrats in Maryland's U.S. Senate primary debated for more than an hour in front of an audience of black pastors in Prince George's County yesterday.

"How do the two of you differ?" the moderator asked.

"A lot of times we seem to be very similar," Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin said. "I think we're different."

"We get this question all the time," said former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume, whose contest will be decided in Tuesday's primary, emphasized that they have avoided negative attacks and have focused on issues.

"We've been doing this in the right way," Mr. Cardin said.

But after opening statements and 10 rounds of questions on issues ranging from the war in Iraq and genocide in Sudan to mandatory minimum sentencing and same-sex "marriage," their responses provided little to separate the two candidates.

Whoever wins Tuesday likely will face Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, in the general election.

Yesterday's debate was held at the First Baptist Church of Glenarden in Landover.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume spent much of the hour yesterday agreeing on issue after issue, giving similar answers to the members of the Collective Banking Group Inc., which was formed to fight discriminatory lending against black churches.

On the question of bringing federal facilities to Prince George's, Mr. Mfume said, "Ben and I feel pretty much the same way."

DOJ_NMG_0061154

On federal funding for faith-based ministries, Mr. Cardin said, "Kweisi and I are in agreement about much of what has been said."

After the Rev. Jonathan Weaver posed the last question -- "How do you differ?" -- one pastor in the audience piped up, "That's the same question I was going to ask."

Mr. Cardin noted one difference. "Kweisi Mfume is a much better speaker than I am," he said. "I think I bring to this race more experience and more accomplishments."

Mr. Mfume said, "Ben is older than me, and I have more hair and mine is still black."

Mr. Cardin joined in the laughter at Mr. Mfume's joke.

Then Mr. Mfume talked about getting "special interest money" out of the political process and publicly financed campaigns, "so elections are not bought off by millionaires or billionaires."

Mr. Mfume has faced significant fundraising obstacles over his 17-month campaign, raising $1.1 million to Mr. Cardin's $5.5 million.

Mr. Steele has raised $5.2 million. As of Aug. 23, he had $3.1 million left, compared with Mr. Cardin's $1.6 million and Mr. Mfume's $307,437.

After the debate, some pastors said they appreciated the civility between Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume.

"I appreciate these guys treating each other with human respect, modeling before the community what it ought to be about," said the Rev. John K. Jenkins Sr., pastor of First Baptist Church of Glenarden.

But Mr. Weaver said he saw "very little difference" between the two candidates.

"If we had had two candidates that had very divergent views, I don't think that's an unhealthy thing, because then people could see that they have a very distinct choice," he said.

Democrats' Best Hopes Lie In Suburban The Northeast, Midwest (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

NORRISTOWN, Pa. - Lois Murphy is a Democrat eager to oust a Republican congressman and help her party take back control of the U.S. House of Representatives.

She's been here before. She fell short two years ago, but this time she swears it's different. She might be right.

She's in a good position to oust two-term Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach. It could be an isolated win, or, as Democrats hope, it could be part of a realignment of seats in the suburban Northeast back to the Democrats, who long dominated the region's politics.

There are 435 elections for House seats this fall, but only a few dozen are competitive, and they're almost all in the Northeast and Midwest. Many of them are held by moderate Republicans in places, such as suburban Philadelphia, that went for Democratic presidential candidates Al Gore and John Kerry, as well as local Democrats such as Gov. Ed Rendell.

Now, thanks in part to voters' anger at the war in Iraq and disapproval of President Bush, Democrats have an opportunity in these districts to take advantage of a shift away from the national Republican Party that was already occurring.

"It's a very different environment," Murphy said. "It's a very different mood."

Even before Murphy came along, the suburban districts were growing less enamored of Republican rule in Washington. Prosperous, largely white and white-collar, the suburbs are fiscally conservative and socially liberal.

"The voters in the suburbs here are thoughtful, educated, independent thinkers," said Murphy, a former abortion-rights lawyer. "For a number of years, some Republicans have been drifting away over social issues, religion and state, science and environmental protection. Those issues have been accumulating. ... It's been a trend that was already in place but has accelerated in the last year."

This 6th District of Pennsylvania, while still closely divided, seems to be leaning toward the Democrats. It went for Gore by a razor's edge in 2000 and for Kerry by 51-49 percent in 2004.

Next door, the state's 7th Congressional District went for Gore by 51-47 percent and for Kerry by 53-47. Republican Rep. Curt Weldon won easily there, but he faces a strong challenge now from Democrat Joseph Sestak, a retired vice admiral.

DOJ_NMG_0061155

The nearby 8th District went for Gore by 51-46 percent and for Kerry by 51-48. Freshman Republican Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick won easily last time when he stepped in at the last minute to replace a retiring congressman and faced token opposition from a weak Democrat. This time, he has a tough opponent in Patrick Murphy, an Iraq veteran who won a Bronze Star.

All three are close contests, according to independent analysts Stuart Rothenberg of the Rothenberg Political Report, Charles Cook of the Cook Political Report and Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia.

In the 6th District, Gerlach is no right-wing ideologue. He's voted against oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and against banning gay marriage, while voting to ban so-called partial-birth abortion. The National Journal, a respected Washington weekly, in 2004 put him in the middle on social issues and only slightly to the right on economic issues.

Yet Murphy might have the edge over him this time.

At this point two years ago, she trailed Gerlach in her own polling by 19 points and in campaign cash by $300,000. She closed strong, but lost, 51-49 percent.

Now, aides noted, she leads in the same poll by 1 point and has a cash advantage of $100,000 over Gerlach.

Election Day is Nov. 7.

Edwards Runs Tough Race Against Wynn (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Rep. Albert R. Wynn (D-Md.) has not faced formidable opposition since he was elected in 1992. He has trounced challengers, returning to office with no less than 80 percent of the vote in a primary or general election.

But Wynn is facing the political challenge of his career in Tuesday's Democratic primary against Donna Edwards, a lawyer and community activist who has mounted a vigorous and well-organized campaign to represent Maryland's 4th Congressional District.

Edwards drew little attention when she filed campaign papers in April to run against Wynn, but she has raised her profile in part with the help of Internet bloggers, who support her positions on the environment, campaign finance reform and Iraq. Edwards opposes the war; Wynn voted for the resolution authorizing it.

Connecticut businessman Ned Lamont's Democratic primary defeat of longtime incumbent Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman -- a vocal supporter of the Iraq war -- boosted enthusiasm about Edwards's campaign among bloggers. She continued to hammer Wynn on his vote to go to war in Iraq, calling the seven-term incumbent "Maryland's Joe Lieberman."

Wynn says he was misled by the Bush administration and notes that he was not the only Democrat who was. He has apologized for the vote and now believes the troops should be withdrawn.

"My opponent will say, 'Knowing what I know now, I wouldn't have voted for [the war],' " said Edwards during a recent NAACP candidates forum. "Well, sorry is just too late."

Wynn has spent little time campaigning in past elections but has increased his number of public appearances in his district, which includes parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties. And he said he is "reaching deep into the playbook" as the campaign goes into the final stretch.

"We take this campaign very seriously," Wynn said. "But let's not make it seem like I'm campaigning against the second coming of Huey Long."

Edwards is a newcomer to Maryland politics. She has worked on Capitol Hill as a lobbyist for groups such as the Center for a New Democracy, where she was the executive director. On a national level, she has pushed for funding for domestic violence victims and reforming the campaign finance system. Locally, she and a community activist group fought against the building of National Harbor, a multibillion dollar resort along the Potomac River, until developers agreed to add a residential component to the project. She has received endorsements from Progressive Democrats of America, the Sierra Club and the National Organization for Women's political action committee.

"I'm not in this as a joke, and I'm not in this to make a statement," Edwards recently told a group of residents during a meet-and-greet at a Mitchellville home. "I'm in this to win it."

DOJ_NMG_0061156

Edwards supports a withdrawal from Iraq but has declined to say what the timetable should be. She wants to raise the minimum wage and thinks the country's energy policy should be weaned off of fossil fuels.

But the cornerstone of her campaign is portraying Wynn as out of step with the district's voters.

She points out that Wynn broke ranks with the party to vote in favor of the Bush administration's energy bill in 2003, which authorized tax breaks for energy producers. Wynn also supported the repeal of the estate tax, which would benefit the wealthiest Americans.

These votes, Edwards says, betray the constituents in the solidly Democratic district that runs from Clarksburg in Montgomery to Fort Washington in Prince George's.

Wynn says Edwards, who worked in his law office when she first got out of law school, has mischaracterized his record.

His campaign literature touts the backing of about 40 left-leaning groups, including the AFL-CIO and Planned Parenthood, as evidence that he remains a true Democrat, despite Edwards's attempts to cast him otherwise.

"I consistently vote with pro-choice, I consistently vote with labor unions," Wynn said during a recent interview. "This is a bunch of rubbish of the worst sort."

He makes no apologies for his vote on the Republican-sponsored energy bill. "I'm happy to stand behind the energy bill," he said, noting that the legislation included a $3 billion increase in energy assistance for low-income residents. "I'm more concerned about getting money for low-income residents. She's more concerned about having a partisan fight."

Wynn said he supports repealing the estate tax because business owners in his district and wealthy first-generation African Americans across the country requested it and because he believes people should be taxed when they are alive.

But he is not used to having to explain his position. In the past, he has faced opponents such as Republican John Kimble, who once said he was running because "the salary seems good." Kimble perhaps was best known for offering to pose nude in Playgirl magazine in a stunt to raise campaign money, and he recruited Wynn's ex-wife to do a radio ad six years ago.

Wynn described the contest with Edwards, who has support from Barbra Streisand, Danny Glover and Gloria Steinem, as "the liberal elite versus the pragmatic Democrat."

Although many political observers applaud Edwards's aggressive campaign, they say she has little chance of defeating the seven-term incumbent.

"She's put together a very energetic campaign," said Matthew A. Crenson, a political science professor at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. "But he's firmly entrenched."

Edwards said that when she became disillusioned with Wynn's record, she began asking elected officials about running against him. "No one would do it," said Edwards, who has not campaigned for office since high school. "They said, 'He can't be beaten, he has a machine.' "

Wynn continues to wave signs on busy intersections in Prince George's and Montgomery, and Edwards continues to try to penetrate Wynn's popularity, holding meet-the-candidate events in living rooms and basements across the district.

Nakia Nicholson, a teacher and Wynn supporter who recently attended one of Edwards's events, left impressed.

"I think she's a very knowledgeable, very capable candidate," Nicholson said.

But was she swayed?

"I'm in the middle right now," she said.

Governor Apologizes For Ethnic Comments (LAT)

By Robert Salladay And Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Schwarzenegger says reading his remarks on 'hot' Latinos made him uncomfortable.

SACRAMENTO — Saying he cringed after reading his own words, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized Friday for characterizing a Latina lawmaker as hotblooded because of her ethnicity.

The governor said he was disturbed by published reports of a casual conversation with top aides at a private meeting in his Capitol office last spring, recorded by a staff member preparing a speech for him. He apologized for the remarks at a news conference in Santa Monica with Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City), the subject of his comments, smiling as she stood next to him.

DOJ_NMG_0061157

"Anyone out there that feels offended by these comments, I just want to say I'm sorry. I apologize," Schwarzenegger said.

"The fact is that if I would hear these kind of comments in my house, by my kids, I would be upset," Schwarzenegger said. "It's one thing when you say things, but it's another thing when you read it in the paper. It made me cringe. It made me feel uncomfortable."

The Times obtained a copy of the audio recording and published the governor's remarks on its website Thursday evening and in the newspaper Friday.

On the six-minute recording, Schwarzenegger discusses Garcia with his Democratic chief of staff, Susan Kennedy. Their conversation, consisting mostly of casual banter, veered away from talk about two Republican legislative leaders to Garcia and her ethnic identity.

"She maybe is Puerto Rican or the same thing as Cuban. I mean, they are all very hot," the governor said. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

And he recalled a Cuban-born bodybuilder who, he said, "was like that."

Garcia, who has been campaigning for Schwarzenegger as one of his highest profile Latina supporters, said there was no need for apologies, because she refers to herself as hotblooded. The governor attended a fundraiser for Garcia's reelection campaign Thursday.

"I am not mad that he recognizes that I am passionate about the issues," she said, echoing comments she made to The Times on Thursday, "and I am not mad that he allows me to tell him exactly what I think, and what's on the mind of people in my community. So again, there is no need to apologize."

Assembly Republican leader George Plescia (R-San Diego), whom Kennedy said on the recording looked like a startled deer, also said no apology was necessary, although both the governor and Kennedy called him to express regret. He said he was not offended.

Plescia said his office was planning to make T-shirts with the phrase "Wild Bunch" on them for every member of the Legislature's GOP caucus — a reference to Schwarzenegger's characterization of Republican lawmakers on the recording.

"Some of us have thought of wearing it like a badge of honor," Plescia said.

On the recording, Schwarzenegger muses about Plescia's ability to "control that wild bunch upstairs," and describes the chamber's Republicans as an "unruly bunch of guys and girls."

Schwarzenegger said at the news conference that he had called several Latino and African American community leaders to discuss his taped remarks with them, although he did not name them. They understood that the remarks were part of an "off-the-record conversation, and it was not meant to be in any negative way," he said.

Schwarzenegger said the conversation had been taped, as some of his meetings are, "because I have a certain way of speaking" and because it helps his speechwriters get the "texture" of his accent.

"So I don't sound like any other politician speaking, I always sound like Arnold," he said, noting that his speechwriter was new on the job at the time.

The governor's apology did not mollify his opponents. State Treasurer Phil Angelides, the Democrat who is challenging his reelection bid this year, issued a statement saying Schwarzenegger "has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state."

"His comments reflect a disturbing pattern of behavior," the statement said. "The governor has a responsibility to conduct himself with dignity."

Rep. Hilda L. Solis (D-El Monte) said she thought the comments were disrespectful because they portrayed Latinas as objects, not individuals with differing personalities.

"What is really sad is we're always trying to defy these stereotypes, especially Latino women in important positions," Solis said. "This doesn't help us. People just want to brush us off and depict us in a negative manner."

Schwarzenegger did not refer to his earlier remarks in a brief speech later Friday morning at the opening ceremonies of the Los Angeles County Fair in Pomona. During a leisurely stroll through the rows of hot dog and cotton candy stands, he obliged requests to recite lines from "The Terminator," autographed checkbooks and maps of the fair, and took one teenager's cellphone to say hello to the young man's friend on the other end.

DOJ_NMG_0061158

Many of his greeters included blacks and Latinos, few of whom said they were disturbed by Schwarzenegger's comments about ethnicity and personality.

"It's probably true," said Frank Rodriguez, a stove assembly technician from La Puente who described himself as being of Mexican descent. "There's a lot more things to be offended about. He has a right to say what he wants, just like we do. If it was just anybody else on the street — if I said it, if you said it — nobody would care."

Vincent Kirby, a retired computer assembler from La Puente who said he is still deciding whether to vote again for Schwarzenegger, said the comments weren't likely to sway him one way or another.

"But as governor," said Kirby, 53, who said his ancestors included Spaniards, American Indians and Cajuns, "to really keep his face and his character and his charisma up, he should really avoid stuff like that."

*

robert.salladay@latimes.com; michael.finnegan@latimes.com

Times staff writer Maeve Reston contributed to this report.

Schwarzenegger Apologizes For Ethnic Group Remarks (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 8 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized Friday for saying in a closed-door meeting in March that Cubans and Puerto Ricans were naturally passionate because of their combination of “black blood” and “Latino blood.”

The comments were captured on tapes during a speechwriting session between Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican seeking re-election, and his chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, when they spoke of their shared affection for Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia’s legislative style.

“I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot,” the governor says on the recording. “They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it.”

The Los Angeles Times, which obtained a tape of the remarks, reported about them on Friday.

Early Friday, Mr. Schwarzenegger’s Democratic opponent, Phil Angelides, released a statement chastising the governor.

“Once again, Governor Schwarzenegger has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state,” Mr. Angelides said.

But Ms. Garcia, a Republican and an ally of Mr. Schwarzenegger, responded in kind.

“The only embarrassment in California today is Phil Angelides’s sad and predictably partisan statement,” she said in a statement distributed by the Schwarzenegger campaign.

Soon, black and Hispanic lawmakers issued their own news releases, some saying they did not care for Mr. Schwarzenegger’s remarks, others saying there was nothing wrong with them.

Mr. Schwarzenegger called a news conference in Los Angeles with Ms. Garcia at his side to make the standard political apology.

“To anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I apologize,” he said.

“I called several Latino leaders,” Mr. Schwarzenegger said. “It was very clear that all of them understood that this was an off-the-record conversation, and they all said to me we are not preoccupied with these kind of things.”

Ms. Garcia praised the governor for recognizing “that I am passionate about the issues.”

Schwarzenegger Says He Is Sorry (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized yesterday for declaring during a closed-door meeting that Cubans and Puerto Ricans are "hot" because of their combination of "black" and "Latino blood."

DOJ_NMG_0061159

The action hero-turned-governor acknowledged that the tape-recorded comments made him "cringe" when he read them in yesterday's editions of the Los Angeles Times.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I'm sorry, I apologize," Schwarzenegger said, adding that if he heard his children make similar comments, "I would be upset."

Schwarzenegger was captured making casual remarks about fellow Republicans on a six-minute tape recorded during a March 3 speechwriting session with his advisers. The Los Angeles Times obtained the tape, placed a link to it on its Web site and put the story about Schwarzenegger's remarks on its front page.

On the tape, Schwarzenegger and chief of staff Susan Kennedy, who is a member of the Democratic Party, praise state Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City) and speculate about her ethnicity.

"I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot," the governor says on the recording. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

The pair spoke affectionately about Garcia in the context of their attempts to induce recalcitrant Republican lawmakers to go along with a series of massive bond proposals to rebuild California's crumbling infrastructure that Schwarzenegger was attempting to hash out with the legislature. Californians will vote on the package, the biggest in the state's history, in November; Schwarzenegger is also running for reelection.

Garcia, who is Puerto Rican and the only Latina Republican in the assembly, appeared with Schwarzenegger yesterday and said she was not offended by the governor's comments. Garcia earlier told the Times that she refers to herself a "hot-blooded Latina."

"I love the governor because he is a straight talker just like I am," she said.

Another subject of the tape, Republican Assemblyman Kevin McCarthy, who was referred to as "Bakersfield boy," said he thought the tape was funny.

Schwarzenegger's opponent, Democratic nominee Phil Angelides, criticized the governor. "Once again, Governor Schwarzenegger has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state," Angelides said in a statement released by his campaign. "His comments reflect a disturbing pattern of behavior. The Governor has a responsibility to conduct himself with dignity."

Garcia criticized Angelides, who trails Schwarzenegger by 13 points in the latest statewide poll, for trying to make political hay from the remarks. "The only embarrassment in California today is Phil Angelides' sad and predictably partisan statement," she said.

It is clear in listening to the tape that the governor and his aides knew they were being recorded, most probably by aide Gary Delsohn, a former Sacramento Bee reporter who was present at the meeting and is now the governor's chief speechwriter.

At one point, Schwarzenegger calls Kennedy a "major, major champion."

"Got that on tape?" Kennedy responds.

"It's on tape," Delsohn answers.

The comments on the tape are not the first time Schwarzenegger has sparked controversy or that the Los Angeles Times has put it on its front page.

In late August, Schwarzenegger settled a libel lawsuit with former late-night British TV personality Anna Richardson, who claimed she was groped by the Hollywood actor during a 2000 interview and defamed by his aides during his 2003 campaign for governor. Richardson's allegations and those of several other women were the subject of a front page Los Angeles Times article that ran days before Schwarzenegger's election in an unprecedented recall against his predecessor, Democrat Gray Davis.

"Just like the first L.A. Times story, I don't think this one is going to have any effect on the election," said Allan Hoffenblum, a Republican strategist. "Arnold is so well known among voters. No one thinks he's a bigot. He's just being Arnold."

Nonetheless, Hoffenblum said Schwarzenegger knows that the Latino vote in California is crucial for his reelection prospects. However, there was little sign yesterday that Latino leaders had taken offense.

A spokesman for Fabian NuÃ±ez, speaker of the Assembly and a co-chair of Angelides's campaign, said Schwarzenegger's relations with the Hispanic community had always been good. "These are hardly Nixon's Watergate tapes," spokesman Richard Stapler said.

DOJ_NMG_0061160

Schwarzenegger Regrets 'Very Hot' Remark (AP-Y)

By Michael R. Blood

AP, September 9, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized Friday for saying in a closed-door meeting that the mixture of Hispanic and black blood gives Puerto Ricans and Cubans "very hot" personalities.

The Republican governor said he cringed when he read his own words in the Los Angeles Times story on Friday and added that the comments, referring to a GOP legislator, were not "meant to be in any negative way." Some critics were outraged, but even some Democrats said his remarks appeared to be more playful than disparaging.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I'm sorry, I apologize," Schwarzenegger told reporters outside a seaside hotel in Santa Monica.

The statements about Hispanics and blacks were captured on a six-minute tape made during a March 3 speechwriting session between Schwarzenegger and his advisers. On it, Schwarzenegger and chief of staff Susan Kennedy speak affectionately of state Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia and speculate about her nationality.

"I mean Cuban, Puerto-Rican, they are all very hot," the governor says on the recording. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

Schwarzenegger, in a tight re-election race, has displayed a more restrained, statesmanlike demeanor while all but retiring his trademark Hollywood swagger. But the newly disclosed remarks challenge that carefully managed image and provide a reminder of his history of off-the-cuff — and sometimes off-color — remarks.

He once called California legislators "girlie men" and talked of kicking nurses' "butts," the kind of comments he has sought to avoid during his re-election year.

Garcia, who is Puerto Rican, appeared with Schwarzenegger on Friday and said she was not offended by the governor's comments. Garcia earlier told the Times that she often calls herself a "hot-blooded Latina."

Schwarzenegger also said he called leaders from ethnic groups, who he said were not upset.

The Democrat who wants to unseat him, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, said the governor "used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians."

U.S. Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Oakland, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, said Schwarzenegger's "racist comments were disgusting," while Esteban Torres, chairman of the National Latino Media Council, called the remarks "an enormous slip of the Schwarzenegger tongue."

But Assemblyman Mervyn Dymally, a Democrat who chairs the state Legislative Black Caucus, called the remarks "usual political banter. We do this all the time. In this case, it just happened to be taped."

"These are hardly Nixon's Watergate tapes," said Richard Stapler, a spokesman for state Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, a Democrat.

Schwarzenegger aides routinely tape his speechwriting sessions so the writers can keep a record of his thoughts and speaking patterns.

The newspaper did not say how the tape was obtained. The participants suggest during the meeting that they know they are being recorded.

Major Iranian Bank Is Blocked From Using U.S. Financial System (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration said it has blocked a major Iranian bank's access to the U.S. financial system, the latest step in Washington's growing attempt to isolate Iran.

Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said Bank Saderat, one of Iran's largest state-owned banks, no longer will be able to use the U.S. financial system. In a speech before the American Enterprise Institute, Mr. Levey said Bank Saderat had helped transfer hundreds of millions of dollars to terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah and Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0061161

The quest to cut off Iran's support to Hezbollah gained urgency this summer when the Shiite Muslim militia and Israel engaged in intense fighting in Lebanon and Hezbollah unleashed hundreds of rockets into Israel. The size of Hezbollah's arsenal raised alarm at the level of Iranian support for the group.

At the same time, the U.S. is eager to show that Iran can be cut off economically in the run-up to United Nations Security Council debates this fall that will focus on ways to impose economic sanctions for Tehran's refusal to give up its nuclear program's uranium-enrichment work.

The move is part of a broader Bush administration effort to hamper Iran's efforts to aid terrorism and acquire sophisticated weapons, by convincing other governments and financial institutions world-wide to stop doing business with Iranian-controlled companies.

"This is an appropriate leveraging of U.S. economic sanctions by authorities to make it more difficult for Iran to use the common international financial infrastructure to engage in buying materials for its nuclear program, to support terrorist activities and to do other bad stuff that jeopardizes security," says Jonathan Winer, a former State Department official in the Clinton administration and now a partner at law firm Alston & Bird LLP.

While Iranian financial institutions can't directly access the U.S. financial system, they can touch it indirectly by working through foreign banks. These so-called "U-turn transactions" allow U.S. banks to process payments involving Iran if the money transfer begins and ends with a non-Iranian foreign bank. Friday's move will prohibit Bank Saderat from participating in transfers involving U.S. banks.That, in turn, will pressure foreign banks to stop dealing with Bank Saderat.

U.S. Moves To Isolate Iranian Banks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The Bush administration has stepped up a broad effort to choke off Iran's ability to finance militant groups and acquire weapons technology by cutting off suspect banks and firms from the international banking system, U.S. officials said yesterday.

The initiative has gathered steam in recent weeks, even as the U.S.-led effort to bring sanctions against Iran for its nuclear activities has slowed at the U.N. Security Council. Officials have especially focused on Iran's financing of the radical Shiite militant group Hezbollah in the aftermath of Israel's war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon this summer.

The Treasury Department said yesterday it had cut off one of Iran's largest state-owned banks from the U.S. financial system, accusing Bank Saderat of funneling $50 million to a Hezbollah-controlled firm since 2001. The bank -- which has about 3,400 branch offices across the Middle East and elsewhere -- has also been used by Iran to transfer money to Hamas, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, the Treasury Department said.

Iranian banks are already barred from doing business directly with U.S. banks, but U.S. banks are permitted to process payments involving Iran that begin and end with a non-Iranian foreign bank, in what are called "U-turn" transactions. Treasury's action will end such indirect access for Bank Saderat.

On Thursday, Treasury separately targeted two Lebanon-based financial institutions that officials said acted as Hezbollah's unofficial treasury, helping secure loans and finance business deals for the organization, among other things.

Stuart Levey, the Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said he will go to Europe next week to enlist support from governments and financial institutions for severing Iran from the international financial system. Other Treasury and State Department officials are traveling across Asia and the Middle East to make similar pitches.

"This is certainly an example of the variety of different levers that are available not only to the United States, but other countries as well about how to bring about a change in behavior in the Iranian regime," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, referring to the action against Bank Saderat.

"Our actions this week are a sign of the costs that Iran's leaders will impose on the Iranian people if the leadership chooses to remain on its current path of defiance," Levey said yesterday in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute. "The regime will end up isolating Iran from the world community, with reputable financial institutions becoming increasingly unwilling to handle Iran's business."

DOJ_NMG_0061162

Levey noted that earlier this year the Swiss bank UBS ended its dealings with Iran, while two other banks, HSBC and Credit Suisse, sharply curtailed their business.

"The next steps may involve sacrifice, but I think that people are beginning to recognize that the costs we face now pale in comparison to those we might face in the future if Iran does not change course," he said.

Levey said Treasury has had tremendous success against North Korea, which has suffered since Treasury a year ago accused a bank in Macao of being a conduit for North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering. A number of financial institutions around the world immediately stopped doing business with North Korea, Levey said, warning that all financial institutions should consider abandoning dealings with North Korean companies. "The line between North Korea's licit and illic it money is nearly invisible," he said.

North Korea has refused to return to multilateral disarmament talks, citing the Treasury action.

U.S. Cracks Down On Iranian Bank (AP-Y)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, September 9, 2006

The Bush administration, stepping up the pressure on Tehran, moved Friday to sever a big Iranian state-owned bank from the U.S. financial system.

Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said the government's action is against Bank Saderat, which the United States contends is used by Iran to transfer money to terrorist groups, inclu ding Hezbollah.

While Iranian financial institutions are barred from directly accessing the U.S. financial system, they are permitted to do so indirectly through a bank in another country. The United States is closing down that avenue for Bank Saderat, a U.S. Treasury official explained. The action, which involved a change in regulations, doesn't apply to other Iranian banks, the official said.

"Today we have cut off one of the largest Iranian state-owned banks, Bank Saderat, from the U.S. financial system," Levey said.

It marked the administration's latest effort to turn up the heat on Iran.

The United States wants the U.N. to impose sanctions against Iran unless the country stops enriching uranium, a key step in making nuclear weapons.

Friday's action also is the latest step to financially clamp down on Hezbollah, which the United States says is bankrolled in large part by Iran.

The U.S. calls Lebanon-based Hezbollah a terrorist group that is suspected of involvement in terrorist attacks worldwide. The U.S. also blamed Hezbollah for triggering recent bloodshed in the Middle East involving Lebanon, Israel and the terrorist organization.

Levey said that since 2001 a Hezbollah-controlled organization, which he did not identify, received $50 million directly from Iran through Bank Saderat.

"Hezbollah has used Bank Saderat to transfer funds, sometimes in the millions of dollars, to support the activities of other terrorist organizations such as Hamas in Gaza," Levey said. "We will no longer allow a bank like Saderat to do business in th e American financial system, even indirectly."

Levey will be traveling to Europe, where he'll talk to government officials and business people about persuading banks and other financial institutions to stop doing business with Iran. Some banks are already rethinking their relationships with the country, he said.

"Earlier this year, the Swiss bank UBS cut off all dealing with Iran," Levey said. "HSBC and Credit Suisse have also limited their exposure to Iranian business."

It is a difficult decision for banks to make given Iran's standing in the global economy, including its position as a major oil supplier, Levey acknowledged in an interview with The Associated Press last week.

"The next steps may involve sacrifice, but I think that people are beginning to recognize that the costs we face now pale in comparision to those we might face in the future if Iran does not change course," Levey said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0061163

U.N. Is Moving To Punish Iran, U.S. Envoy Says (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 8 — The United States wants the major powers to begin talks next week on a draft United Nations resolution against Iran if it does not halt its enrichment of uranium, a senior American official said Friday.

"We are heading toward the U.N. Security Council to consider a sanctions regime," R. Nicholas Burns, the United States under secretary of state for political affairs, said in a speech at the American Academy in Berlin after meeting with diplomats from Britain, France and Germany. He also met separately with representatives of China, Russia, Japan, Italy and Canada.

Mr. Burns said that the meeting with the European diplomats, held Thursday, was "the first time we sat together to discuss what type of sanctions" to impose on Iran. He said talks with them and the diplomats from Russia and China would resume Monday by conference call, and then shift to the United Nations.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday, and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution," he said, adding that sanctions would be "directed at the Iranian government and the nuclear industry" as well as its nuclear research program.

The sanctions proposal would consist of two phases, said a senior diplomat familiar with the talks. The first would aim to limit international travel by Iranian nuclear experts and freeze their assets outside Iran. If the enrichment program continued, the diplomat said, the United States would urge that the travel ban and freeze on assets be extended to top government officials.

He said he hoped a draft resolution would be ready when the General Assembly convenes Sept. 18.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, is to meet Saturday with Ali Larijani, Iran's nuclear negotiator.

U.S. Expects Iran Sanctions Within Weeks (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

The United States expects a Security Council agreement on U.N. sanctions against Iran within weeks unless Tehran agrees at the last minute to freeze uranium enrichment, a senior State Department official said Friday.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns also dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-power coalition pushing Tehran to give up enrichment.

Speaking a day after those countries ended confidential discussions in Berlin, Burns said further talks were needed on how harshly to penalize Tehran for its refusal to freeze enrichment, as demanded by the Security Council. But he said a lot of progress was made.

Outlining the U.S. view of the timetable on Iran in the coming weeks, Burns said the six nations would further consult by phone on Monday and hoped to present a unified approach on sanctions to their foreign ministers by the time the U.N. General Assembly opens Tuesday.

"It's fair to say we have ... a lot more work to do," he told guests at an event staged by The American Academy in Berlin. "But I believe we will be successful in passing the sanctions resolution shortly" in the Security Council, he added.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution" on sanctions, he said.

Thursday's meeting in Berlin came amid efforts by key European nations to enlist world support in pressuring Iran to give up uranium enrichment.

In a confidential document obtained by The Associated Press and sent to dozens of capitals last week, Britain, France and Germany warned that Tehran's stalling tactics on whether it was ready to meet terms for new nuclear talks were an attempt "to split the international community."

But there were indications that France, a key U.S. ally in pushing for firm U.N. action against Iran, might be wavering.

While Iran has expressed a desire for negotiations, the six nations have insisted that Iran suspend enrichment before talks begin. The six countries — Germany plus Security Council powers Britain, France, China, Russia and the U.S. — have offered Iran a package of economic, political and strategic rewards to comply with the demand.

DOJ_NMG_0061164

But French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy on Thursday appeared to suggest that demand was negotiable, saying: "The question is to know at what moment this suspension takes place compared to negotiations."

Burns dismissed suggestions of a split, saying all five permanent Security Council members insist negotiations should not start until Iran suspends enrichment.

"I have not heard from any government from this group that we should change the basic offer, that hasn't changed," he said, adding: "No one mentioned anything like this" during Thursday's meeting.

"The Iranians are in a very tough position," Burns said. "At first they thought, let's divide the United States from the EU-3 and that didn't succeed. The Iranians are obviously trying to divide Russia and China from the rest of us, and that hasn't succeeded."

Still, a diplomat familiar with the U.S. stance said Burns was worried about the French statement, which would weaken what has been a unified stance between the four Western countries in the six-nation coalition for a need to move to sanctions if Iran remains defiant.

Mohammed Khatami, the two-term former Iranian president, suggested that not only France but Russia and China — which have been skeptical about sanctions — were no longer insisting that an enrichment freeze had to precede negotiations.

"As far as I know, Russia, China and France are interested in pursuing the dialogue even without preconditions," he said Thursday in Washington.

Burns spoke on the eve of a crucial meeting between senior EU envoy Javier Solana and Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator. An Iranian official told the AP the talks were set for Vienna, with Larijani scheduled to arrive Friday evening.

The talks are considered a final attempt to find common ground to start negotiations between Iran and the six powers.

As the Americans and their allies worked at the Berlin meeting to overcome Russian and Chinese opposition to sanctions, the European document appealed to other countries for support.

The 1 1/2-page paper labeled "In Confidence" summarizes Iran's response to incentives package. The six powers have also asked Iran to consider a long-term moratorium on the technology, which can be misused to make nuclear arms.

Iran, which insists its nuclear program is meant only to produce fuel, refused suspend enrichment by an Aug. 31 deadline set by the Security Council. Its Aug. 22 response to the rewards offer has been kept confidential. But the United States and its allies have described it as unsatisfactory, primarily because of Tehran's refusal to consider freezing enrichment.

"The Iranian goal obviously is to split the international community," says the document, drawn up by Britain, France and Germany. While not specifically threatening U.N. sanctions, it says the Security Council will have to consider "further steps" if Tehran continues to defy the council.

Diplomats familiar with the document said it was drawn up to inform other nations of the substance of Iran's counteroffer and share the Western view that it was inadequate.

"The reply is along the lines of previous Iranian statements in that typically it neither accepts nor rejects outright" the six-nation proposal, said the document.

U.S. Confident Of Sanctions On Tehran (WT/AP)

By George Jahn

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

BERLIN -- The United States expects a U.N. Security Council agreement on sanctions against Iran within weeks unless Tehran agrees to freeze uranium enrichment, a senior State Department official said yesterday.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns also dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-nation coalition pushing Tehran to give up enrichment.

Speaking a day after those countries ended confidential discussions in Berlin, Mr. Burns said further talks were needed on how harshly to penalize Tehran for its refusal to freeze enrichment, as demanded by the Security Council. But he said a lot of progress had been made.

In Washington, former Iranian President Mohammed Khatami told a group of American Muslims that they should take the lead in condemning terrorist attacks like the one on September 11, as well the wave of "Islamophobia" and distorted images of Islam that followed the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0061165

"We Muslims should condemn these atrocities even more strongly," he said, speaking through an interpreter.

"Warmongers, those who kill and suppress and those who commit acts of terror, if they identify themselves with Islam," they are lying, he said.

Mr. Khatami, president of Iran from 1997 to 2005, spoke at a dinner hosted by the Council on American-Islamic Relations, the country's largest Muslim civil liberties group, as part of a three-day visit to Washington. He is the highest ranking Iranian official, current or former, to visit the United States since the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

The ex-president is scheduled to conclude his two-week, five-city American tour with a speech at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government in Boston tomorrow.

Outlining the U.S. view of the timetable on Iran in the coming weeks, Mr. Burns said the six nations would further consult by phone on Monday and hoped to present a unified approach on sanctions to their foreign ministers by the time the U.N. General Assembly opens Tuesday.

"It's fair to say we have ... a lot more work to do," he told guests at an event hosted by the American Academy in Berlin. "But I believe we will be successful in passing the sanctions resolution shortly" in the Security Council, he added.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution" on sanctions, he said.

Thursday's meeting in Berlin came amid efforts by key European nations to enlist world support in pressuring Iran to give up uranium enrichment.

While Iran has expressed a desire for negotiations, the six nations have signed off on a proposal that Iran suspend enrichment before talks begin. The six countries -- Germany plus Security Council powers Britain, France, China, Russia and the United States -- have offered Iran a package of economic, political and strategic rewards to comply with the demand.

But French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy on Thursday appeared to suggest that demand was negotiable, saying: "The question is to know at what moment this suspension takes place compared to negotiations."

Mr. Burns dismissed suggestions of a split, saying all five permanent Security Council members insist negotiations should not start until Iran suspends enrichment.

"I have not heard from any government from this group that we should change the basic offer; that hasn't changed," he said, adding: "No one mentioned anything like this" during Thursday's meeting.

"The Iranians are in a very tough position," Mr. Burns said. "At first they thought, let's divide the United States from the EU-3 and that didn't succeed. The Iranians are obviously trying to divide Russia and China from the rest of us, and that hasn't succeeded."

Mr. Burns spoke on the eve of a crucial meeting between senior EU envoy Javier Solana and Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator. An Iranian official said the talks were set for Vienna, Austria.

The talks are considered a final attempt to find common ground to start negotiations between Iran and the six powers.

Khatami Blasts Wave Of 'Islamophobia' (AP-Y)

By William C. Mann

AP, September 9, 2006

Iran's former president decried a wave of "Islamophobia" that he said is being spread in the United States by fear and hatred of Islam in response to terror perpetrated by Muslims.

"In the crime of 9/11, two crimes were committed," Mohammad Khatami said. "One was killing innocent people. The second crime was masking this crime in the name of Islam."

Under smothering security, with dozens of uniformed police and plainclothes American security personnel provided by the State Department, Khatami spoke Friday night at an event sponsored by the Council on American-Islamic Relations called "The Dialogue of Civilizations: Five Years After 9/11."

Khatami is visiting the United States for two weeks, coming to this Washington suburb after two days in the nation's capital. Unlike at an appearance Thursday night in the Washington National Cathedral, no protesters were evident outside the hotel where he spoke. Multiple marked and unmarked security vehicles were outside, and a segment of Jefferson Davis Highway, a main Arlington artery, was shut down while he was there. At least one helicopter swooped repeatedly over the area.

DOJ_NMG_0061166

Khatami, the most senior Iranian to visit Washington in a quarter-century, spoke in front of American and Iranian flags, draped in each other's folds.

The talk broke no new ground for Khatami, considered a reformist during his two terms as president that ended last year. He was among the first foreign leaders to condemn the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. His visit to the United States drew criticism from some politicians and others because of the bitter contention now under way between Iran and the United States over actions of his successor, Mahmoud Ahmedinejad

He told his audience through an interpreter that in conditions that have followed the Sept. 11 attacks, American Muslims should show their countrymen by example that they, not terrorists, represent Islam.

"Demonstrate to others that whatever is said about Islam in the media is not correct" and combat the "wave of Islamophobia and hatred of Islam that we unfortunately are experiencing today," he said.

He laid out three goals for Muslims: "Your responsibility and our responsibility is to be first a good citizen in whatever country you live; to try for yourself and your children to move up the ladder of social achievement and education; and third is to fight the vague Islamophobia that has been created by those who don't have the best interests of Islam at heart."

He said "killers who go among others and kill others in acts of terror, if they identify themselves with Islam, they are lying. You Muslims who live in the United States should be representatives of enlightenment and don't allow those who create this Islamophobia" to speak for the religion.

A Cleric Steeped In Ways Of Power (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TEHRAN, Sept. 3 — As Iran defies the West over its nuclear program, the public face of the nation has become the outspoken president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. But it is the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who by most accounts has been the primary architect of Iran's combative foreign policy, and the force behind the president's own power.

Cloaked in religious robes, with a black turban signaling that he is a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad, Ayatollah Khamenei delivers the same blistering anti-American, anti-British, anti-Israeli message as the president.

His political evolution charts his own rise to power. As the Friday Prayer leader nearly two decades ago, he questioned the absolute power of Iran's supreme leader, saying Islamic law and the Constitution must come first. Today, he has emerged as an aggressive defender of his own right to have the final say in all matters of state and religion — a power he has not been afraid to exercise.

Indeed, political analysts, clerics and former government officials here said they believed that he had pushed for a more confrontational approach with the West because he grew disillusioned with the so-called confidence-building policy pursued by the reformist government of Mohammad Khatami.

They said he also sought to consolidate his power by building a political base among Iran's more fundamentalist circles, which are suspicious of the West. Along the way, he succeeded in sidelining most of those with independent authority, such as the former two-term president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, who pushed to select Ayatollah Khamenei as supreme leader.

"He wanted to preserve his power and he has been quite successful," said Mohsen Kadivar, a senior reformist cleric in Tehran. "His power is stronger today. Everyone who is in power is to obey him, completely. But his authority, which comes from people's support, has not increased."

Ayatollah Khamenei's political evolution from the traditionalist right to the more fundamentalist camp was described in interviews with present and former state officials, clerics who worked with him before and after the revolution, Western diplomats in Tehran and political analysts. Virtually all insisted on anonymity, fearing retribution if they spoke publicly. They all cautioned that they held only pieces of the puzzle.

The supreme leader is such a sensitive subject here that the government press office declined to submit a request to visit his office, or speak with his administrative staff.

DOJ_NMG_0061167

When Mr. Ahmadinejad was elected last year, many analysts and present and former officials said he was Ayatollah Khamenei's candidate. But when the president came out with his aggressive comments — about nuclear energy and Israel in particular — many wondered aloud if the leader's candidate was speaking without the consent of his prime patron. It is still impossible to know whether, for example, the president asked for permission before sending letters to world leaders, including President Bush.

But Ayatollah Khamenei (pronounced kha-meh-neh-ee) erased some of that confusion late last month, when he made statements siding with the president against the Guardian Council, which oversees all government decisions, and Parliament. In a news conference last month, Mr. Ahmadinejad acknowledged that Ayatollah Khamenei had advised his administration to try to broaden its circle of advisers and reach out to more "intellectuals."

When Ayatollah Khamenei was chosen 17 years ago to succeed Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the father of the Islamic Republic, he was finishing his second term as president, a relatively weak job then because there was also a prime minister.

The ayatollah, a midlevel cleric without a strong political base, was chosen in part because he was not seen as a threat to other powerful clerics or politicians, political analysts in Tehran said. In fact, for his first six years as leader, it was President Rafsanjani who ran the state, according to people who worked with both men.

Over time, Ayatollah Khamenei created a system that many political analysts and Western diplomats here say is less a theocracy and more an autocracy — with loyalty to the leader the prerequisite for influence.

Ayatollah Khamenei has strong ties to the Basij volunteer morality squads and the Revolutionary Guards, and has won the allegiance of some powerful seminaries in the religious center of Qum by giving them state funds. He also has strong allies in the Guardian Council and the Assembly of Experts, which technically exercises oversight of the leader.

While Iran's elected officials are subjected to public scrutiny and criticism, the supreme leader is not. He is more than a head of state; he is a symbol of two core elements of the Islamic Republic's official identity — revolution and religion. As a result, assessing the leader is a red line in Iran, one few people are willing to cross, at least publicly.

The Constitution gives the supreme leader near total control of the state, though officials like to emphasize that he is selected by the Assembly of Experts, which is elected by the public. The leader appoints all military and security commanders, he has the power to declare war and must confirm the election of the president. He appoints the head of the judiciary, more than half the members of the Guardian Council and the head of state television.

Still, Iran is not a country ruled by decree. There are multiple power centers and competing agendas, requiring that major decisions be made after consultation and compromise.

As Ayatollah Khamenei has consolidated power, he has defined Iran's agenda. He supports Iran's right to pursue nuclear energy, rails against the failure of "liberal democracy" and often talks about the "usurper Zionist regime" — just as President Ahmadinejad does.

Here is what the supreme leader said at a conference in Tehran in April:

"The bitter and venomous taste of Western liberal democracy, which the United States has hypocritically been trying to portray through its propaganda as a healing remedy, has hurt the body and soul of the Islamic Ummah and burned the hearts of Muslims."

Ayatollah Khamenei appears to have gravitated closer to the fundamentalists. But he has always held conservative values. In a 1996 interview with the hard-line journal Sobh, for example, he wrote that children should not be allowed to play music. "Teaching music is not in accordance with the Islamic establishment, and teaching music to schoolchildren brings corruption," he said.

In early power struggles over the scope of the supreme leader's authority, however, he spoke out in support of limits. In the early years of President Khatami's reformist rule, he tolerated some popular changes relaxing social restrictions and allowing more freedom of the press.

But he appears to have worked steadily to undermine Mr. Khatami, and those efforts accelerated after he sensed that the reform movement was challenging his authority. One former high-ranking reformer who remains friendly with Ayatollah Khamenei said that the biggest mistake the reformers made was to challenge the power of the supreme leader.

DOJ_NMG_0061168

The former official, who is still involved in politics and said he meets regularly with Ayatollah Khamenei, said many of the supreme leader's decisions were based on political calculations aimed at preserving his power. "He reacted to efforts by radicals among the reformers to weaken him," the former official said.

When Ayatollah Khomeini died in 1989, the country's leaders had talked about creating a council to replace him. The logic was twofold: there was a sense that no one could command the same authority and respect as Ayatollah Khomeini, and other officials did not want to cede power to a new leader, people familiar with the decision process said.

Mr. Rafsanjani, then the speaker of Parliament, was one of Iran's most powerful men. He pressed for a new supreme leader, saying it was essential to have one person in that post — and he pushed through the selection of Ayatollah Khamenei.

"Rafsanjani definitely played a role in making him leader," said Mahmoud Vaezi, a former deputy foreign minister who now sits on the Expediency Council, which arbitrates disputes between the elected and appointed arms of government.

But in time, the supreme leader figured out how to project his authority. He changed his dress, from elegant clerical robes to the more conservative, simple and traditional religious garb hidden beneath a flowing black cape. He also draped around his neck a kaffiyeh, the checkered scarf that is a symbol of resistance.

"Nobody should forget that as the leader, he is a revolutionary and a religious man," said Mehdi Karoubi, a cleric and former speaker of Parliament who was among the early followers of Ayatollah Khomeini. "In his public comments he has to reflect those realities."

The leader's consolidation of power appeared to reach its height on the day of the new president's inauguration ceremony last year, when Mr. Ahmadinejad made a very public gesture of obedience by gently leaning over to kiss his hand.

Still, Ayatollah Khamenei is known to consult widely before making a final decision. And he has made efforts to appear inclusive, reaching beyond his base. Recently, for example, he created a new strategic foreign policy committee and put a former official from Mr. Khatami's reform government in charge, although the official is related to the leader.

Many Iranians who know him describe the ayatollah as a man who loves the arts, writes poetry and is a voracious reader. And most confine themselves to safe generalities: "He is a very kind, sincere, joyful person," said Muhammad Ali Besherati, a former interior minister.

Ayatollah Khamenei was born in 1939 in Mashhad, a holy city in northeastern Iran. His father was a cleric, and according to his own biography, an ascetic who lived a life of few comforts. He was a follower of Ayatollah Khomeini and is said to have been a strong supporter of the students who stormed the United States Embassy in 1979 and held the staff hostage for 444 days. He was first elected president in 1981 and was re-elected to a second term in 1985.

In important early battles over the scope of the supreme leader's power, Ayatollah Khamenei apparently took a more moderate stance than his predecessor. In December 1987, he first spoke out in favor of limits on that power in a conflict between Parliament and the Guardian Council, which sought to nullify a labor law Ayatollah Khomeini had backed, saying it conflicted with Shariah, or Islamic law.

Mr. Khamenei, speaking at Friday Prayer, suggested that the Constitution had to be observed by everyone and that laws had to respect Shariah. Mr. Khomeini rebuffed him, stating that the supreme leader could overrule even Islamic law.

In 1989, Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa authorizing the murder of Salman Rushdie for his book "The Satanic Verses." At the time, Mr. Khamenei was the leader of the Friday Prayer sermon, a post that allowed him to address the nation.

"Islam is the religion of blessing and kindness," he was quoted as saying in the Feb. 15, 1989, edition of the newspaper Kayhan. "And anyone who repents of what he has done, no matter how serious the sin, he ought to be optimistic of being forgiven by God."

He was again rebuffed by Ayatollah Khomeini, who issued a scathing public rebuttal.

Israel Ends Its Blockade Of Lebanon's Coastline (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 8 — Israel lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon on Friday, releasing its last major chokehold on the country since war broke out in July.

DOJ_NMG_0061169

Fishing boats, their crews hoping to salvage what was left of the season before winter set in, chugged out to sea while water skiers and wind surfers skimmed the waves without worry for the first time in nearly two months.

More important for the Lebanese economy, ships loaded with cars, food and oil steamed toward Beirut. Trade routes to the country were cut in mid-July during the opening days of the war, and Israel had maintained the blockade even after a cease-fire was declared in mid-August. The embargo has cost the country hundreds of millions of dollars in lost trade.

Israel said it had turned over responsibility for patrolling the Lebanese coast to Italian warships, which would help the Lebanese Navy enforce a United Nations-mandated arms embargo against Hezbollah.

"The naval blockade has ended," said David Baker, an official in the office of the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert. "The international forces have taken their positions."

Many experts here believe that Hezbollah still has plenty of weapons, and they doubt that it would try to import more arms now in any case. Few Lebanese, meanwhile, believe the multinational naval presence can do much to stop any banned shipments that do come. Hezbollah's already strong political influence in Lebanon has grown in the wake of the war.

Under the United Nations-brokered agreement that ended the blockade, the interim naval force is to remain six nautical miles from the coast and carry out searches of vessels only at the request of the Lebanese Navy. The multinational naval force is not authorized to act on its own.

The blockade was to have been lifted Thursday, but the action was delayed by confusion over who was to lead the naval force until German ships arrive to take over the task. France, which has had two ships in place since the conflict began, was initially expected to take the lead, but that role was shifted to the Italians, who have four ships offshore.

The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon said it had already established a naval operations center to coordinate all operational details.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy, and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their businesses," read a statement issued by Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, chief of the United Nations force.

The number of troops committed to the force continued to rise, with Italy saying that it would soon deploy more troops to southern Lebanon. The first of 900 French troops are expected to begin arriving there Saturday, and 500 Lebanon-bound troops left Spain by ship on Friday.

Italy's foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, said in Tel Aviv that the number of peacekeepers in southern Lebanon could reach 5,000 by the end of next week.

"It will be possible to have an agreement on the withdrawal of Israeli troops in the next 10 days," he told reporters.

A spokesman for the United Nations force said that peacekeepers from Guyana, part of the earlier United Nations presence, had begun patrolling in the central and western sectors of southern Lebanon, while Indian peacekeepers were patrolling in the southeast.

He said the force had turned over three sectors north of Naqura to the Lebanese Army. Agence France-Presse reported that troops from Lebanon's Sixth Brigade, supported by tanks, entered 10 villages in the region on Friday.

Israel sent thousands of troops into southern Lebanon during the war, and they have been steadily withdrawing, though some remain in the border area.

...

But the Israeli news media reported Friday that military officials hope to complete the withdrawal before the Jewish New Year, which begins Sept. 22.

In another development, Mr. Olmert said that if Lebanon fulfilled its obligations under the United Nations resolution that ended the fighting, then Israel would be willing to discuss Shabaa Farms, a disputed piece of land near where the borders of Syria, Lebanon and Israel converge.

Israel captured Shabaa Farms from Syria as part of the Golan Heights in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. However, Lebanon now claims the 10-square-mile swath of land, which overlooks Israel's Hula Valley.

When Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000, the United Nations, which marked the border with Israel, did not put Shabaa Farms in Lebanon. The land has been a point of contention since then, and is often mentioned by Hezbollah as a continued Israeli occupation of Lebanese territory.

DOJ_NMG_0061170

Resistance to Israeli occupation is the principal reason Hezbollah gives for keeping its arms.

Mr. Olmert's remarks, made Thursday night at a meeting with the visiting Russian foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, suggested that Hezbollah would have to disarm before any negotiations took place.

Israel failed to make Hezbollah do that by force in the recent fighting, however, and there is currently no political power inside Lebanon strong enough to compel the group to give up its weapons.

Israel Lifts Lebanese Sea Blockade (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Move Ends Restrictions Imposed at Outbreak of War With Hezbollah

BEIRUT, Sept. 8 -- Israel lifted its eight-week-old maritime blockade of Lebanon on Friday, the United Nations announced, and within hours a gleaming white ship pulled into Beirut harbor carrying a load of appliances.

The reopening of sea lanes to Lebanon, which the United Nations said took place in the early afternoon, came one day after Israel lifted its blockade of air traffic, completing the end to suffocating restrictions imposed when war broke out between Israel and the Hezbollah militia on July 12.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy, and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their businesses," said Gen. Alain Pellegrini, the commander of U.N. forces in Lebanon.

The head of the Beirut International Chamber of Navigation, Elie Zakhour, told reporters that six cargo ships were bound for the Lebanese capital carrying cars and containers of other goods. The lineup reflected Beirut's role as a regional hub for imports and exports, a major component of the Lebanese economy that withered under restrictions even after fighting ended on Aug. 14.

Israel said it imposed the blockade to prevent arms shipments to Hezbollah, the militant Shiite Muslim movement that battled Israeli forces for 33 days in the rugged hills along the Lebanon-Israel border. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert relaxed the restrictions only on assurances from the United Nations that European ships and soldiers would join Lebanese forces in making sure Hezbollah could not receive supplies from abroad.

For now, Israeli patrol boats are turning over surveillance duties to Italian ships in the Mediterranean off Lebanon, Israeli and U.N. officials said. French and Greek navy ships have also promised to help patrol the area for an interim period. In the long term, the German navy has shouldered responsibility for working with the Lebanese military to guarantee that no arms reach Hezbollah.

Olmert announced Wednesday that he would lift the air and sea blockade Thursday evening. Unrestricted commercial airline flights to Beirut resumed as expected, but the sea blockade was maintained while Israeli officials sought additional assurances from the United Nations. More coordination took place Friday morning, and the commander of an Italian task force assumed responsibility for the patrols Friday afternoon, a U.N. spokesman said.

"It is our understanding that the international force is operational, and the Israelis turned it over to the Italians as of 1300 hours," or 1 p.m. local time, said Alexander Ivanko, a spokesman for Pellegrini.

Israeli officials said the airline flights were allowed to resume because German officials were on duty at Beirut's Rafiq al-Hariri International Airport monitoring airfreight traffic. But the Lebanese minister for public works and transportation, Mohammed Safadi, said that the Germans were providing only technical assistance and that customs matters were the responsibility of Lebanese authorities. Similarly, he said, the Italian ships would be assigned to help Lebanese authorities monitor sea shipments.

A senior Lebanese official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Hezbollah insisted that any European sea patrols or customs help be under the aegis of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, or UNIFIL. As a result, the Italian ships have been baptized "the maritime UNIFIL." In any case, he said, Hezbollah officials are not worried about resupplying since their weapons come mainly from Iran via Syria, and smuggling is an old tradition along the long, porous Lebanon-Syria border.

With that in mind, Israel had demanded that German soldiers join Lebanese army and Internal Security Forces personnel along the border. But Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, reflecting Hezbollah's concerns, refused, saying the Germans would provide only equipment and training to the Lebanese.

DOJ_NMG_0061171

Meanwhile, Israeli officials were quoted in news reports as saying that Israeli soldiers who were still inside Lebanon would probably withdraw within about two weeks. The Italian foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, said the number of foreign UNIFIL troops in the region would reach 5,000 by next week, which has been a benchmark for completing the Israeli withdrawal.

Spain's parliament approved the dispatch of 1,000 Spanish troops to further reinforce the U.N. peacekeeping contingent, according to news agency reports from Madrid. The force, which had stood at 2,000, has climbed above 3,000 with the arrival last week of about 900 Italian troops, out of a pledged 3,000, and several hundred French troops, out of a pledged 2,000. Under the U.N. Security Council resolution that ended the fighting, the force is scheduled to reach 15,000, along with a deployment of 15,000 Lebanese army troops.

Correspondent Scott Wilson in Jerusalem contributed to this report.

Israel Lifts Naval Blockade On Lebanon (FT)

By Andrew England And Harvey Morris

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Israel lifted its two-month blockade of Lebanese ports on Friday, ending its ban on ships and boats entering or leaving the country, as United Nations-backed naval forces began patrols of the Lebanese coast.

The blockade had originally been scheduled to end on Thursday but Israel demanded that the UN forces be in place to prevent weapons from being smuggled into Lebanon, before it withdrew.

Israel finally lifted its eight-week air blockade of Lebanon on Thursday, removing an important barrier to the country's postwar reconstruction.

But at the last minute Jerusalem announced it was delaying removing the sea embargo, saying it first wanted international naval vessels to begin monitoring Lebanon's coastline.

Mark Regev, Israeli foreign ministry spokesman, said: "Unfortunately, the international presence is not yet ready to enforce the sea embargo. When the internationals are ready to enforce the arms embargo on the sea, we will be ready to lift the blockade."

A Lebanese official said the government had been in contact with the United Nations and was told there were "logistical issues", but it expected the embargo to be lifted soon.

Lebanon said the blockade was costing the nation tens of millions of dollars a day and restricted the import of goods - many of which would come through the port - hampering efforts to reconstruct the country following Israel's bombardment, which destroyed thousands of buildings, as well as roads, bridges and factories.

Israel imposed the blockade after the conflict between Israel and Hizbollah erupted on July 12. The fighting ended with an August 14 UN-brokered ceasefire but Israel refused to lift the embargo until it was satisfied enough foreign forces were deployed to prevent Hizbollah rearming.

After a flurry of diplomatic activity and international pressure, it was agreed that French, Italian, Greek and British ships could patrol Lebanon's coast until a German task force arrives. Italian and French ships are already off Lebanon's coast but details of the naval force and its mandate still had to be worked out.

In Israel, the families of the two soldiers whose July 12 capture by Hizbollah triggered the fighting, complained that removing the blockade weakened Jerusalem's negotiating leverage to secure their freedom.

At Beirut's port and airport, staff were hoping for a resumption of normal business.

The loss of business has been huge. Normally, the airport would expect 15,000 to 16,000 arrivals daily in the peak summer months of July and August, and 120 flights. That was expected to increase by 20 per cent this year. But instead the airport found itself the target of Israeli bombs, damaging its three runways and taxiways, said Hamdi Chaouk, director general of civil aviation.

Mr Chaouk told the Financial Times that all but one hole had been repaired and he was confident that business would shortly reach normal levels, describing the airport as the "gate of Lebanon".

"It's a big issue, especially the airport, it's like telling people their country is closed and there are no communications with the rest of the world," he said. "It's like you have taken a sick person out of the emergency room."

DOJ_NMG_0061172

He added that airport security was at international standards, saying there would be no foreign monitoring at the airport. “The Germans, British and Americans; everybody came here and found there was nothing to be done,” he said.

Israel Lifts Sea Blockade Of Lebanon (AP)

By Hussein Dakroub

AP, September 9, 2006

Israel lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon on Friday, ending the country's two months of isolation as the task of preventing the entry of Hezbollah weapons falls to international warships patrolling offshore.

In a further boost to peace efforts, Israel also said it plans to pull the last of its troops out of Lebanon within two weeks.

The sea blockade's end, which came a day after Israel dropped its restrictions on air travel into Lebanon, lifts a barrier that has stifled Lebanon and cost the country tens of millions of dollars as it tries to rebuild from the devastating 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their business," Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon, said.

Even before the formal announcement, a Lebanese cargo ship docked at Beirut's port, carrying industrial raw materials, ceramic tiles and appliances — the first commercial ship to land since the war began July 12.

Lebanon's resumption of control over its sea and skies was the latest boost in implementing the U.N.-brokered cease-fire that began Aug. 14.

The focus now shifts to the complicated process of withdrawing Israeli troops from southern Lebanon and replacing them with 15,000 Lebanese soldiers and a similar number of U.N. peacekeepers who are to maintain a border buffer zone free of Hezbollah weapons.

Israel has been gradually pulling out its soldiers — whose number peaked at 30,000 at the war's end — as international replacements move into place.

The Israeli army would not say exactly how many of its soldiers remain, citing security reasons, but a spokeswoman said the military held only about 25 percent of the ground in southern Lebanon that it did previously.

When the fighting ended, Israeli soldiers were present in a strip along the length of the Lebanon-Israel border and in a corridor of territory leading nearly 18 miles north to the Litani River.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has been pressing Israel to pull out all its soldiers once 5,000 U.N. peacekeepers are on the ground by mid-September. About 3,250 U.N. soldiers are already in Lebanon.

On Thursday, Israeli security officials said the target was to have Israel's remaining troops out by the Jewish New Year, which begins the evening of Sept. 22.

Hezbollah fighters have been lying low, with armed guerrillas rarely seen in towns and villages of the south. In one rare sighting, some witnesses said they saw Hezbollah fighters on motorbikes inspecting a recently evacuated Israeli position.

The U.N. resolution that set up the cease-fire calls for the eventual disarmament of Hezbollah's Shiite guerrillas, but the peacekeeping force does not have a mandate to search out weapons and take them.

That job is up to the Lebanese army, Annan says, but Lebanon has not said whether it will do so. It appeared the peacekeepers will aim to ensure that guerrillas are not seen in public with weapons and that no new arms are moved in.

Pellegrini said the rules of engagement — under which U.N. troops are allowed to shoot — were being explained to contributing states and to forces on the ground.

"It will be a robust Chapter 6, with an effective use of force," he said, referring to the section of the U.N. Charter that allows troops to enforce peace rather than simply monitor it.

The new U.N. peacekeepers can shoot not only in self defense, but also to fulfill missions, such as arresting suspects who break the peace in south Lebanon and preventing attacks, Pellegrini said.

"But we will only operate in support of the Lebanese army," he told The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0061173

The withdrawal and deployment process is a delicate one. U.N. peacekeepers are effectively the go-betweens, checking with Israelis to ensure they have pulled out of each area before Lebanese soldiers move in, to ensure there is no friction between them.

"We'd much rather avoid them," a Lebanese officer said Friday as peacekeepers farther down the road announced they had received clearance for hundreds of Lebanese soldiers to proceed into a corner of southwest Lebanon.

Dozens of camouflaged Lebanese military trucks with a few vintage jeeps and armored vehicles lined a busy coast road in Mansouri, about 10 miles north of the border with Israel. The trucks were stacked with chairs, kitchen utensils and water supplies as the troops move into another area from which the Lebanese army has been absent for decades.

Hezbollah held control in the south for years, effectively running a state within a state, but the new deployment of Lebanese soldiers and U.N. troops reins in its domination.

With the lifting of the sea blockade, U.N. troops now face their first test in preventing weapons getting to Hezbollah, which is believed to get its arsenal from Iran and Syria. Lebanese troops are in place on the border with Syria to prevent smuggling.

A combined task force of French, Italian and Greek warships began patrolling Lebanon's Mediterranean coast just after noon Friday, a mission it will carry out for about two months until a longer-term force of German vessels moves in.

"The Italian-led task force will continue to enforce the international embargo against the supply of armaments to Hezbollah," Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said, announcing the end of the Israeli blockade.

French military officials said a dozen vessels could take part in the initial operation, patrolling six miles off the coast while Lebanese military vessels operate closer to shore.

International officials are also helping Lebanese authorities at ports, land border crossings and Beirut's airport, keeping an eye out to ensure no arms slip through.

Associated Press writers Alfred de Montesquiou in Mansouri, Lebanon, and Amy Teibel in Jerusalem contributed to this report.

Israel Lifts Sea Blockade Of Beirut (WT/AP)

By Hussein Dakroub

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

BEIRUT -- Israel lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon yesterday, ending the country's two months of isolation as the task of preventing the entry of Hezbollah weapons fell to international warships patrolling offshore.

In a further boost to peace efforts, Israel also said it plans to pull the last of its troops out of Lebanon within two weeks.

The sea blockade's end, which came a day after Israel dropped its restrictions on air travel into Lebanon, lifts a barrier that has stifled Lebanon and cost the country tens of millions of dollars as it tries to rebuild from the devastating 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their business," said Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

Even before the formal announcement, a Lebanese cargo ship moored at Beirut's port, carrying industrial raw materials, ceramic tiles and appliances -- the first commercial ship to land since the war began July 12.

Lebanon's resumption of control over its waters and skies was the latest boost in implementing the U.N.-brokered cease-fire that began Aug. 14.

The focus now shifts to the complicated process of withdrawing Israeli troops from southern Lebanon and replacing them with 15,000 Lebanese soldiers and a similar number of U.N. peacekeepers who are to maintain a border buffer zone free of Hezbollah weapons.

Israel has been gradually pulling out its soldiers -- whose number peaked at 30,000 at the war's end -- as international replacements move into place.

The Israeli army would not say exactly how many of its soldiers remain, citing security reasons, but a spokeswoman said the military held only about 25 percent of the ground in southern Lebanon that it did previously.

DOJ_NMG_0061174

When the fighting ended, Israeli soldiers were present in a strip along the length of the Lebanon-Israel border and in a corridor of territory leading nearly 18 miles north to the Litani River.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has been pressing Israel to pull out all its soldiers after 5,000 U.N. peacekeepers are on the ground by mid-September. About 3,250 U.N. soldiers are already in Lebanon.

On Thursday, Israeli security officials said the goal is to have Israel's remaining troops out by the Jewish New Year, which begins the evening of Sept. 22.

Hezbollah fighters have been lying low, with armed guerrillas rarely seen in towns and villages in the south. In one rare sighting, some witnesses said they saw Hezbollah fighters on motorbikes inspecting a recently evacuated Israeli position.

The U.N. resolution that set up the cease-fire calls for the eventual disarmament of Hezbollah's Shi'ite guerrillas, but the peacekeeping force does not have a mandate to seek out weapons and take them.

The new U.N. peacekeepers can shoot not only in self-defense, but also to fulfill missions, such as arresting suspects who break the peace in south Lebanon and in preventing attacks, Gen. Pellegrini said.

"But we will only operate in support of the Lebanese army," he said.

Dozens of camouflaged Lebanese military trucks with a few vintage jeeps and armored vehicles lined a busy coast road in Mansouri, about 10 miles north of the border with Israel. The trucks were stacked with chairs, kitchen utensils and water supplies as the troops move into another area from which the Lebanese army has been absent for decades.

Hezbollah held control in the south for years, effectively running a state within a state, but the new deployment of Lebanese soldiers and U.N. troops may check its domination.

With the lifting of the sea blockade, U.N. troops now face their first test in preventing weapons from getting to Hezbollah, which is believed to get its arsenal from Iran and Syria. Lebanese troops are in place on the border with Syria to prevent smuggling.

A combined task force of French, Italian and Greek warships began patrolling Lebanon's Mediterranean coast just after noontime yesterday, a mission it will carry out for about two months until a longer-term force of German vessels moves in.

Lebanon Emerges From War More Divided Than Ever (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

On the morning of July 12, hours after Hizbollah captured two Israeli soldiers, officials from the Shia militant group came to the Beirut office of Fouad Siniora, prime minister, to tell him not to worry – Israel's response would be mild.

Mr Siniora reminded them of the harsh retaliation to an earlier capture of an Israeli soldier in the Gaza Strip. The Hizbollah officials said Lebanon was not Gaza.

"You misread the situation," said Mr Siniora, according to an official familiar with the meeting. "They'll destroy us."

Israel began to pound Lebanon day and night. Mr Siniora's prediction had become Lebanon's frightening reality. A career banker accidentally thrust last year into the top job after the killing of the former prime minister Rafiq Hariri, the man he had long served as finance minister, the 63-year-old Mr Siniora was trapped.

He was under attack by Israel. The US had refused to call for an early ceasefire. Facing an imposed war, the government had no control over Hizbollah, and its ability to influence it was further constrained by tense relations with Syria and Iran, Hizbollah's two backers.

Tearful at times but resolute at others, Mr Siniora worked with Nabih Berri, the powerful Shia speaker of parliament and mediator with Hizbollah, to steer Lebanon through the 34-day crisis. He focused on averting sectarian conflict and keeping a fractious government (in which Hizbollah is a minority partner) together.

He balanced all concerned parties' demands but managed to win concessions, not least Hizbollah's consent to the deployment of the Lebanese army and an expanded UN peacekeeping force near the border with Israel, where the militant group had been the sole power.

The work was hard, but managing the postwar period could prove more daunting.

DOJ_NMG_0061175

After projecting a common front during the war, Lebanon has emerged politically divided, socially polarised and with an economy in tatters.

Economists put the total cost of direct and indirect damage to the economy at at least $9bn (£4.8bn, €7bn), or nearly half the country's GDP. The biggest blow, they say, is the loss of confidence in an economy with $39bn in debt and a reliance on investment and tourism flows from the Arab world. Some companies are already announcing lay-offs. Others say they may not be able to pay back their bank loans.

Hizbollah, difficult to rein in before the war, now appears more defiant. The group and its allies, including the Christian leader General Michel Aoun, started calling for a change of government as soon as the fighting stopped.

Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah chief, has said the postwar challenges require a government of national unity that brings in a key Christian element like the Aoun movement.

For Walid Jumblatt, leader of Lebanon's Druze minority and a Hizbollah opponent, however, these calls amount to a "political takeover" in the aftermath of what he considered to have been a "military coup" by Hizbollah on July 12. He fears the group will link the handover of two Israeli soldiers to the Lebanese government, as demanded by Israel, to its calls for a new government.

Meanwhile Hizbollah's rush to mollify a Shia community devastated by the conflict with the efficient handout of cash and reconstruction assistance has exposed the government's tardiness.

The pro-western Sunni and Christian parliamentary majority that backs Mr Siniora has appeared paralysed and his fractious cabinet unco-ordinated.

Though furious at Hizbollah for sparking the war, the Sunni bloc that leads the majority has avoided open criticism of the group to avoid provoking Shia-Sunni tensions.

Perhaps most disturbing for the government is that Hizbollah's claimed victory against Israeli troops has emboldened Syria. The alleged role of Damascus in the Hariri assassination is under investigation by a UN commission. Syria denies any involvement.

Since Mr Nasrallah declared that he would not have ordered the July 12 attack had he known what its devastating impact would be, some Shia voices have expressed rare dissatisfaction with the group. And the parliamentary majority says that with time and help from the world community Hizbollah's power could be curbed.

"Their rockets were not a deterrent for Israeli bombings and their weapons now cannot be used because their own community has seen the result," says Samir Franjie, an MP from the parliamentary majority.

But there are no restrictions on Hizbollah outside the 20km buffer zone created by the UN ceasefire. And, as Timor Goksel, a former Unifil official who now teaches at the American University of Beirut, says, "they [Hizbollah] are adaptable and there is a very lucrative arms market where you they can buy weapons and the delivery is guaranteed."

But Mr Siniora, whose popularity has been rising, is pressing ahead. He insists there will be no change of government. He is emphasising the need for a resolution of the Shebaa farms dispute, the small occupied border land that Hizbollah says should be liberated before the fate of its armed wing is decided. He has also tried to seize back the reconstruction initiative from Hizbollah, announcing compensation for destroyed homes and winning international commitments for $940m in early recovery aid.

Aides say Mr Siniora remains characteristically optimistic.

"The government is working on enlarging the room of manoeuvre it has on the basis of consensus with all Lebanese," says an official. "There are a lot of obstacles and doubts that it will work. But what is the alternative?"

Explosions Hit Indian Mosque, Stoking Fear Of Further Violence (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta And Hari Kumar

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

NEW DELHI, Sept. 8 — A series of explosions struck in and near the largest mosque in a flashpoint textile town in western India on Friday, killing more than two dozen people, wounding more than 100 and raising the specter of renewed sectarian clashes.

DOJ_NMG_0061176

The police said there were three explosions, two inside the mosque compound and one nearby, in Malegaon, a city of about 500,000 with a history of Hindu-Muslim violence, about 160 miles north of Mumbai, the financial capital.

The mosque is also home to one of the largest Muslim cemeteries in the area, local residents said, and the blasts struck shortly after unusually crowded Friday Prayers, as worshipers prepared graves for honoring the dead on the Shab-e-Barat holiday.

Speaking to reporters here in the capital, Home Minister Shivraj Patil called the explosions a "terrorist" attack designed to provoke a clash between "different sections of society."

The country has suffered a spate of terrorist attacks in recent years, including the July 7 commuter train bombings in Mumbai, which the authorities have blamed on Islamist militants setting up so-called sleeper cells across the country.

The bombings on Friday were unusual in that they seemed to target a heavily Muslim area. No one claimed responsibility and the authorities declined to speculate on who could be responsible.

The attacks came three days after what now sounds like a prophetic warning from the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, about the many-headed specter of violence threatening his country. The threats range from Maoist guerrillas in the rural heartland to ethnic separatists in the northeast to Muslim militants challenging Indian rule in contested Kashmir and groups affiliated with global terrorist outfits.

"We confront a wide array of complex internal security problems and threats," Mr. Singh told a meeting of chief ministers on Tuesday here in the capital. He called for improving the intelligence apparatus and training police to better counter terrorist groups. He also pressed for the need to "assuage feelings of insecurity among our minorities, especially Muslims."

In the last year alone, India has witnessed a series of attacks on civilian targets, including at busy markets in Delhi, a Hindu temple in eastern Varanasi, and against tourists in Kashmir. The only other attack on an explicitly Muslim site was a January explosion inside a mosque in Delhi.

The Indian home secretary, V. K. Duggal, said in a televised press conference that one of the blasts resulted from explosives tied to a bicycle. Television footage showed a grisly parade of men carrying the wounded in their arms, or on hand carts used to ply goods to market.

Anil Kumbhare, a police superintendent in Malegaon, said Friday that 29 people had died.

...

Additional police officers were sent to Malegaon to guard against a potential outbreak of Hindu-Muslim violence. Immediately after the blasts, television footage showed angry crowds chasing police officers and politicians.

Bombings Kill 31, Injure 125 In Mainly Muslim City In India (WP)

By Muneeza Naqvi

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

NEW DELHI, Sept. 8 -- At least two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded Friday in the town of Malegaon in the western Indian state of Maharashtra, killing 31 people and injuring 125 more, most of them Muslim worshipers leaving a mosque after Friday afternoon prayers.

The first bomb went off in a graveyard, and the second on a crowded street a short distance away, officials in the local police control room said.

Thousands of people were out on the streets Friday to mark Shab-e-Barat, also called the night of atonement or forgiveness, a Muslim religious event in which people offer prayers for the souls of dead relatives in graveyards.

"It is a terrorist act. It is done by people who don't want peace," said Vilasrao Deshmukh, the state's chief minister, according to the Associated Press. There was no immediate assertion of responsibility, but some officials called the attacks an attempt to resume India's long history of communal violence between Hindus and Muslims.

In July, a series of bombs detonated on commuter trains in Mumbai, also known as Bombay, killing 182 people and wounding more than 800, most of them Hindus. Police later arrested several Muslim men in connection with those attacks.

Malegaon, a predominantly Muslim city whose economy is dominated by textile production, is located about 160 miles northeast of Mumbai. It has been the scene of communal fighting in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0061177

Television footage on Friday showed chaos as hundreds of people, mostly men in white skullcaps, rushed around in panic after the explosions. There were scenes of people carrying the bodies of the dead and injured. Doctors worked on bloodied survivors brought in on stretchers. People seeking loved ones viewed bodies laid out on the ground , covered by white shrouds.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh condemned the blasts, appealing in a statement for "peace and communal harmony." He was consulting with officials from the central government and the local state.

National security forces, including personnel from the anti-riot Rapid Action Force, were being sent to Malegaon, according to the Press Trust of India.

Police said groups gathered around the town and shouted slogans against the local authorities. A curfew was imposed in an attempt to prevent further violence.

India Bombings Kill 31, Injure 100 (AP-Y)

By Aftab Khan

AP, September 9, 2006

Two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded in throngs of Muslims as they left Friday prayers at a mosque in this western Indian city, killing 31 people and wounding 100.

A top official called the blasts "a terrorist act," and authorities — fearing revenge attacks across the country's fragile religious divides — clamped a curfew on Malegaon and put security forces on alert.

The curfew was lifted Saturday morning, but thousands of police and paramilitary soldiers watched over hundreds of Muslims worshippers as they offered prayers in Malegaon. Inside the city's hospitals, relatives of victims wept as they watched bodies being readied for funerals.

Malegaon, a center of India's textile industry about 180 miles northeast of Mumbai, has long been the scene of violence between Hindus and Muslims. The city of about 500,000 people is 75 percent Muslim.

No one has claimed responsibility for the attacks, which happened near one of the city's main mosques on a Muslim festival day. Officials aggressively deployed teams of police to sensitive parts of the state.

"Law and order is under control," P.S. Pasricha, Maharashtra state's director-general of police, told The Associated Press. "There's a high alert across the state."

The bombings were intended to set off wider violence, officials said.

"It is a terrorist act. It is done by people who don't want peace," Maharashtra Chief Minister Vilasrao Deshmukh told a news conference in Mumbai, the state capital. Of the 100 people wounded, he said, 56 were seriously hurt.

Pasricha told reporters "the motive appears to be to create panic and make Hindus and Muslims fight with each other."

Both bombs were rigged to bicycles, said Deshmukh. "We found packets with the explosives attached to these bicycles," he said.

The explosions came as Muslims celebrated the festival of Shabe Barat, or the Night of Fortune, when they hold night-long prayers seeking divine blessings, exchange sweets with neighbors and relatives, and set off fireworks.

At least some of those killed were beggars who came to the mosque because worshippers are known for their generosity on festival days, said Raees Rizvi, a Malegaon social worker.

"People were stunned. There was blood all over," said a shaken Nadeem Shaikh, who was outside the mosque, "Children tried to run out and many were trampled. Many beggars waiting outside for alms were also killed."

An 8-year old child, his head bandaged, lay moaning on a hospital bed. "He had gone with other boys to pray. We came running to the hospital as soon as we heard about the blast," said Fahim Khan, the boy's elder brother.

The office of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh said he "appealed for peace and communal harmony and has urged all citizens across the country to remain calm."

India has suffered through a series of terror bombings over the past year, most recently attacks on commuter trains in Mumbai in July that left more than 200 people dead. Those bombings were blamed on Pakistan-based Muslim militants.

Earlier this week, Singh warned that India may be facing even bloodier attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0061178

"Reports also suggest that terrorist modules and 'sleeper cells' exist in some of our urban areas, all of which highlight the seriousness of the threat," Singh told India's state chief ministers during a conference on internal security.

"The situation is tense," said Nashik Superintendent of Police Rajvardhan, who uses only one name. Nashik is about 60 miles from Malegaon.

Malegaon has been the scene of religious violence in the past, with riots between Hindus and Muslims occurring most recently in 2001, when 15 people were killed.

The U.S. Ambassador to India, David C. Mulford, deplored Friday's bombings.

"There can be no justification for such heinous acts," he said in a statement. "The United States stands with India in its fight against terrorism."

India's bloodiest religious violence in recent years came in 2002, in the western state of Gujarat, and was set off by a train fire that killed 60 Hindus returning from a religious pilgrimage.

Muslims were blamed for the fire, and more than 1,000 people, most of them Muslim, were killed by Hindu mobs. India is about 74 percent Hindu and 12 percent Muslim.

Human rights groups have accused the state government, led by the Hindu-nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party — the party which then also controlled the national government — of doing little to stop the violence.

The Bharatiya Janata Party lost power in the national Parliament in 2004.

Saudi Religious Police Outlaw Cat, Dog Sales (WT/AP)

By Donna Abu-nasr

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia -- Saudi Arabia's religious police, normally tasked with chiding women to cover themselves and ensuring men attend mosque prayers, are turning to a new target: cats and dogs.

The police have issued a decree banning the sale of the pets, seen as a sign of Western influence.

The prohibition on dogs may be less of a surprise because conservative Muslims despise dogs as unclean. But the cat ban befuddled many, since Islamic tradition holds that the Prophet Muhammad loved cats.

The religious police, known as the Muttawa, enforce Saudi Arabia's strict Islamic code. Its members prowl streets and malls, ensuring unmarried men and women do not mix, confronting women they feel are not properly covered or urging men to go to prayers.

But the government also gives the Muttawa wide leeway to enforce any rules they deem necessary to uphold the social order.

The decree -- which applies to the Red Sea port city of Jidda and the holy city of Mecca -- bans the sale of cats and dogs because "some youths have been buying them and parading them in public," according to a memo from the Municipal Affairs Ministry to Jidda's city government.

The memo urges city authorities to help enforce the ban.

Pet owning is not common in the Arab world, though dogs are kept for hunting and guarding. In large cities around the Middle East, stray dogs often wander the streets.

However, in the past few decades, owning dogs or cats has become a fashion statement among Saudis. Showing off a Doberman, pit bull or fancy breed of feline has became a status symbol.

Conservatives decry the trend as a Western influence, just like the fast food, shorts, jeans and pop music that have become more common in the kingdom, which is ruled by the puritanical Wahhabi interpretation of Islam.

"One bad habit spreading among our youths is the acquisition of dogs and showing them off in the streets and malls," wrote Aleetha al-Jihani in a letter to Al-Madina newspaper. "This is blind emulation of the infidels."

The decree has not been enforced yet, according to several pet shop owners and veterinary clinics in Jidda. It applies only to selling dogs and cats, and there was no sign the Muttawa would confiscate pets.

The ban distressed cat and dog lovers.

DOJ_NMG_0061179

"I was shocked when I heard about it," said Fahd al-Mutairi, who owns 35 cats. "What was even more shocking was to hear that the ban came from an authority that has nothing to do with such an issue.

"I would understand if it came from the Health Ministry or anybody charged with ensuring pets coming from outside do not carry diseases," added the 23-year-old flower shop owner.

No other Arab country restricts pet ownership. But in Iran, ruled by Shi'ite clerics, religious police sometimes harass people seen outside with their dogs. Last year, Iranian police told people not to bring their dogs out in public, but the order was never backed up by law and dog owners widely ignored it.

The inclusion of cats in the Saudi ban puzzled many because there's no scorn for them, as there is for dogs in Islamic tradition.

One of the prophet's closest companions was given the name Abu Huraira, Arabic for "the father of the kitten," because he always carried a kitten and took care of it.

A number of hadiths -- traditional stories of the prophet -- show Muhammad encouraging people to treat cats well.

Once, he let a cat drink from the water he was going to use for his ablutions before prayers. Another time, Muhammad said a woman who kept a cat locked up without feeding it would go to hell.

Dogs -- considered dirty and dangerous -- are less lucky. According to one hadith, Muhammad said a Muslim loses credit for one good deed each day he keeps a dog and even said dogs should be killed unless used for hunting or protection.

Still, in another instance, he said that a prostitute who carried water in her slipper to a thirsty dog would go to heaven, her sins forgiven because of her kindness.

"All these things considered, it is obviously not against our religion or our tradition to have dogs and cats as pets," columnist Abeer Mishkhas wrote in the Arab News.

"I sincerely hope [authorities] will leave the cats and dogs alone and concentrate on what should be their real business," she added.

China Names New Envoy To N. Korea (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

BEIJING, Sept. 8 -- China has appointed an outspoken career diplomat with extensive knowledge of the United States as its new ambassador to North Korea, the official New China News Agency said.

Analysts said the appointment of Liu Xiaoming, 50, suggests officials in Beijing are reassessing their relationship with Pyongyang and trying to find a new way to press discussions among China, North Korea and the United States.

"He is young and capable, a new-generation diplomat who is outspoken and sees things with a sharp eye," said Yang Chengxu, a Chinese expert on arms control and a senior research fellow with the China Institute of International Studies. "One of his biggest advantages is his knowledge of the United States."

The appointment of Liu, a former ambassador to Egypt, was announced late Thursday. He will succeed Wu Donghe, who has served as ambassador since 2001.

The choice is unlikely to affect the current deadlock in six-party talks over North Korea's nuclear program, but it shows that China is thinking about its relations with North Korea in a more comprehensive manner, said Shi Yinhong, professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing.

"This comes as China increases the frequency of communication with the U.S. The Diplomatic Affairs Ministry is very cautious in choosing the ambassador, and Liu's experience will be helpful in enhancing the triangle communications among China, North Korea and the U.S.," Shi said.

Liu has held posts at the Chinese Embassy in Washington and at the Foreign Ministry in Beijing.

Yonhap, the South Korean news agency, reported last weekend that China is preparing to invite North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to Beijing to warn against further provocation, but a spokesman for China's Foreign Ministry said this week that he was unaware of any arrangements for such a visit.

Russia Opens Weapons Destruction Plant (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0061180

By Judith Ingram

AP, September 9, 2006

Engineers covered in head-to-toe protective gear inserted a neutralizing solution Friday into bombs filled with a nerve agent, officially starting the work of Russia's first plant for destroying the deadly chemicals.

The opening of the Maradykovsky plant accelerates Russia's campaign to eliminate the world's largest arsenal of the toxins.

The plant, 450 miles northeast of Moscow, holds 6,900 tons of nerve agents stored in aerial bombs and missile warheads — more than 17 percent of Russia's stockpile.

Dignitaries, townspeople and journalists gathered Friday for the opening ceremony on a makeshift stage outside the plant, which is ringed by three barbed-wire fences. Several miles away, a sign proclaimed the road to the plant a closed zone.

"Today's event demonstrates Russia's efforts to strictly fulfill its international commitments and shows that Russia has the political will to see through to the end the process of chemical disarmament," said Viktor Kholstov, deputy head of the Federal Industry Agency, which is in charge of the effort.

The destruction facility, on the site of one of Russia's seven former chemical weapons production plants, will become a focal point of the push to meet an April 2007 target for Russia to destroy 20 percent of its stockpile.

To date, Russia has eliminated just 3 percent, as opposed to 39 percent destroyed by the United States, which is home to the second-largest stockpile.

Besides the Maradykovsky plant, Russia has two other chemical weapon destruction facilities, both built with generous foreign funding. The Maradykovsky plant is the only one for destroying nerve agents as opposed to blister agents.

Construction of another plant that was to have been the biggest — Shchuchye, with chemical weapons stored in millions of artillery shells — has bogged down in disputes between Russia and the United States, the main funder.

The delays at that plant have pushed Maradykovsky onto the front line. It is the sole site to be funded 100 percent by Russia.

"The Russians a couple of years ago made a critical decision that if they were to have any chance of meeting Chemical Weapons Convention deadlines, they had to go to the easier, bulk agent sites," said Paul Walker, a weapons expert at Global Green USA, the Washington-based affiliate of former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's Green Cross International environmental organization.

"I think also from a reason of national pride, they really wanted to do one site themselves and have it be successful."

Friday's ceremony had a strong dose of patriotism, opening and closing with an army band playing the national anthem. President Vladimir Putin's envoy to the Volga River region, Alexander Konovalev, said the plant "is a demonstration of the growing economic might of the Russian government."

Disarmament officials gave credit to Switzerland, which recently announced it is spending some $2 million on an electricity grid for the plant.

The bombs at Maradykovsky hold VX, soman and sarin, as well as a less deadly mixture of lewisite and mustard gas. Technicians will open each bomb, drain out some agent if necessary, insert a neutralizing reagent, close up the bomb and let it sit for 80-110 days to let the chemical processes take place, said Gennady Bezrukov, chief engineer of the Federal Chemical Weapons Storage and Destruction Administration.

When it is running at full strength, the plant will be able to neutralize 96 weapons a day, Bezrukov said.

Green Cross representative Tamara Ashikmina said she was satisfied that authorities were providing sufficient safety for the population and the environment. But the local population still has concerns, she said.

"Of course the population is anxious, because guests come and go but they have to live here," said Ashikmina, head of the chemistry department at Vyatka State University in nearby Kirov.

The closest town to the plant — Mirny, where 3,500 people live — and the surrounding region of 50,000 have been promised a new apartment building, a central heating system and electricity and sewage systems as part of a legal requirement that 10 percent of the cost of the weapons destruction process go to investments in the local community.

New apartment houses have been built for plant medics and other workers in nearby Orichi, and the town has a new school — allowing the existing one to stop teaching children in two shifts a day.

DOJ_NMG_0061181

The state has also funded an ecological monitoring laboratory that carries out daily checks of air, water, flora and fauna in an area of more than 310 square miles surrounding the site.

Russia signed the Chemical Weapons Convention in 1997, the year it was created, pledging to eliminate its arsenal within 10 years. However, it won international agreement to prolong the deadline until 2012 because of a lack of funds.

Walker said that neither Russia nor the U.S. was anywhere near on track to meet that extended deadline. The U.S. is expected to complete destruction of its chemical weapons by 2020, he said.

With Little Authority, African Union Force Struggles With Its Mission In Darfur (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TAWILA, Sudan, Sept. 8 — At the airstrip next to the headquarters of the African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur in El Fasher, the first job of the day for the workers who keep the mission's helicopters running is to check how much jet fuel is missing.

Some days it is just dozens of gallons. Sometimes it is hundreds.

At sundown, African Union soldiers must turn over control of the airstrip to the Sudanese government, whose troops guard the airfield all night. In the morning, the fuel is gone, according to senior African Union officials and airfield workers.

The missing fuel and the struggle over who controls the main military airstrip in Darfur lays bare just how little autonomy the African Union force actually has as it struggles to keep a fragile peace in this war-wracked region, where the government and its allied militias are fighting rebels seeking greater autonomy.

The African Union force, with its poor equipment and tiny contingent of 7,000 troops, had hoped to turn over command to a larger, better-equipped United Nations-led force at the end of the month. The Security Council has approved the step.

But the government has refused, as it continues to press an offensive against some rebel factions. It has instead proposed keeping the African Union force in place, and from interviews with dozens of officers and soldiers at camps in Darfur, it is easy to see why.

African Union officers repeatedly spoke of the frustrations of what has become an impossible mission — to oversee a peace deal most of the militants in this brutal conflict have signed and to monitor a cease-fire that hardly anyone respects. Most spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly about African Union activities.

"We are frustrated and feeling so useless," said one major from southern Africa based in Kebkabiya, a government-controlled town that is home to thousands of people displaced by the conflict. "We are not able to move freely and do our work. Sometimes I wonder if there is any reason for us to be here at all."

But as weak as the African Union force is, nearly all agree it is better than none at all. Frantic diplomatic negotiations are now taking place to make sure some kind of peacekeeping force remains in Darfur, where hundreds of thousands of people have died and 2.5 million have been pushed from their homes in the fighting.

The African Union force is almost out of money, and its sponsors, mainly the United States and Europe, have said that they will pay no more. The force says it will leave after its mandate expires Sept. 30.

Sudan has offered to pay the force's budget with money raised by the Arab League and Sudan itself. But that would give the government even more leverage over the force, and senior African Union officials have dismissed the idea as unacceptable.

More than being underfunded, however, the peacekeepers here lack the ability to stand up to the Sudanese government, according to senior officers, analysts and diplomats.

"The African Union has never been a big nuisance and nor was it a big threat," said J. Stephen Morrison, director of the Africa program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"The Sudanese always had an A.U. that was split in its opinion and never had the rules of engagement or the capacity to push them around," he added. "So it was vulnerable to being manipulated and weakened along the way."

Those are problems that any new United Nations force would undoubtedly want to fix. But Sudan has argued that a United Nations force will undermine the country's sovereignty by transferring too much authority to outsiders. A lack of authority is precisely what many African Union officers here lamented.

DOJ_NMG_0061182

"A peacekeeping force must assert its authority, so when I arrived and saw that a party to the conflict had control of the airstrip I knew this mission was in trouble," said one senior African Union military official who has served in peacekeeping missions in Europe, Africa and Asia.

"If the only airstrip you have is freely not accessible, then you know who has the authority, and it is not you," he said.

Gen. Collins Ihekire, the Nigerian who commands the African Union forces in Darfur, acknowledged in an interview that the force has not had always has the freedom and support it needs to carry out even its limited mission.

"We have not always had the ability to move as freely as we would like," he said, "but we are not here to force a confrontation with anyone. We are here as monitors of a cease-fire, not to make war."

In the past week, as the showdown over an international force has mounted, African soldiers have curtailed their already limited patrols, often at the insistence of Sudanese officers stationed in their bases as monitors of a tattered cease-fire agreement.

A short patrol Tuesday to visit outlying villages and areas frequented by nomads on their annual migration route near Kebkabiya was a case in point. According to its mandate, the African Union is supposed to be able to move freely throughout Darfur without any impediments, such as the travel permits required for aid workers and journalists wanting to visit the region.

But in practice, the movements of the African Union have been hampered by government officials. A Sudanese Army captain assigned to the Kebkabiya base tried to prevent a patrol from visiting villages in the area, relenting only when the Cameroonian major who was leading the patrol firmly insisted that it go ahead.

On the patrol, the Sudanese captain repeatedly told villagers not to speak to visiting journalists and not to allow the journalists to take photographs.

Such interference is a violation of the African force's independence, but the policy of the force has been to avoid confrontation rather than testing the limits of its mandate.

The African Union was always meant to be a short-term solution to stanch bloodshed and allow aid workers to operate in Darfur while negotiations for a political solution took place, Mr. Morrison said.

"There were no other options, and they stepped into the breach and they did it with limited capacity," Mr. Morrison said. "They acquitted themselves pretty well, and they showed courage and didn't shy away from ugliness and risk. But it wasn't sustainable."

The peace agreement signed between one of the rebel factions and the Arab-dominated government in May was supposed to be that political solution, but some of the non-Arab rebel factions have rejected it, as have millions of Darfur residents.

But the government, insisting it has reached a political settlement with those willing to make peace, has started a military offensive against the rebel alliance that refused to sign, bombing villages they control.

This is a violation of the new peace agreement, according to African Union officials, but its troops watch helplessly as the Antonov bombers and attack helicopters take off from the El Fasher airstrip.

Still, whatever its shortcomings, shoring up the African Union without a commitment on the United Nations force may be the only option left, short of abandoning Darfur without any peacekeepers at all, said Eltayeb Hag Ateya, director of the Peace Research Institute at the University of Khartoum.

"Clearly the short-term solution is to support the African Union force," Mr. Ateya said. "We need to think practically and put politics aside to find peace."

In Darfur, Terror From The Air (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 8 -- Yagoub Mustafa, 45, could not easily mimic the "whoop whoop whoop, boom! boom! boom!" of two helicopter gunships that fired rockets into the huts in his Darfur village. He tried to make the noises, but they were not loud enough, or terrifying enough.

DOJ_NMG_0061183

But the horror he experienced that July afternoon, while he crouched low under a tree with his sobbing sons, daughters and nephews pressed against him, was more easily expressed: Mustafa thought they all were going to die, he said. And as he offered soothing words to the children, he begged for rescue in a silent prayer.

Please God help us. We need your mercy.

Three years into a war in the Darfur region of western Sudan, thousands of villagers have been victimized by government troops and proxy militiamen who killed, raped and looted. Now the government is intensifying an air war featuring Soviet-era Antonov planes jury-rigged into bombers and Mi-24 helicopter gunships turned against mud-and-thatch huts. New waves of shellshocked villagers have left their homes and trekked for days to bulging relief camps.

For Mustafa, whose eyes are set deeply into a face the color of aged teak, the air attack did what years of sporadic raids by government-backed Janjaweed militiamen had failed to do. They made him leave his home in Bellala Gorf, about 45 miles northwest of El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur state.

"They came very low," Mustafa said, his voice low and rumbly from decades of breathing hot desert dust. "I was afraid. I just hid."

The war started when rebels in this impoverished and neglected region attacked government installations in Darfur in 2003. The government responded by sending in regular army troops, employing air power and arming a militia, called the Janjaweed, whose fighters traveled by horse and camel and attacked rebels and civilians.

A peace deal was reached in May in Nigeria, but two of the three main rebel groups refused to sign. The government is sending thousands of troops and police officers to Darfur in what U.N. officials have called a violation of the peace plan.

In the past two months, the government also has resumed air attacks against civilians in areas where the rebels remain popular.

"Hundreds are still dying amid ongoing violence, and thousands are being forcibly displaced," said a statement issued Friday in Geneva by Antonio Guterres, the U.N. high commissioner for refugees. "If things do not improve, we are heading for a major catastrophe."

There is little evidence that things are about to improve in Darfur.

A 7,000-member African Union mission here, a limited but crucial buffer against the government forces, is due to depart by the end of the month, though discussions continue about a possible extension. The U.N. Security Council approved a plan last week to send in a U.N. force three times the size of the African Union mission, but Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, has rejected it.

Aid groups, African Union officials, analysts and rebels say that as the conflict is intensifying, the number of displaced people is growing. Many here say the worst of the conflict is still to come, as the government seeks to drive the rebels into submission by terrorizing their civilian supporters. War and disease in Darfur have killed as many as 450,000 people and driven more than 2 million from their homes.

The recent expansion of air attacks has familiarized Darfur civilians with the sights and sounds of military aircraft.

There is the white Antonov bomber that lumbers past, high in the sky, audible but not deafening. A long, high whistle is followed by tremendous boom. The hole left in the reddish Darfur sand is round and about three feet across. Generally, several bombs are dropped in a pass, and then the Antonov comes by again and, sometimes, again.

The aiming is crude, and rarely do the bombs land anywhere near the middle of a village. Also, they rarely seem to kill. What the bombs do, say those who have been near where they hit, is terrify with the force of their blasts and their seeming randomness.

Abubakar Ibrahim Hassan, a long-faced man in a white robe and knit cap who appeared to be in his sixties, said the Antonovs flew over Bellala Gorf several times that day in July. Residents fled their huts for trees at the edge of the village.

"We knew the fire would come and kill everybody," he said.

But far more frightening are the Mi-24s. The helicopters can be outfitted with machine guns, bombs and rockets designed to blast through heavy armor. Villagers in Bellala Gorf described the Mi-24s firing munitions that left a distinctive trench-like pattern, about 10 feet long and three feet across, the signature of rockets fired from close to the ground.

DOJ_NMG_0061184

Residents also described two Mi-24s painted in green camouflage. Several villagers said the helicopters hovered so low that it seemed they could have reached up and touched the aircraft.

Instead, they fled, tried to hide in the sand or cringed in their huts.

Ali Hadi Osman, 41, lay as still as he could, spread-eagle in the dust, he said, hoping the helicopter pilots would not see him. He stayed like that until long after they had flown away.

"If there's any movement," Osman reasoned, "they will come back."

Residents said they knew of no deaths from the air raid on Ballala Gorf, though 17 huts were destroyed in a burst of sand and black smoke. The attack was one in a series of incidents around the town of Korma over several days in early July. Amnesty International counted 72 deaths. Mass graves also have been reported in the villages around Korma.

Korma and surrounding villages now are reportedly nearly empty of their populations.

After Mustafa's terrifying encounter with the helicopter gunships, which came within 100 feet of his family's hideout beneath the trees, he decided to leave with his wife and six children.

"We are looking for peace," Mustafa said. "We want our children to go to school, to get a health clinic, good water and a good place to live."

It will happen, Mustafa said, only if the United Nations comes. The African Union force, even if it stays, is not able to protect civilians, he said.

Mustafa and his family left in the night, with their battered pots and pans and bags of flour loaded on the family's three donkeys. Together, the 11 of them -- eight people and three pack animals -- walked four days to a camp near El Fasher. They have lived there ever since and are unsure when, if ever, they will return home.

American Journalist Held In Sudan To Be Freed (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 8 -- Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Paul Salopek said from a Sudanese prison Friday night that the government would soon release him and two Chadian colleagues after a 34-day confinement on charges of espionage and producing "false news."

President Omar Hassan al-Bashir agreed to release Salopek after meeting with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) in Khartoum, Sudan's capital. The three men are expected to be freed Saturday, Richardson's office said in a statement.

Salopek, a foreign correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, was arrested Aug. 6 while working on a story for National Geographic magazine about the Sahel region that runs along the southern edge of the Sahara.

Richardson traveled to Sudan with Salopek's wife, Linda Lynch, and Chicago Tribune Editor Ann Marie Lipinski. National Geographic Editor in Chief Chris Johns met the group in Khartoum. Salopek and his wife have a home in New Mexico.

Salopek, 44, will return to the United States with Richardson, though the details of their trip have not yet been finalized. Also being freed are Salopek's Chadian interpreter, Suleiman Abakar Moussa, and his driver, Idriss Abdulraham Anu.

"All three of us, Mr. Idriss, Mr. Suleiman, are all gratified," Salopek said by phone from prison here in El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur state.

Salopek, a veteran foreign correspondent with extensive experience in Africa, and his two colleagues crossed into the Darfur region of western Sudan without visas. Many journalists have made similar journeys over the past several years, taking advantage of Sudan's porous border with Chad to cover a conflict in a country that often restricts journalists.

Salopek was captured by a rebel group that had begun working with the government. He was later transferred to government custody and charged with the visa violation and the potentially more serious allegations of spying and writing "false news." He was scheduled to go on trial Sunday and faced two years in prison if convicted.

Salopek said he hoped his experience would not prevent other journalists from coming to Sudan to cover Darfur, where a three-year-old war is accelerating and a humanitarian crisis has grown more dire.

"We just hope and plan the story will continue to be covered," he said. "I probably will stay on the other side of the border, in Chad."

DOJ_NMG_0061185

Richardson's office said in the statement that the governor was invited to Sudan to discuss the case in large part because of his long relationship with Bashir and Sudan's ambassador to the United States, Khidir Haroun Ahmed. Richardson is a former member of Congress and ambassador to the United Nations.

"The successful end to this unfortunate episode is a victory for journalism and a free press," Richardson said in the statement. "Most important, these three men will return home safely to be with their families, friends and colleagues who were relentless in their appeals to have them freed."

Sudan Agrees To Free U.S. Reporter Accused Of Spying (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 8 — The Sudanese government agreed to release a well-known American journalist, Paul Salopek, and two Chadians who were arrested and charged with espionage and with illegally crossing the border from Chad last month.

The journalist and his colleagues, an interpreter and a driver, were to be released Saturday on "humanitarian grounds," after Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico met with Sudan's president, Omar al-Bashir.

Mr. Richardson flew to Sudan on Friday at the invitation of the Sudanese government. Mr. Salopek and his wife, Linda Lynch, have a home in New Mexico.

Mr. Salopek, a foreign correspondent for The Chicago Tribune who has won two Pulitzer Prizes, was detained by a militant group allied to the Sudanese government in the western province of Darfur on Aug. 6. His driver, Idriss Abdulraham Anu, and his interpreter, Suleiman Abakar Moussa, both Chadians, were also detained.

The group turned them over to the government, which charged the men with spying. The arrests came amid tensions over a proposed United Nations peacekeeping force in Darfur that the Sudanese government has refused to accept, despite a Security Council resolution calling for its deployment.

The government has cracked down on protests, and a chill was sent through Sudan's news media with the beheading of a Sudanese newspaper editor after he published articles about the Prophet Muhammad that some Islamists considered blasphemous.

Mr. Salopek, on a scheduled leave of absence from The Tribune, was on assignment for National Geographic magazine, reporting an article about the life, culture and politics of the Sahel, the vast semidesert belt that spans Africa just below the Sahara.

He had not planned to visit Darfur, where a grim conflict between non-Arab rebels and the Arab-dominated government has left hundreds of thousands of people dead and pushed 2.5 million from their homes. But after reporting along the Chad-Sudan border, he decided to visit a village where some refugees from Darfur were returning and rebuilding their lives.

Mr. Salopek is known for his intense approach to reporting, often asking to work alongside the people he is writing about — fishermen, farmers, laborers, hunters. He once worked at a gas station outside Chicago to report on an article about America's addiction to oil.

Even while in captivity with the government rebel group last month, he managed to spend a day with village women planting crops, noting how their straight lines of seeds would swerve when one of the women told a joke about sex.

Speaking by telephone soon after learning that he would be freed, Mr. Salopek said he was relieved that he and his colleagues would be able to leave their cell soon.

He said that he plans to continue reporting for the article that he had begun when he was detained, picking up where he left off on a journey of months across Africa.

"I have every intention of resuming this assignment," he said. "I will be back in Africa."

Blair And Brown Reach Deal Over May 4 (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061186

Tony Blair and Gordon Brown have reached an understanding that the prime minister will resign on May 4, paving the way for a new Labour leader to take office in mid-June.

After Mr Blair was on Thursday forced into a historic and humiliating public pledge to quit within 12 months, Downing Street refused to give any precise date on when the prime minister will depart Number 10.

However, allies of the chancellor said there was now a broad understanding between the two men that Mr Blair will announce next February that he intends to quit as party leader on May 4, 2007 - one day after the Scottish and Welsh regional elections.

On Friday, Charles Clarke, former home secretary, weighed into the leadership row saying Mr Brown's behaviour had been "absolutely stupid ". In a piece in the Evening Standard he said the chancellor should have distanced himself from the rebels who demanded the prime minister's resignation.

His departure will pave the way for a six week Labour leadership election, which will see Mr Blair's successor - almost certain to be Mr Brown - installed by mid-June.

Little more than a week after insisting he would give no timetable for his exit from Number 10, Mr Blair used a visit to a north London school to confirm that this month's Labour conference would be his last as prime minister.

Thursday's U-turn has undermined Mr Blair's authority and may trigger a renewed bout of speculation over whether he possesses the political momentum to last until next summer.

His commitment to go by then was aimed at heading off demands from Labour MPs that he should quit immediately. It also amounted to a major victory for Mr Brown. After years of acrimony between the two over when the prime minister will stand down, Mr Brown has finally secured a public pledge on when Mr Blair will quit.

However, relations between the two remained uneasy on Thursday night. Mr Blair's allies said Mr Brown had been badly damaged by this week's events, amid claims - denied by the chancellor's camp - that he orchestrated an attempted coup against Mr Blair.

"Gordon has got quite a bit of work to do to settle people's minds at the end of this week," said a senior Downing Street figure. "He has appeared too aggressive and looks too much like a control freak who does not want a debate on Labour's future."

Mr Blair will spell out his ambitions for his remaining months in office in a speech to Labour activists on Saturday. But pressures for him to depart quickly could intensify, especially if Labour looks like it is heading for serious defeat in the Welsh and Scottish assembly elections on May 3.

Doug Henderson, an MP close to Mr Brown, was among several who still insisted Mr Blair should quit immediately. However, Mr Brown's allies said Mr Henderson's comments did not have their approval.

Criticism Follows Blair's Likely Successor Even As He Begins Discussing Policy Plans (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 8 — One day after Prime Minister Tony Blair said he would resign within a year, his rival and would-be successor, Gordon Brown, began on Friday to lay out a broad policy agenda, pledging that Britain would remain "shoulder to shoulder" with the United States against terrorism.

But a rancorous new debate erupted in the Labor Party, threatening to upend the uneasy truce that followed a week of feuding between the men over the timing of Mr. Blair's departure.

In the new uproar, a former senior minister, Charles Clarke, called Mr. Brown's recent behavior stupid.

In an interview in Friday's Evening Standard, Mr. Clarke, the former home secretary dismissed by Mr. Blair this year, said many Laborites had been angered by a photograph of Mr. Brown grinning as he was driven from a meeting with Mr. Blair.

"A lot of people are very upset and cross about that," Mr. Clarke said. "It was absolutely stupid — a stupid, stupid thing to do."

He also said Mr. Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer, should have distanced himself from Labor rebels demanding Mr. Blair's ouster. "He could have done that with a click of his fingers," Mr. Clarke said.

By way of a response, Harriet Harman, the constitutional affairs minister, said, "I really think that everybody should shut up now" before the party could be torn apart.

DOJ_NMG_0061187

The signs of restlessness suggested that some legislators were not satisfied with Mr. Blair's refusal to be pinned down on a firm departure date. Some people in Mr. Brown's camp now expect that to be early next May.

But whenever it is, some legislators said the duel had damaged Mr. Brown's prospects as an unchallenged successor.

Tony Wright, an independent-minded Labor legislator who has criticized the party's rebellion, said in an interview: "In the spring, Mr. Blair will say he is going. In the early summer he will go, and we will have a new leader. But it is less clear than it was two weeks ago that the next leader will be Gordon Brown. There is the suspicion that he cemented discontent within the party."

Mr. Brown's strong support of the United States in the campaign against terrorism seemed to offer some continuity with Mr. Blair, but it was also fraught with potential hazards because many Labor legislators are disenchanted by the prime minister's alliance with the White House and its Middle East policies.

Mr. Wright called Mr. Brown a "firm Atlanticist," but said the issue was tricky, because Mr. Blair's decision to align himself so closely with the United States forms the core of his problems with many Labor legislators.

"I don't think there is any great problem or alternative to most of his domestic agenda," Mr. Wright said. "But there is a deep antipathy to the Bush administration."

Mr. Brown has not been granting interviews, but in an article in The Sun, a top-selling tabloid, he recalled the events of Sept. 11, 2001, and said, "In a few days I will visit New York and reaffirm to the American people that Britain — under the courageous leadership of Tony Blair — stands now, as then, shoulder to shoulder with them."

While there have been questions about Mr. Brown's attitudes toward Britain's military deployment, Mr. Brown wrote, "Britain can take pride that our heroic armed forces are leading in the global fight we must wage against terrorism."

He took a strong line against both terrorism at home and military commitments overseas, and said he guaranteed that "we will continue to spend whatever it takes to meet the new security demands we face and our military commitments abroad."

Mr. Brown also told The Sun that he would support police demands for a period of detention of terrorism suspects without charge longer than the current 28 days. The police have been seeking a 90-day period.

Like Mr. Blair, however, he urged a broader campaign to counter the radical Islam that has spread among some British Muslims.

"As well as supporting our police, security services and armed forces in the front line of the war on terror at home and abroad, we also need to mobilize the power of argument and ideas to expose and defeat the ideology of hate," he said.

In a separate speech in Edinburgh on Friday he tried to pre-empt criticism that, as a Scot, he might represent narrow, regional interests. "I stand here today again to speak up for Britain and Britishness," he said.

Legislators in Scotland and Wales, along with local councilors in England, face elections next May that are seen as a bellwether of Labor fortunes. The vote is a crucial factor in the calculations of when Mr. Blair might step down, in the view of his critics, to enhance the party's electoral prospects.

Infighting Still Dividing Blair's Party (AP)

By Beth Gardiner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

Bitter infighting flared in Tony Blair's Labour Party on Friday as a former Cabinet official criticized the prime minister's likely successor.

Blair tried to placate his party's restive lawmakers by promising Thursday to resign within a year, but the harsh comments by Charles Clarke, formerly Britain's top law and order official, demonstrated the fragility of the truce.

Blair and Treasury chief Gordon Brown, widely expected to be the next prime minister, appeared to have reached a private understanding on the handover of power. But a sharp attack on Brown by Clarke — a Blair ally until the prime minister fired him in May — made clear the peaceful interval that party bigwigs had hoped for was unlikely to materialize.

Clarke harshly chastised Brown for the way he handled this week's party turmoil and said his succession as prime minister was not guaranteed. He said the grin on Brown's face as he emerged from Blair's 10 Downing St. office after handover talks with the prime minister had been provocative and poorly judged.

"A lot of people are very upset and cross about that. It was absolutely stupid, a stupid, stupid thing to do," Clarke said.

DOJ_NMG_0061188

Clarke said Brown also should have acted more decisively against eight junior government officials whose protest resignations on Wednesday forced Blair's announcement.

"What he should have done was come out strongly and distance himself from them," he said. "He could have done that with a click of his fingers."

In comments to be published in Saturday's editions of the Telegraph newspaper, Clarke said Brown is a "a very self-confident, intelligent, cultured politician," but difficult to work with.

"It's a controlling thing — he thinks he has to control everything," Clarke was quoted as saying. "He is totally, totally uncollegiate. Can he change? That's the question. Can he delegate?"

Brown's allies have insisted he was not behind the anti-Blair plotting.

Senior party figures have publicly backed Brown as the next Labour leader — and therefore prime minister — to try to prevent the eventual handover of power from highlighting intraparty divisions and throwing national elections expected in 2009 to a resurgent Conservative Party.

It was not clear what motivated Clarke's attack. Although he was long seen as a Blair ally, that relationship has grown chilly since his firing so his comments may not have been sanctioned by the prime minister's camp.

Blair's spokesman declined to comment on Clarke's remarks.

Blair "thinks the country wants the government to get on with the business of governing and that's what he'll be doing," the spokesman said, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with government policy.

Whatever Clarke's intent, his remarks made clear the amount of bitterness that has built up in the party during months of argument over the length of Blair's tenure.

Ruth Kelly, the communities secretary and a close Blair ally, said Clarke's statement was wrong and warned that continued sniping would be deeply damaging.

"I am sure there are others who share his view but what I would say is that I don't think that represents the center of gravity in the Labour Party, nor does it represent the majority view in the Cabinet," she told British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

She said the party needed a period of calm. "We have a duty ... to really refrain now for a period from this sort of intense political infighting," she said.

Blair had long resisted setting out a timetable for his departure as prime minister, fearing it would instantly drain his authority.

But he reluctantly announced Thursday that he would be gone by this time next year, when it became clear that was the only chance of ending days of damaging public turmoil. He refused to set a precise date for his resignation.

"I would have preferred to do this in my own way," Blair said Thursday, conceding that the Labour Party's annual conference this month would be his last.

Labour heavyweights had hoped that would be enough to calm the party after eight lawmakers quit their junior government posts Wednesday rather than remove their names from a letter demanding Blair's departure.

Anger over Blair's handling of last month's Middle East fighting and anxiety over the party's slide in the polls had fueled impatience in the party for him to leave quickly, or at least to say when he planned to go.

The low-level revolt raised fears that Labour's eventual change of command would be rancorous and messy — reminiscent of Margaret Thatcher's abrupt, involuntary departure from office in 1990 at the hand of rebels in her Conservative Party — rather than the "stable, orderly transition" that Blair has long promised.

The key question is whether the prime minister's new exit strategy will satisfy the party.

Early signals were that it would buy Blair time — but not much. He is eager to reach the 10-year anniversary of his 1997 assumption of office, which would be in May.

Speculation focused on May as the moment for his departure but his spokesman has said widespread guesses about a specific date were "just plain wrong."

Blairites Rejoice In Attack On Brown (FT)

By Ben Hall And James Blitz

DOJ_NMG_0061189

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Downing Street officials on Friday expressed private delight over a broadside fired at Gordon Brown by Charles Clarke, the former Home Secretary, saying the attack had rightly exposed features of the chancellor's character.

Tony Blair's official spokesman was careful not to comment on the outburst in which Mr Clarke accused the chancellor of "absolutely stupid" behaviour during the crisis that engulfed the government this week.

But in a sign that Mr Clarke's attack has emboldened the Blair camp, other figures close to the prime minister expressed pleasure that questions were being raised about Mr Brown's behaviour. The private view reflects tensions between the camps in spite of the understanding on Mr Blair's departure date.

According to one Downing Street figure, relations between the two men remain sore after a serious stand-off at a meeting in Number 10 on Wednesday. Mr Blair, in the presence of officials from both camps, accused the chancellor of plotting a coup against him.

"Tony lost his rag, demanding to know what Gordon was up to, whether he was trying to topple him," said a Blair ally who was at the meeting. "Gordon sat there in silence, like a sullen teenager. That is what we have been putting up with for so long."

There were other signs on Friday that Number 10 was feeling emboldened by the attack on the chancellor. A senior figure said Mr Blair is to encourage a "fundamental and open debate" about public spending priorities over the next year in a bid to prevent Mr Brown dictating policy.

Britain's Political Enigma (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Gordon Brown has taken a critical step to becoming Britain's prime minister. For years, Mr Brown – the dour 55-year-old Scot who is finance minister – has never disguised his burning desire to succeed Tony Blair as leader of the ruling Labour party. This week, Mr Brown, chancellor of the exchequer, finally got something he long sought: a public assurance from Mr Blair that he will quit Downing Street by next May.

Mr Blair's assurance came in one of the most tumultuous weeks in recent British politics. It is a week that has badly – probably fatally – damaged Mr Blair. The prime minister had wanted to keep his departure plans vague. But after a revolt by Labour MPs, he was finally forced to surrender a rough timetable for his departure.

Perhaps more remarkably, the week's events have also damaged Mr Brown. For years, he has been a consummate political operator, the dead certain successor to Mr Blair. He almost certainly still is. But on Friday Charles Clarke, a former interior minister, voiced the suspicion of many Labour MPs that Mr Blair has been the victim of a grubby coup orchestrated by his finance minister. Mr Clarke attacked Mr Brown's behaviour this week as "absolutely stupid" – adding that he must now "prove his fitness" to succeed Mr Blair.

People outside the UK will probably be more struck by Mr Blair's political demise than Mr Brown's ascent. Even after a decade in office, Mr Blair remains one of the most arresting figures on the international stage. In the US, he enjoys mythical status as the sole sure ally of President George W. Bush in the war on terror. In Europe, Mr Blair is regarded as the one person who has firmly shifted a party of the left to the centre ground. By contrast, Mr Brown – outside international financial circles – enjoys none of this allure.

Yet this is to underestimate Gordon Brown. He deserves no less credit than Mr Blair for founding "New Labour" and making it a powerful electoral machine. Even more significant, Mr Brown is the architect of the government's economic success – implementing reforms that have brought a decade of uninterrupted growth, low unemployment and interest rates. This, above all, is why his bid to succeed Mr Blair is unstoppable.

Even so, within Labour there is a nagging doubt, an ambivalence, about what kind of leader Mr Brown would be. Mr Clarke on Friday became the first senior politician to voice publicly what the ambivalence is about: Mr Brown's dark side, his sullen temperament. "Part of the problem," said Mr Clarke, "is that he lacks confidence. He is nervous. That could all change when the burden of waiting for the job is lifted and I think it probably will. But the problem is, nobody really knows."

DOJ_NMG_0061190

As politicians – indeed as human beings – it is hard to imagine two people more unlike each other than Mr Blair and Mr Brown. The current prime minister is intuitive, a charmer, one who connects with fellow politicians and the electorate. Mr Brown is broody, deliberative, an academic manqué whose powerful charm in private is not felt by the wider public.

Their working styles are different, too. Mr Blair acts on instinct, he has intimations about events. He knew within minutes of the September 11 attacks that the world had been gripped by a powerful new form of terrorism. Mr Brown, by contrast, rarely takes a big decision without painstaking study and reflection. Sometimes, this can be an advantage. But some wonder how well he would make the shift to prime minister, where the incumbent must respond daily to random events.

Above all – and this is central to the impending handover – Mr Brown appears to many Britons to be more left-leaning than Mr Blair. The prime minister has long been seen as a Conservative in disguise ("Tory Blair"). At home, he has overhauled Britain's health and education system, introducing choice for consumers. Mr Brown, by contrast, is seen as a more traditional Labour man, close to trade union leaders and wedded to big government and state intervention.

For Britain's Conservatives, now resurgent under David Cameron, this is the core attack on Mr Brown. Mr Cameron argues that once Mr Blair has gone, he – the Conservative leader – will become Mr Blair's rightful heir. Mr Brown, meanwhile, will marginalise Labour and take it back to the left. This argument is too crude, however. At home, Mr Brown resents the suggestion that he is not a reformer or moderniser. He has faced down union demands for big public sector wage rises. He is deeply committed to the promotion of business and enterprise. What is still uncertain is whether he will have anything like Mr Blair's zeal to entrench choice and diversity in state hospitals and schools.

"He has to do this and I think he will," says a dispassionate observer. "The moment he veers away from the reforms Blair has sought to implement, Cameron will press home the argument that the Tories are Blair's heirs."

On international policy, too, Mr Brown might not signal as much of a change as some believe. Mr Blair has developed a powerful political relationship with the White House, believing the UK can have no influence unless it hugs America close. Mr Brown will not get so close to Mr Bush in the final stages of his presidency. Yet Mr Brown is intellectually far more fascinated than Mr Blair has ever been by American politics, enterprise and culture – ensuring these have a deep influence on his policy.

On Europe, the two men's instincts are clearly different. Mr Brown's dominant concern has been with Europe's structural economic problems and rigid labour markets. This makes him far more sceptical than Mr Blair about attempts to deepen political integration. But Mr Brown is aware, too, that Britain's Conservatives undermine their own credibility by indulging in visceral Europhobia. So he will want to underscore Conservative extremism by forging close links with European leaders.

Can Mr Brown possibly be stopped from winning power? Mr Clarke's attack has thrown a sharp spotlight on whether Mr Brown will be challenged in next year's leadership election. A handful of leading Labour figures close to Mr Blair loathe Mr Brown and share concerns about his character and politics. They may yet organise a challenge.

Yet Mr Brown should manage to head this off. He has bided his time as the leader-in-waiting for so long that he is unlikely to make a mistake now. The broad mass of the Labour party – the trade unions, the young generation of cabinet ministers – is firmly behind him. Yet he still has some work to do – to prove he really does have some of Tony Blair's versatility and humanity.

The Ditch Blair Project (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

PREMATURE POLITICAL OBITUARIES are nothing new, but it isn't every day that a politician writes his own. This week, British Prime Minister Tony Blair did just that — although he left out the precise time of "death," hinting that he would step down within one year in favor of Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon

Brown. Now journalists are chiming in with their own advance eulogies, many of which identify Blair's fatal affliction as his support for President Bush's foreign policy.

It's not that simple. Yes, Blair has been savaged for supporting not only the war in Iraq but also a pro-Israel position in the recent war in Lebanon. Critics deride him as "Bush's poodle," but that's a doubly unfair epitaph for Blair's tenure at 10 Downing Street.

First, his hawkish position on Iraq involves more than parroting Bush. It reflects his own conviction that democracies like Britain and the United States should intervene abroad when necessary to plant democracy (one goal of the invasion of Iraq) or to rescue the victims of ethnic cleansing (as in the Balkans). Quite unlike Bush, Blair considers these missions to go hand in hand with leadership on global warming, debt reduction in the Third World and aggressively reducing poverty worldwide. Blair has been the most articulate spokesman for what appears to be a political breed in retreat — the liberal internationalist.

DOJ_NMG_0061191

A political obituary for Blair that fixates myopically on Iraq or on U.S.-British relations gives short shrift to Blair's accomplishments at home, notably his shepherding of the Labor Party back to power after 18 years in the wilderness. Blair led the party to victory three times — the last time despite the baggage of the Iraq war — because he recognized the need to liberate what he called New Labor from the ideological straitjacket of the "loony left." Blair became an evangelist for a Third Way between the doctrinaire socialism of "old Labor" and the too-rugged individualism championed by Margaret Thatcher. The Third Way preached that a party of the left could be pro-business and open to innovation without forsaking the poor and the marginalized.

A similar gospel was preached successfully by a U.S. president whose tenure overlapped with Blair's — not Bush but the Great Triangulator, Bill Clinton. That so many in Britain and the United States have forgotten the Blair-Clinton partnership is a reminder that Blair has been prime minister for a long time and probably should move on. Just don't call him "poodle."

U.S. Paid 10 Journalists For Anti-Castro Reports (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

MIAMI, Sept. 8 — The Bush administration's Office of Cuba Broadcasting paid 10 journalists here to provide commentary on Radio and TV Martí, which transmit to Cuba government broadcasts critical of Fidel Castro, a spokesman for the office said Friday.

The group included three journalists at El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language sister newspaper of The Miami Herald, which fired them Thursday after learning of the relationship. Pablo Alfonso, who reports on Cuba for El Nuevo Herald, received the largest payment, almost $175,000 since 2001.

Other journalists have been found to accept money from the Bush administration, including Armstrong Williams, a commentator and talk-show host who received $240,000 to promote its education initiatives. But while the Castro regime has long alleged that some Cuban-American reporters in Miami were paid by the government, the revelation on Friday, reported in The Miami Herald, was the first evidence of that.

In addition to Mr. Alfonso, the journalists who received payment include Wilfredo Cancio Isla, who writes for El Nuevo Herald and received about $15,000 since 2001; Olga Connor, a freelance reporter for the newspaper who received about $71,000; and Juan Manuel Cao, a reporter for Channel 41 who got $11,000 this year from TV Martí, according to The Miami Herald, which learned of the payments through a Freedom of Information Request.

When Mr. Cao followed Mr. Castro to Argentina this summer and asked him why Cuba was not letting one of its political dissidents leave, Mr. Castro called him a "mercenary" and asked who was paying him.

Mr. Cao refused to comment Friday except to say on Channel 41 that he believed the Cuban government knew in advance about the article in The Miami Herald. Most of the other journalists could not be reached. Ninoska Perez-Castellón, a commentator on the popular Radio Mambí station here, said she had received a total of $1,550 from the government to do 10 episodes of a documentary-style show on TV Martí called "Atrévete a Soñar," or "Dare to Dream," and saw nothing wrong with it. Her employer has always known about the arrangement, she added.

"Being Cuban," Ms. Perez-Castellón said, "there's nothing wrong with working on programs that are on a mission to inform the people of Cuba. It's no secret we do that. My face has always been on the shows."

But Al Tompkins, who teaches ethics at the Poynter Institute for Media Studies in St. Petersburg, called it a conflict of interest for journalists to accept payment from any government agency.

"It's all about credibility and independence," Mr. Tompkins said. "If you consider yourself a journalist, then it seems to me it's an obvious conflict of interest to take government dollars."

Lincoln Diaz-Balart, a Republican congressman and one of Miami's most stridently anti-Castro voices, said he believed editors at El Nuevo Herald and The Miami Herald had known that the three writers for El Nuevo had worked for the Office of Cuba

DOJ_NMG_0061192

Broadcasting. He pointed to articles from both papers in 2002 that describe Mr. Alfonso as a moderator for a program on Radio Martí and Ms. Connor as a paid commentator for the station.

But Robert Beatty, vice president for public affairs at the Miami Herald Media Company, said the editor of El Nuevo, Humberto Castello, learned only on Thursday. The Herald, long owned by Knight Ridder, was acquired in March by the McClatchy Company.

Mr. Beatty said that Jesús Diaz, publisher of The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald, had decided to fire Mr. Alfonso and Mr. Cancio and to sever ties with Ms. Connor, a freelance journalist who wrote about Cuban culture.

"Journalism's ethical guidelines are neither subjective nor selectively enforced," Mr. Beatty said. "Where conduct of this sort is brought to our attention, we act decisively."

Mr. Cancio said Friday evening that his supervisors had known and approved of his appearances on Radio and TV Mambí, during which he said he always expressed his own opinions and not the government's.

"It is for these reasons that I deny any conflict of interest in my professional behavior," he said, "and I believe my termination to be an unfair and disproportionate decision made in bad faith."

Pedro Roig, director of the Office of Cuba Broadcasting, could not be reached for comment. But he told The Miami Herald that hiring Cuban-American journalists was part of a broader mission to improve the stations' quality.

Joe O'Connell, a spokesman for the government's International Broadcasting Bureau, which oversees the Office of Cuba Broadcasting as well as Voice of America and Radio Free Europe, said the bureau did background checks on journalists who contributed to its programming but had no ethics code for them.

After Mr. Williams admitted in 2005 to accepting money from the Federal Education Department through a public relations company, federal auditors said the Bush administration had violated the law by disseminating "covert propaganda."

A few months later, The Los Angeles Times reported that the Pentagon had paid millions of dollars to another public relations firm to plant propaganda in the Iraqi news media and pay friendly Iraqi journalists monthly stipends.

Government spending on Radio and TV Martí — $37 million this year — has long been the subject of criticism because the broadcasts appear to reach only a minute number of Cubans. The Cuban government jams the signals. This year, the Bush administration spent $10 million on a new plane designed to transmit TV Martí more effectively.

Latin America (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

When delegates from 116 countries gather for next week's Nonaligned Movement summit in Havana, the question uppermost in their minds will be whether their ailing host, Fidel Castro, is making his final bow on the world's stage.

For the past month, Mr. Castro, 80 years old, has been on the mend from surgery following intestinal bleeding, having temporarily handed power to his younger brother Raul, Cuba's 75-year-old defense minister. But there are precious few details about the health of Cuba's president-for-life, a matter that is considered a state secret.

Some U.S. officials surmise that Mr. Castro is suffering from a fatal stomach cancer, although they won't say so publicly. Earlier this week, Havana, which denies Mr. Castro has cancer, released a letter written by Mr. Castro that said he had lost 41 pounds in 37 days but was now recuperating at a "satisfactory rhythm." Mr. Castro has said he will receive dignitaries at the conference although there is no word on whether he will actually attend. Cubans on both sides of the Florida Straits will be watching his appearance closely for clues of his prognosis.

If the event does amount to Mr. Castro's unofficial farewell from the global stage, Venezuela's fiery president, Hugo Chávez, stands ready to claim the title of heir apparent to his revolutionary mantle. He will be a visible presence at the conference.

Analysts expect the fiercely anti-American Mr. Chávez to use the gathering to lobby votes to win a seat for Venezuela in the 15-member United Nation's Security Council in elections scheduled for October. A victory for Mr. Chávez, who backs Iran's bid to develop a nuclear program, would be a headache for the U.S. Iran's leader, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, also plans to attend the conference.

DOJ_NMG_0061193

To win a Security Council seat, Mr. Chávez has been traveling the globe and generously spreading oil money to win allies. In turn, the U.S. has been exerting pressure behind the scenes to win support for its candidate, Guatemala.

Next week marks the second time that Mr. Castro has played host to the Nonaligned Movement. It was founded at the height of the Cold War in 1961 by Yugoslavia and other nations that wanted to create a counterweight of countries not aligned with either the U.S or the Soviet Union. The organization, most of whose members are developing nations in Asia, Latin America and Africa, has had a difficult time maintaining relevancy since the Cold War ended, but that hasn't stopped delegates from going to a conference every three years in some part of the globe.

Mexico's Election Doubts May Linger (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Top electoral officials and judges are feeding doubts about the outcome of Mexico's presidential vote by declining to release details about a recount of 4 million ballots and by moving quickly to destroy all 41 million ballots, legal experts said Friday.

The seven judges of the Federal Electoral Tribunal declared conservative candidate Felipe Calderon president-elect on Tuesday. But the tribunal's 300-page ruling on the vote left some experts shaking their heads.

John M. Ackerman, a law professor at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, said the judges had made no effort to investigate possible financing improprieties and other charges made by leftist candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. The ruling also failed to cite any legal precedents in its refusal to have the election annulled, Ackerman said.

The court opened ballot boxes and recounted 4 million votes, but only to determine whether there was evidence of outright fraud — and declared that they had found none. The recount tallies were not released.

"The tribunal is explicitly preventing us from seeing what actually happened in the partial recount," Ackerman said. "The result of all this is that we don't have certainty."

A Federal Electoral Tribunal spokesman said the judges would not comment on the ruling. He said no further information would be released on the recount.

On Thursday, the Federal Electoral Institute, or IFE, which organizes elections, denied a request by Ackerman and others to have access to the ballots.

By law, ballots here are destroyed after an election is certified, but the law does not stipulate when.

Irma Sandoval, director of the National Autonomous University's Laboratory for the Study and Analysis of Corruption and Transparency in Mexico, said the ballot request was made through the fledgling public records act, which grants access to documents not covered by privacy and national security restrictions.

"The IFE denied our request because, they said, the ballots are not documents," Sandoval said. "The ballots are printed by the government. But the IFE said that at the moment a citizen marks the ballot, it's no longer a document. It's a very metaphysical argument."

Writers Elena Poniatowska and Carlos Monsivais, who supported Lopez Obrador's presidential bid, joined the petition seeking access to the ballots.

Sandoval said she and others were considering an appeal to the Supreme Court to keep the IFE from destroying the ballots.

The IFE's rejection of the request led Sandoval to compare this election to 1988, when the outgoing government burned ballots rather than allow a recount that might have proved leftist candidate Cuauhtemoc Cardenas' allegations of fraud in his loss to ruling party nominee Carlos Salinas de Gortari.

"All of the reforms we've had since 1988 have been designed to bring the left back into the electoral process, and now the left is on the street," Sandoval said. "If the IFE proceeds with the rushed and premature destruction of the ballots, then the comparisons to 1988 will be more than apt."

Lorenzo Cordova, a law professor at the National Autonomous University, said that although the election was flawed, it was mostly a success. On election day, he said, all of the political parties praised the way the IFE conducted the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0061194

"The errors of the IFE were in communication," Cordova said, after the narrow margin between Calderon and Lopez Obrador became clear. "They didn't know how to face a politically delicate situation in the way they released information in the days after the election. They created a lot of doubts."

Cordova said he opposed granting public access to the ballots because there was no guarantee a "citizen recount" would follow established standards. But he said the election had shown the need for new reforms, including improved regulation of the media and private financing of campaigns.

Mexico Arrests Major Cocaine Suspect (AP)

By Julie Watson

AP, September 9, 2006

Mexican authorities have arrested a reputed major figure in one of Colombia's largest and most feared drug cartels responsible for nearly half of the cocaine smuggled into the United States, U.S. officials said Friday.

Jaime Maya Duran was arrested Wednesday by agents of Mexico's attorney general's office in Mexico City and flown immediately to New York, where he is under indictment on drug trafficking and money laundering charges, the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, said in a news release.

Maya Duran's arrest "shows the determination of U.S. and Mexican law enforcement authorities to pursue the most dangerous criminals, including those who thought they were untouchable," U.S. Ambassador in Mexico Tony Garza said in a statement.

Officials at the attorney general's office in Mexico said they had no immediate comment.

A Colombian citizen, Maya Duran and three other key lieutenants allegedly took over the Norte Valle cartel, based in Cartago, Colombia, after the ring's suspected leader, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante, was jailed in Cuba for attempting to enter the country with a false passport two years ago.

The ICE said the cartel is Colombia's largest and most feared, and allegedly exported more than 1.2 million pounds of cocaine to the United States between 1990 and 2004.

Maya Duran allegedly arranged the logistics of drug shipments to the United States and Europe, according to the U.S. State Department.

U.S. officials posted a $5 million reward in his arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0061195

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Before Speeches, A Bush Strategy To Regain Edge (NYT) 4
Bush Resets Political Debate With Demands For Action (WT) 5
Bush 9/11 Tour Aims To Bolster Republicans (WSJ) 6
President Aims To Revisit Social Security After Recess (WP) 7
Bush Plans 9/11 Anniversary Address (LAT) 8
Bush Plans Prime Time Sept. 11 Address (AP) 8
George W. Bush 'Most People Want Us To Win' (WSJ) 9
Analysis: War Focus Holds Political Risk (AP-Y) 12
Democrats Urge 9/11 Unity (WT) 13
House Leaders Spar Over Resolution Honoring Victims Of Sept. 11 (MCT) 13
Five Years After 9/11: How Have Things Changed? (WSJ) 14
Waiting For Al Qaeda (NYT) 15
Five Years On (WSJ) 15
Thatcher To Attend Sept 11 Memorial Events In Washington (AFP) 17
US's Rice To Thank Canada For Support After September 11 Attacks (AFP) 18
Where's The Clarity? (NSWK) 18
Arrest Evidence Stands In Padilla Terror Case (LAT) 20
Looking For Agreement On Tribunals For Detainees (NYT) 21
A Solution For Trials (WP) 22
Lindsey Graham: Accused Terrorists Must See Evidence Against Them (MCT) 22
Why Lindsey Graham Is Blocking Bush On Terror Trials (TIME) 24
Linking Faces To Terror: Bush's Clever Footwork (NYT) 24
Judgment At Guantanamo (WSJ) 25
Bin Laden's Blueprint (WT) 27

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Urges Congress On Security Gaps (AP-Y) 28
Airport Screening Technology Developed (AP-Y) 28
Is Utah Tops In Terror? (DESERET) 30
Share Data -- And Protect Rights (WP) 31
Police On The Lookout For Terrorists With Missiles Near Airports (WP) 32
New York Muslims Beset By Suspicion (FT) 34
KC Man Linked To Early Al-Qaida (KCS) 34
Paulson Sizes Up Wall St Disaster Defences (FT) 36
Anxiety Remains On Wall St Disaster Planning (FT) 36
9/11 Has Spurred Only Modest Changes In New York City And National Building Codes (NYT) 37
After Attacks Changed The World, The Recovery Changed A City (WP) 39
Business As Usual Economic Fears After 9/11 Proved Mostly Unfounded (WSJ) 41
Early Accounting For 9/11 Aftermath Despite Dire Forebodings, Stocks, Productivity Are Up, But Final Reckoning Awaits (WSJ) 43
Democrats Maintaining The Pressure On 9/11 Film (NYT) 44
Scott Collins And Tina Daunt, (LA) 45
Clinton, Other Democrats Assail ABC Docudrama 'Path To 9/11' (WP) 46
Bush Asks To Interrupt Show (KCS) 47
The Unslammed Phone (NYT) 48
An Untrue 'Path'? (NSWK) 49
Congress Criticizes Federal Response To Illnesses After 9/11 And Seeks More Spending (NYT) 50
EPA, NYC Blamed For 9/11 Health Problems (AP-Y) 51
Veterans Of Sept. 11 (NYT) 52
Washington School Still Feels Pain Of 9/11 (NYT) 53
He Bears The Mark Of His Loss Sadly (NYT) 54
After 5 Years, His Voice Can Still Crack (NYT) 55
Declarations The Sounds That Still Echo From 9/11 (WSJ) 57
Twin Beams To Light Sky Again. But After 2008? (NYT) 58
9/11 Memorial In N.J. Has 40 Extra Names (AP-Y) 59

War News:

Khatami: American "Conceit And Pride" Led To Iraq Mess (TIME) 59
Senate: Saddam Saw Al-Qaida As Threat (AP-Y) 61
Report Details Errors Before War (WP) 62
Senate: Hussein Wasn't Allied With Al Qaeda (LAT) 63
C.I.A. Said To Find No Hussein Link To Terror Chief (NYT) 65
Iraq's Alleged Al-Qaeda Ties Were Disputed Before War (WP) . 67
Intelligence Didn't Back Bush Iraq Stand, Reports Say (Update1) (BLOOM) 68
Report Finds No Saddam, Zarqawi Ties (WT) 69
Senate Reports Say Saddam Rejected Cooperating With Terrorists (MCT) 70
Saddam Rejected Al-Qaida's Requests For Aid (SLPD) 72
Make No Mistake: Presidents Wouldn't Admit It (WP) 73

With All Deliberate Foot-Dragging (NYT) ... 74
Army General Says Rumsfeld Refused To Plan For Post-war Iraq (DULNT/MCT) ... 74
Iranian Troops Arrest 5 From Iraqi Security Forces On Border (NYT) ... 75
Five Iraqi Soldiers Seized In Border Clash With Iran (WP) ... 76
Forces Deploy In Karbala To Protect Shi'ite Pilgrims (WT/AP) ... 77
Security Tight For Karbala Pilgrims (LAT) ... 77
U.S. Count Of Baghdad Deaths Excludes Car Bombs, Mortar Attacks (MCT) ... 78
New Army Manual Recalls Abuse (WP) ... 79
U.S. Finds 'Torture Chambers' In Iraq (AP-Y) ... 80
Ex-Marine Warns Not To Rush To Judgment (LAT) ... 80
Blast In Kabul Kills 14 Afghans, 2 U.S. Soldiers (WP) ... 81
Suicide Bomber Kills 16 In Kabul Near Embassy (NYT) ... 82
Car Bomb Kills 16 Near U.S. Embassy (WT/AP) ... 84
New Urgency To Nato Troop Call (FT) ... 84
Lethal Blast Near Embassy Stokes Afghan Security Fears (LAT) 85
Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 16 People Near U.S. Embassy In Kabul (MCT) ... 86
Commander Has Hard Sell On Afghan Troops (AP-Y) ... 87
Karzai On The Bombing: "The Enemy Is Not Eliminated" (TIME) 88
Source: Mullah Omar In Pakistan (CNN) ... 89
Major Reported She Had Been Kidnapped (AP) ... 90
Air Force Officer Who Vanished In Kyrgyzstan Is Found Alive (NYT/AP) ... 91
Army On Pace To Meet Year's Recruiting Goal (WP) ... 91
Army Touts Recruiting Turnaround (AP) ... 92
Ex-Congress Aide Accused In Spy Case Is Free On Bail (NYT) 93

Corporate Scandals:

Stock Options Probe Expands (AP) ... 94
Broadcom Problem Grows (MERCN) ... 95
Broadcom's Stock Option Costs Soar (LAT) ... 96
Broadcom's Backdating Charge Doubles To $1.5 Billion (Update5) (BLOOM) ... 98
Ebbers Ordered To Report To Prison Sept. 26 In WorldCom Fraud (FINDLAW/AP) ... 99
Former Enron Executive David Delainey Asks Judge For Probation (BLOOM) ... 99
HP Chairwoman Tries To Diffuse Uproar (AP) ... 100

Criminal Law:

Washington: Executive Is Sentenced In Bribery Case (NYT) ... 101
Businessman Gets 7 Years For Bribing Legislator (WP) ... 101
Exec. Gets 7 Years For Congressman Bribe (AP-Y) ... 102
IGate's Jackson Gets 87 Months (LEXHL) ... 102
Roller-coaster Career Ends In Prison (NOTP) ... 103
More Firms Linked To Probe (NOTP) ... 105
Obvious Question In Plame Case Had Early Answer (LAT) ... 106
Armitage Leak Poses More Questions (AP-Y) ... 107
Feds Interview Harris' Ex-campaign Manager (SPT) ... 108
Pressure Mounts On Internet Gaming (AP-YBIZ) ... 109
Death Penalty Sought For Killing At Wheeler (HONADV) ... 109
Prosecutors Seeking Death Penalty In Child Beating (HSB) ... 110
Jail For Va. Man Who Gave China Secrets (FINDLAW/AP) ... 111
Pentagon Analyst Gets Light Jail Term (WT) ... 111
Jail For Va. Man Who Gave China Secrets (AP) ... 112
Officials Capture Fugitive On FBI's 10 Most Wanted List (NSDY/AP) ... 112
Fugitive Wanted In Shootings Of 3 Troopers Surrenders (NYT) 113
Capture Ends Fugitive's Long Run (ALBANYTU) ... 114
Around The Nation (WT) ... 115

Civil Law:

Iraq Contractor Inflated Costs, Lawsuit Alleges (NYT) ... 116
Whistle-blower Slams Iraq Contractor (AP-Y) ... 116
Halliburton Fraud Lawsuit Details Super Bowl Party (LAT) ... 117
Government Won't Join Lawsuit (HC/BLOOM) ... 118
Pfizer Wins Dismissal Of Suit By Former Executive (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 119

Antitrust:

Michaels Sale Wins Antitrust Approval (BLOOM) ... 120
Michaels Buyout Wins Antitrust Clearance (DALBIZ) ... 120
Alltel To Sell Operations In Rural Minnesota As Part Of Midwest Purchase (RCRWN) ... 120
Government Pressuring Realtors To Include All Listings Online (MJS) ... 120
GE Gets Antitrust OK To Buy Kinder Morgan Natural Gas Unit (MRKTWTCH) ... 122

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Interior Department Rejects Interim Plan For Nuclear Waste (NYT) ... 122
Valero Refinery To Clean Up Air With New System (WILNJ) ... 123
Judge Halts Petroleum Lease Sales (FINDLAW/AP) ... 124

Immigration:

Frist Stresses GOP's Immigration Efforts (WP) ... 124
Stalled Bills Might Have Cut Mall Rally Crowd, Some Say (WP) 125
Boston Tests System Connecting Fingerprints To Records Of Immigration Violations (NYT) ... 126
Pa. City OKs Illegal Immigration Overhaul (AP-Y) ... 127

Tax:

Guilty Plea In $200m Tax Fraud Case (FT) ... 128
Guilty Plea In Big U.S. Tax-Evasion Case (NYT/AP) ... 128
Telecom Mogul Guilty Of Tax Scam (WP) ... 129

Congress-Administration:

Bush Delays Summit With Automakers (AP-Y) ... 130
Ford Chairman Receives Call From Bush (NYT) ... 131
Hi Bill Ford, It's George Calling (FREEP) ... 132
Bush Calls Ford Amid Criticism (DNw) ... 133
Silencing A Skeptic (NSWK) ... 134
The Affluent Soon Will Be Paying More For Medicare (MCT) ... 137
Shuttle, Delayed By Faulty Sensor, Will Try Again Saturday (NYT) ... 138
Last-Ditch Launch Attempt (LAT) ... 139
Atlantis Launch Scrubbed As Fuel Gauge Issues Persist (USAT) 139

Other News:

Dow Industrials Climb 60.67 As Oil Drops (WSJ) ... 141

DOJ_NMG_0061197

U.S. Stocks Rise On Drop In Oil, Fed Official's Rate Comment (BLOOM) ... 141
A Brief Rebound But Losses For The Week (NYT/AP) ... 143
Consumer Credit Slowed In July As Higher Wages Provided Cash (NYT) ... 144
Consumer Borrowing Slows In July (AP-Y) ... 144
States Must Find Welfare Recipients Jobs (AP-Y) ... 145
Bush's Speech Called Uplifting And Warm (FREEP) ... 146
Bush Zips In For Feel-good Visit (KCS) ... 146
Cheney Visit Is Met By Traffic, Protests (BOS) ... 148
Lieberman Points Out A Turnabout By Lamont (NYT) ... 149
Lieberman Defends 1998 Rebuke Of Clinton (AP-Y) ... 150
As Outsider, Lieberman Walks A Tricky Path (NYT) ... 150
Nancy Reagan Asks Webb To Pull Ad With Her Husband (WP) 152
Nancy Reagan Objects To Campaign Ad (AP-Y) ... 153
Bellwether Community Still Handicapping Hopefuls (WT) ... 154
New Jersey's Sen. Robert Menendez Faces Tough Challenge (MCT) ... 155
Inquiry Said To Involve An Agency's Links To Senator Menendez (NYT) ... 156
Cardin, Mfume Seek To Distinguish Campaigns (WT) ... 157
Democrats' Best Hopes Lie In Suburban The Northeast, Midwest (MCT) ... 158
Edwards Runs Tough Race Against Wynn (WP) ... 159
Governor Apologizes For Ethnic Comments (LAT) ... 160
Schwarzenegger Apologizes For Ethnic Group Remarks (NYT) 161
Schwarzenegger Says He Is Sorry (WP) ... 162
Schwarzenegger Regrets 'Very Hot' Remark (AP-Y) ... 163
Major Iranian Bank Is Blocked From Using U.S. Financial System (WSJ) ... 163
U.S. Moves To Isolate Iranian Banks (WP) ... 164
U.S. Cracks Down On Iranian Bank (AP-Y) ... 165
U.N. Is Moving To Punish Iran, U.S. Envoy Says (NYT) ... 165
U.S. Expects Iran Sanctions Within Weeks (AP) ... 166
U.S. Confident Of Sanctions On Tehran (WT/AP) ... 167
Khatami Blasts Wave Of 'Islamophobia' (AP-Y) ... 168
A Cleric Steeped In Ways Of Power (NYT) ... 168
Israel Ends Its Blockade Of Lebanon's Coastline (NYT) ... 171
Israel Lifts Lebanese Sea Blockade (WP) ... 172
Israel Lifts Naval Blockade On Lebanon (FT) ... 173
Israel Lifts Sea Blockade Of Lebanon (AP) ... 173
Israel Lifts Sea Blockade Of Beirut (WT/AP) ... 174
Lebanon Emerges From War More Divided Than Ever (FT) ... 175
Explosions Hit Indian Mosque, Stoking Fear Of Further Violence (NYT) ... 177
Bombings Kill 31, Injure 125 In Mainly Muslim City In India (WP) 177
India Bombings Kill 31, Injure 100 (AP-Y) ... 178
Saudi Religious Police Outlaw Cat, Dog Sales (WT/AP) ... 179
China Names New Envoy To N. Korea (WP) ... 180
Russia Opens Weapons Destruction Plant (AP) ... 180
With Little Authority, African Union Force Struggles With Its Mission In Darfur (NYT) ... 181
In Darfur, Terror From The Air (WP) ... 183
American Journalist Held In Sudan To Be Freed (WP) ... 184
Sudan Agrees To Free U.S. Reporter Accused Of Spying (NYT) 185
Blair And Brown Reach Deal Over May 4 (FT) ... 185
Criticism Follows Blair's Likely Successor Even As He Begins Discussing Policy Plans (NYT) ... 186
Infighting Still Dividing Blair's Party (AP) ... 187
Blairites Rejoice In Attack On Brown (FT) ... 188
Britain's Political Enigma (FT) ... 188
The Ditch Blair Project (LAT) ... 190
U.S. Paid 10 Journalists For Anti-Castro Reports (NYT) ... 190
Latin America (WSJ) ... 191
Mexico's Election Doubts May Linger (LAT) ... 192
Mexico Arrests Major Cocaine Suspect (AP) ... 193

DOJ_NMG_0061198

TERRORISM NEWS:

Before Speeches, A Bush Strategy To Regain Edge (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — When President Bush and his top aides gathered in July to sketch out a strategy for the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, it was clear to all that they had to try to reset the clock — back to a time, before Iraq, when portraying Mr. Bush as a steely commander in chief was a far simpler task, and before Hurricane Katrina, when questions about the administration's competence did not weigh so heavily.

From those discussions emerged the speeches Mr. Bush has delivered over the last week, the leading edge of a remarkably intensive and aggressive campaign in which he has tried to regain ground he has lost for more than two years, by turning the conversation away from Iraq and back toward the broader war on terror.

It is a carefully calibrated strategy that will continue in coming days, first with an appearance Sunday morning by Vice President Dick Cheney on NBC's "Meet the Press," the vehicle he used to advantage at key moments after Sept. 11 and then Mr. Bush's appearance that night at ground zero in New York and a prayer service at St. Paul's Chapel.

On Monday, for the first time since the first anniversary, in 2002, Mr. Bush will visit all three sites of the attack that remade his presidency — New York, Shanksville, Pa. and the Pentagon. Then he will cap the day and bring to a close this phase of his effort to portray himself and his party on his terms with a nationally televised speech from the Oval Office.

It is bound to be reminiscent of his speech from the same seat exactly five years before, when, after a shaky day, he first pronounced the "Bush doctrine" that led to the toppling of the Taliban in Afghanistan and ultimately became the heart of the administration's justification for invading Iraq.

"You can never turn back the clock," Dan Bartlett, the counselor to the president, said on Friday when asked about the strategy. "But we knew that news organizations and everyone else would be using this moment to define where we were five years later, and the president wanted to articulate his view, too."

"He's not trying to ignore Iraq — he wouldn't, he doesn't want to," Mr. Bartlett added. "But he had to explain that even if we have a debate here about whether Iraq's part of the war on terror, the enemy believes it is."

Mr. Bartlett, like Mr. Bush two weeks ago, said this was a moment of remembrance and a reminder of national resolve, not a moment for politics. But nine weeks before a midterm election that many Republicans fear they may lose, it is impossible to separate remembrance and politics.

In interviews, Republican strategists who are aware of the closely held White House plans for this week say the critical question is whether Mr. Bush still holds the power to alter the course of national conversation away from the Iraq war and back to the theme that has worked for them before, countering direct threats to the United States.

But there is another, related question as well: whether Republicans can succeed again in convincing the nation that Democrats cannot be trusted with keeping it safe. The political strategy pursued by Mr. Bush's strategist, Karl Rove, has always been to frame elections as choices and to work to make the other side an unappealing alternative.

The White House has signaled its intentions on that score and appears to be pivoting to a more openly political phase of its strategy, in which the administration and its allies will try to undermine the Democrats.

Last week, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld compared critics of the war to "appeasers." Mr. Cheney, for months, has been calling those who want to withdraw from Iraq "plain wrong." The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, coined a new term, "Defeatocrats," that Republicans have quickly worked into their lexicon, along with highly charged words like "surrender."

"I think this series of speeches will be critical to not simply defining this president, but more importantly to defining the challenges of our generation," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, adding, "One of the key questions that voters will answer is whether they want to elect leaders who recognize that we're at war and want to do whatever it takes to win the war, or do they want to surrender very key tools that have been necessary to prosecute the war."

Republicans and their allies are already stepping up their negative campaign against Democrats. In Tennessee, the Republican National Committee is running an advertisement against the Democratic candidate for Senate, Representative

DOJ_NMG_0061199

Harold Ford, that features pictures of fighter planes and control towers, as an ominous voice intones: "The threats are out there. The responsibility is clear. Knowing who the terrorists are and where they are is the only way to keep us safe."

While Mr. Bush proved in recent days that he was capable of seizing the agenda and dominating the news, there were reminders of the limits of his power to drive the national discussion to his benefit. He was out fund-raising on Friday, but the candidates did not campaign publicly with him, only behind closed doors at the fund-raisers.

And even the Senate Intelligence Committee, which Republicans control, released a report on Friday that raised new questions about the administration's use of prewar intelligence. It found that the Central Intelligence Agency had backed away last fall from the administration's claims, which Mr. Bush repeated just weeks ago, of ties between Saddam Hussein's Iraq and the Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The White House campaign to seize control of the debate grew in part out of a national security issue involving Mr. Bush's decision to move 14 high-profile terrorist suspects from C.I.A. custody in undisclosed locations in other countries into military custody at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, said one Republican who is often consulted by the White House and who spoke in return for anonymity.

The Republican said it was the transfer of the 14 suspects as much as Monday's anniversary of the attacks that prompted the political planning. The initial thought, he said, was to give one speech to "talk about the context," but soon the idea grew into a series of speeches dovetailing nicely with the political agenda, managed by Mr. Rove, the chief strategist; Mr. Bartlett; and Joshua B. Bolten, the chief of staff.

"The political folks and the communications folks, basically Karl and Dan and Josh, were delighted with the notion that you could begin to shape the fall debate around a series of substantive speeches that would not only drive the news but define the policy for people, and define the differences," this Republican said.

The speeches, written by a team headed by William J. McGurn, emphasized the continuing threat represented by Osama bin Laden and went on to offer Mr. Bush's own fairly upbeat report on progress made in closing the gaps in domestic security laid bare by the Sept. 11 attacks.

The White House kept the details of one speech particularly secret, even from some senior staff members: Mr. Bush's declaration on Wednesday that he had transferred the terror suspects from C.I.A. custody to the detention center at Guantánamo in a speech in which he also challenged Congress to give him the authority to begin war-crimes trials.

"This was the most cumbersome, because all of the material was so highly classified," Mr. Bartlett said, though Mr. Bush declassified some of the details of their interrogations in an effort to bolster his case that sometimes there was a need for what he delicately called "alternative" interrogation methods.

Bush Resets Political Debate With Demands For Action (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

President Bush this week reset the political landscape with just two months to go until the congressional elections, grabbing top headlines three days in a row as he dropped several political hot potatoes into Congress' lap and demanded action this month.

After a summer of questions about policy and progress in Iraq, his strategy on Iranian nuclear ambitions and the collapse of his push for a broad immigration bill, Mr. Bush has honed in on one overriding message: Democrats can either join Republicans to pass bipartisan bills or they can try to block them and see how that plays in November.

He also boosted Republicans' case for having made the nation more secure since the September 11 attacks by giving details of plots that have been foiled -- the first time many of those details have ever been released.

"It's not an abstract argument anymore. The president pointed out specific events that have not occurred," Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said in a telephone interview.

Democrats took some of their best shots to date, including an attempt to vote "no confidence" on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the release of their own security plan. But they were countered by White House dominance of the news cycle on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday -- the three days Congress was in session and Democrats had a platform.

Democrats, remembering the way the president used the creation of the Department of Homeland Security in 2002 as a wedge to win control of the Senate, said they won't let that happen again.

"We're playing it much smarter this time. We're not going to allow them to box us into a corner," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "It's obvious what the administration was trying to do this week, and that was exert maximum pressure on Democrats, and Republicans as well, that have concerns about their proposal. Unfortunately this time it's not going to work. Their tough-talking rings hollow."

DOJ_NMG_0061200

Unlike 2002, Mr. Manley said, Democrats have both the September 11 commission as a yardstick to point out where the administration has fallen short on homeland security and divisions among Republicans on a number of issues.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, yesterday said splits among Republicans on military tribunals for detainees, Iraq policy and the fate of Mr. Rumsfeld have paralyzed the majority party.

"The result is fighting and chaos and nothing accomplished for the country. It's time for a new direction," Mr. Emanuel said.

Mr. Bush sought to cut through many of those divisions this week by honing his message.

In three speeches this week the president tried to put a face on the terrorists, asked Congress to approve his terrorist wiretapping program and announced he has transferred 14 top terrorists from CIA custody to the Defense Department. He called on Congress to authorize military commissions to try them.

"That is the No. 1 priority right now," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday.

Mr. McConnell said the courts forced the issue, but insisted that the political decision is now up to the Democrats.

"They've got now a choice -- they can either sign up with the president and the administration and a majority of Republicans and pass these two pieces of legislation on an overwhelmingly bipartisan basis, or they can turn it into a political issue we'll be happy to take to the American people," he said.

Bush 9/11 Tour Aims To Bolster Republicans (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

President Bush will visit the sites of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Sunday and Monday for a series of events that the administration hopes can once more lift Republicans to victory.

Mr. Bush sees the attacks as the defining moment of his presidency, and made his muscular response a centerpiece of his re-election campaign in 2004. With the Republican majorities in Congress endangered by economic uncertainty and public fury over the war in Iraq, the White House is striving to remind voters of its response to Sept. 11 -- part of a broader assertion that Republicans take the terrorist threat more seriously than Democrats do and are better prepared to defend against it.

After months of rarely mentioning fugitive al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, Mr. Bush and other top White House officials are again making him a central part of their speeches. The president's announcement Wednesday that he had ordered high-level al Qaeda detainees such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed to be moved to the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, meanwhile, was designed in part to shift the terms of the public debate about the controversial facility by linking it explicitly to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The White House push will hit its emotional peak when Mr. Bush flies to each of the three sites struck to pay respect to the Americans who died there. On Sunday, Mr. Bush travels to New York to lay a wreath at the former site of the World Trade Center, take part in a prayer service at St. Paul's Cathedral and meet with police officers, firefighters and other first-responders to the attacks. On Monday, he will journey to Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon -- the crash sites of the other two hijacked airliners -- to lay wreaths.

Although Mr. Bush and other aides have long made terrorism a central part of their argument that Democrats are soft on national defense, administration officials say the president will make the Sept. 11 commemorations as apolitical as possible by not giving prepared remarks at any of the three sites. White House spokesman Tony Snow says Mr. Bush's only formal speech either day will be an Oval Office address to the nation Monday night on "what he thought Sept. 11th has meant to the country, what it taught us, and how Americans have demonstrated their toughness, compassion, courage and optimism in the many days since."

Mr. Snow says the president's recent speeches touting his administration's homeland-security record and asking Congress to approve controversial White House initiatives, such as tapping the phones of those suspected of terrorist links without warrants or trying extremists before military commissions rather than traditional legal forums, are "not exercises in reviving past emotions."

"They're designed to place in context ongoing threats and ongoing and future actions to address those threats," he says. "Heart-tugging addresses would have sounded very different and would have approached the subject in an entirely different way."

Still, there is no doubt terrorism will be a central issue in the November midterm elections, which Democrats see as their best chance in years to regain control of the House and possibly the Senate.

Strategists of both parties say the elections are likely to be decided largely by whether voters ultimately accept the Democratic case that the Iraq war has made the nation less safe by distracting military and intelligence personnel from the fight against al Qaeda, or the Republican contention that the war there is central to the broader battle against Muslim extremists.

DOJ_NMG_0061201

"There's a clear understanding today that there are two wars, one against terrorism and one in Iraq," says Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee. "Americans understand that it's apples and oranges to say that they're the same fight."

White House aides, for their part, believe terrorism remains a winning political issue for Republicans. In recent meetings with lobbyists and political operatives, White House strategist Karl Rove and White House political director Sara Taylor said that Mr. Bush and other top administration officials would make regular reference to Mr. bin Laden and the threat posed by Islamic extremists in the eight weeks that remain until the elections, according to several of those in attendance.

"I continue to think that if the Republicans were to pick the battlefield issues, we'd say, 'Lets talk about national security,' " says Vin Weber, a Republican strategist and former congressman. "And if I were the opposition party I'd be nervous about an election strategy that rests on making a fundamental challenge to the commander in chief at a time of war. That's an incredibly tough thing to pull off."

To that, Democrats say the political terrain has shifted considerably since 2004, when Republicans last used terrorism successfully as a political issue. They argue that the deep disapproval of the Iraq war has eroded Mr. Bush's stature as a leader and that the White House's attempts to capitalize on the terrorism issue have robbed it of much of its punch.

President Aims To Revisit Social Security After Recess (WP)

By Anushka Asthana And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Sept. 8 -- President Bush said this week he would like to revisit Social Security reform next year and said he personally approved the U.S. visit of Iran's former president, as he prepared to address the nation to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The White House has requested network television time for the Oval Office address, which is scheduled to begin at 9 p.m. on Monday. All four major broadcast networks have agreed to air the president's remarks.

"This is not a political speech. There are not going to be any calls to action for Congress," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "It will be a reflection of what September 11th has meant to the president and to the country, the realities that it has brought to all of our attention, and how we can move forward together to try to win the war on terror."

In one of a series of interviews he is conducting to mark the anniversary, Bush told the Wall Street Journal that he would like to tackle Social Security after the midterm elections, when he "will be able to drain the politics out of the issue." The interview will appear in this weekend's Journal.

Bush failed last year to persuade Congress to overhaul the New Deal-era program, including the creation of private investment accounts and a reduction of guaranteed benefits for future retirees. His staff has said he is exploring the issue, but his comments to the Journal were the most definitive that he wanted to try something again -- although he did not say exactly what.

The president also said he personally approved this week's visit of former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami, a trip that has drawn some criticism in conservative circles.

"I was interested to hear what he had to say," Bush said. "I'm interested in learning more about the Iranian government, how they think, what people think within the government."

Bush's commemoration of the anniversary of the attacks will begin Sunday afternoon in New York, where he will lay a wreath at Ground Zero before taking part in a prayer service.

On Monday, he will begin his day with breakfast with emergency service personnel in New York, then will participate in a moment of silence at 8:46 a.m., the time that the first plane slammed into the North Tower of the World Trade Center, and then a ceremony with New York first responders.

From there, Bush will travel to Shanksville, Pa., where just after noon he is scheduled to participate in a wreath-laying. Later that afternoon, he will take part in a similar ceremony at the Pentagon.

The anniversary of the deadliest terrorist attack in the nation's history also will inspire a brief moment of bipartisan comity. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) will be among those joining Bush at the Pentagon ceremony. That evening congressional leaders from both parties will lead a commemoration of the national tragedy with speeches, a moment of silence and patriotic songs from the steps of the Capitol.

White House aides announced plans for Monday's speech on a day that Bush headlined closed-door fundraisers for GOP Senate candidates in Michigan and Missouri.

Bush's motorcade passed a small demonstration from protesters in Michigan holding up signs that read "President You've Let Us Down" and urging him to meet with the chief executives of the nation's struggling automobile manufacturers. A planned meeting between Bush and the heads of the nation's leading automakers has been repeatedly delayed, and deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the session will be held after the November election to "avoid getting it mired in politics."

DOJ_NMG_0061202

Fletcher reported from Washington. Staff writer Michael Abramowitz in Washington contributed to this report.

Bush Plans 9/11 Anniversary Address (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush plans to deliver a speech to the nation from the Oval Office on Monday, the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, to reflect on what the terror strikes meant to the nation and to address what the United States still needs to do to fight terrorism, his spokesman said Friday.

The speech, at 6 p.m. PDT, will conclude Bush's participation in two days of commemorations of the attacks, which reshaped his presidency as well as the nation's foreign and intelligence policies.

Before delivering the speech, Bush will take part in memorial ceremonies Monday at all three sites where hijacked planes crashed on Sept. 11, 2001 — in New York City, in Pennsylvania and at the Pentagon.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush's address would avoid a partisan tone.

"This is not a political speech. There are not going to be any calls to action for Congress," Snow said at a White House news briefing. "It will be a reflection of what Sept. 11 has meant to the president and to the country, the realities that it has brought to all of our attention, and how we can move forward together to win the war on terror."

On Sunday, Bush is scheduled to take part in two ceremonies in New York City: The presentation of a wreath at ground zero, where the World Trade Center towers stood, and a worship service at a nearby church. He is not expected to make formal remarks at either event, Snow said.

The next morning, the president will have breakfast with New York City emergency crews; observe a moment of silence at 8:46 a.m., when the first of two airplanes struck the trade center; and take part in a formal commemoration of the attacks.

From New York, he will fly to Pennsylvania to visit the site near Shanksville where United Flight 93 went down after passengers tried to seize control from hijackers. At midafternoon, he will present a wreath at the Pentagon, which was struck by a fourth airplane.

The speech Monday evening will be the fifth address in 12 days Bush will have delivered on terrorism and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The previous speeches have delineated his policies, setting out markers that differentiate them from those of Democrats, without naming the opposition party.

Snow said the speech Monday "is not something where we're trying to draw bright lines to separate Democrats from Republicans."

Rather, he said, Bush would try to draw on the way the country responded to the attacks, which Snow said was "nothing short of sensational, and it's something that could only have happened in this country."

Bush Plans Prime Time Sept. 11 Address (AP)

AP, September 9, 2006

President Bush will make a prime-time address from the Oval Office on Monday to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the administration had requested network time for the address at 9:01 p.m. EDT. The address is expected to run 16 to 18 minutes, he said.

The speech will come after Bush visits each of the attack sites, in New York, Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon, where terrorist hijackers used commercial airliners as weapons to kill nearly 3,000 people.

Snow said Bush's address would not be a political speech or a charge to Congress for action. Rather, he said, it would be reflective of what Sept. 11 has meant and "how we move ahead as a country in making use of the lessons of Sept. 11."

"It will have a note of optimism as well as sobriety about what we've been through," Snow said.

Also, it was revealed that the Pentagon on Saturday will allow the public to tour a multi-faith chapel and other memorial sites at the spot where a hijacked airline slammed into the building on that fateful day.

A Pentagon tour guide will accompany groups to visit the small chapel and an adjacent memorial room where the names of all 184 victims are etched on a plaque and a booklet contains a photo and description of each.

Also in the room is the flag that was draped over the casket used in a group burial honoring the 184 victims at Arlington National Cemetery the day after the attack, which destroyed a large section of the Pentagon's southwest side.

The first time the public was allowed to view these rooms was last Sept. 11.

Members of the public also can see a memorial marble stone, taken from the rubble of 9-11, that was embedded in the rebuilt section of the Pentagon at the spot where hijacked American Airlines Flight 77 hit the building.

DOJ_NMG_0061203

The tour will include a look at the construction site for a two-acre memorial park near the impact site. The memorial, scheduled to be completed by the fall of 2008, will feature benches set over small reflecting pools commemorating each of the 184 victims. Several species of maple trees, including one known as the paperback maple, will dot the site.

George W. Bush 'Most People Want Us To Win' (WSJ)

By Paul Gigot

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE -- Speaker Nancy Pelosi?

"That's not going to happen," snaps the president of the United States, leaning across his desk in his airborne office. He had been saying that he hoped to revisit Social Security reform next year, when he "will be able to drain the politics out of the issue," and I rudely interrupted by noting the polls predicting Ms. Pelosi's ascension.

"I just don't believe it," the president insists. "I believe the Republicans will end up being -- running the House and the Senate. And the reason why I believe it is because when our candidates go out and talk about the strength of this economy, people will say their tax cuts worked, their plan worked. . . . And secondly, that this is a group of people that understand the stakes of the world in which we live and are willing to help this unity government in Iraq succeed for the sake of our children and grandchildren, and that we are steadfast in our belief in the capacity of liberty to bring peace."

Love or loathe President George W. Bush, you can't say he lacks the courage of his convictions. Down in the polls, with the American people in a sour mood over Iraq, Mr. Bush isn't changing his policy or hunkering down in the Oval Office. Instead he's doubling down, investing whatever scarce political capital he has to frame the November contest as a choice over the economy and taxes and especially over his prosecution of the war on terror.

The strategy carries no small risk, because if Republicans lose, Democrats will feel even more emboldened to challenge him on national security. The final two years of his presidency could be dreadful and the chances of a U.S. retreat in Iraq would multiply. On the other hand, his senior aides say, Mr. Bush will be blamed if Republicans lose in any case, so he might as well play his strongest hand to prevent such a result. And if the GOP holds both houses, he'll deserve much of the credit. * * *

The president is certainly in feisty, even passionate, form as I meet him for 40-some minutes Thursday afternoon, coming off the third of his speeches this week on the lessons of 9/11 and a fund-raiser in Savannah, Ga., for GOP House candidate Max Burns. The critics are saying the Bush Doctrine of spreading democracy in the Middle East is dead, but the Beltway coroners must not have talked with Mr. Bush. I pose the frequent complaint that his policy has succeeded only in unleashing the radical Furies in Palestine, Lebanon and Iraq.

"I would remind the critics of the freedom agenda that the policy prior to September 11th was stability for the sake of stability: Let us not worry about the form of government. Let us simply worry about whether or not the world appears stable, whether or not we achieve short-term geopolitical gain," he says. "And it looked like that policy was working, and, frankly, it made some sense when it came to dealing with the Middle East vis-à-vis the Communists.

"The problem with that philosophy, or that foreign policy, was that beneath the surface boiled resentment and hatred, and that resentment and hatred helped fuel this radical Islam, and the radical Islam is what ended up causing the attacks that killed 3,000 of our citizens. So I vowed, and made the decision that not only would we stay on the offense and . . . get these people before they could attack us again. But in the long run the only way to make sure your grandchildren are protected, Paul, is to win the battle of ideas, is to defeat the ideology of hatred and resentment."

But would he concede that elections have so far empowered mainly the radicals? "It's a part of the process. I think Americans must remember we had some growing pains ourselves. It wasn't all that smooth a road to the Constitution to begin with in our own country. Democracy is not easy," he says, coiled and intense in his presidential flight jacket.

Take the Palestinian elections that elevated the terrorist group Hamas to power. "I wasn't surprised," he says, "that the political party that said 'Vote for me, I will get rid of corruption' won, because I was the person that decided on U.S. foreign policy that we were not going to deal with Mr. Arafat because he had let his people down, and that money that the world was spending wasn't getting to the Palestinian people. . . . They didn't say, 'Vote for us, we want war.' They said, 'Vote for us, we will get you better education and health.'"

Mr. Bush concedes that Hamas's "militant wing," as he calls it, is "unacceptable." But he says he sees a virtue in "creating a sense where people have to compete for people's votes. They have to listen to the concerns of the street." The answer is for other Palestinian leaders to out-compete Hamas to respond to those concerns. "Elections are not the end. They're only the beginning. And, no question, elections sometimes create victors that may not conform to everything we want. . . . On the other hand, it is the beginning of a more hopeful Middle East." * * *

DOJ_NMG_0061204

I try to dig a little deeper on Egypt, where the political opening of 18 months ago seems to have been abruptly closed by President Hosni Mubarak, with a muted U.S. response to the arrest of the moderate opposition leader, Ayman Nour. Has the U.S. given up on promoting reform in Egypt?

"Of course we have not given up," Mr. Bush says. "We were disappointed" about Ayman Nour. Does he believe Mr. Mubarak should release Mr. Nour? "Yes, I do, but he'll make those decisions based upon his own laws." Mr. Bush says he's spoken to Mr. Mubarak's son and heir-apparent, Gamal, about Mr. Nour, "and I have spoken to Mubarak a lot about democracy. And, equally importantly, I've talked to . . . a group of young reformers who are now in government. There's an impressive group of younger Egyptians -- the trade minister and some of the economic people -- that understand the promise and the difficulties of democracy."

The pace of Middle East reform will vary by country, he adds. In Kuwait, they now let women vote. "And so if you look at the Middle East from 10 years to today, there's been some significant change. Jordan changed, Morocco, the Gulf Coast countries, Qatar," and of course the nascent democracies of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Regarding Iraq, Mr. Bush is a bit reflective, if also insistent about the costs of failure. "I'm not surprised that this war has created consternation amongst the American people," he concedes. "The enemy has got the capacity to take -- got the willingness to take innocent life and the capacity to do so, knowing full well that those deaths and that carnage will end up on our TV screens. So the American people are now having to adjust to a new kind of bloody war.

"Now, my view of the country is this: Most people want us to win. There are a good number who say, get out now. But most Americans are united in the concept -- of the idea of winning."

On that point, I ask Mr. Bush to address not his critics on the left who want to withdraw, but those on the right who worry that he isn't fighting hard enough to win. "No, I understand. No, I hear that, Paul, a lot, and I take their word seriously, and of course use that as a basis for questioning our generals. My point to you is that one of the lessons of a previous war is that the military really wasn't given the flexibility to make the decisions to win. And I ask the following questions: Do you have enough? Do you need more troops? Do you need different equipment?" The question I failed to ask but wish I had is: Does this mean that, like Lincoln, Mr. Bush should have fired more generals?

With sectarian strife in Iraq, some critics (such as Sen. Joe Biden) are saying the best strategy now is for the country to divide into three -- Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni. Mr. Bush says partition would be "a mistake," though he does add that "the Iraqi people are going to have to make that decision." But he says Iraqis didn't vote for partition when they approved their new constitution or new government, and "this government has been in place since June; 90 days is a long time for some, but it's really not all that long to help a nation that was brutalized under a tyrant to get going."

Mr. Bush is most emphatic when he links Iraq to the larger struggle for Mideast reform. "In the long run, the United States is going to have to make a decision as to whether or not it will support moderates against extremists, reformers against tyrants. And Iraq is the first real test of the nation's commitment to this ideological struggle. . . . I believe it strongly. One way for the American people to understand the stakes is to envision what happens if America withdraws." He has been hitting that last point hard in his recent speeches, and it is the linchpin of the argument Mr. Bush will make through November against the Democrats who insist on pulling out immediately.

Intriguingly, the president broke a little news on the subject of Iran, acknowledging that he personally signed off on the U.S. visit this week by former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami. The trip has angered many conservatives because Mr. Khatami presided over the nuclear weapons development and cheating that Mr. Bush has pledged to stop. Why let him visit?

"I was interested to hear what he had to say," Mr. Bush responds without hesitation. "I'm interested in learning more about the Iranian government, how they think, what people think within the government. My hope is that diplomacy will work in convincing the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons ambitions. And in order for diplomacy to work, it's important to hear voices other than [current President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's."

One thing Mr. Khatami has said this week is that because the U.S. is bogged down in Iraq it will never have the will to stop Iran's nuclear program. Is he right? "Well, he also said it's very important for the [coalition] troops to stay in Iraq so that there is a stable government on the Iranian border," Mr. Bush replies, rather forgivingly.

On other hand, Mr. Bush remains as blunt as ever about the nature of the Iranian regime when I ask if one lesson of North Korea is that Iran must be stopped before it acquires a bomb. "North Korea doesn't teach us that lesson. The current government [in Iran] teaches that lesson," Mr. Bush says. "Their declared policies of destruction and their support for terror makes it clear they should not have a nuclear weapon."

The impression Mr. Bush leaves is of a man deeply engaged on the Iran problem and, like several presidents before him, trying to understand what kind of diplomatic or economic pressure short of military means will change the regime's behavior. One way or another, Iran will be the major dilemma of the rest of his presidency, and Mr. Bush knows it. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0061205

Five years after 9/11, I ask the president if he is surprised that -- and can explain why -- both Iraq and his larger antiterror policies have become so politically polarized. "Well, first of all, I do believe there's a difference between the political rhetoric out of Washington and what the citizens feel," he says.

"But this is a different kind of war. In the past, there was troop movements, or, you know, people could report the sinking of a ship. This is a war that requires intelligence and interrogation within the law from people who know what's happening. . . . Victories you can't see. But the enemy is able to create death and carnage that tends to define the action.

"And I think most Americans understand we're vulnerable. But my hope was after 9/11, most Americans wouldn't walk around saying, 'My goodness, we're at war. Therefore let us don't live a normal life. Let us don't invest.'" Mr. Bush calls it an "interesting contradiction" that he wants "people to understand the stakes of failure" in this conflict. But on the other hand, he also wants "the country to be able to grow, invest, save, expand, educate, raise their children." This is another way of saying how hard it is for a democracy to maintain support for a war without a tangible, ominous enemy such as the Soviet Union or Imperial Japan.

Could he have done more, as president, to win over more Democratic allies? "I met with a lot of Democrats over the course of this war, and" -- he pauses for the longest time in our interview -- "you know, it's hard for me to tell, Paul, whether I could have done a better job. . . . I don't know. I just don't know."

He then says that he has GOP majorities, and thus Republican leaders, to deal with. "Obviously, I wish that the effort were more bipartisan; it has been on certain issues. It certainly was when it came time for people to assess the intelligence that they had seen and knew about and vote on a resolution to remove Saddam Hussein from power." And it was as well on his policy of pursuing state sponsors of terror. But then the 2004 campaign intervened, he says, and now it's another campaign season.

Mr. Bush is an avid reader of history, and he has a contest with political aide Karl Rove to see who reads the most books. ("I'm losing," Mr. Bush says.) So I ask him if any current Democrat could play the role that Republican Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan played in helping Harry Truman establish new policies in the 1940s at the dawn of the Cold War.

Notably, he talks about Truman first. "I doubt Truman would have been able to predict how long the Cold War would last, but I applaud Truman for beginning to wage the Cold War" -- pregnant pause -- "for which he was very unpopular, for which the country was viewed as polarized." He never does mention a contemporary Vandenberg, and in truth the only one I can think of is Joe Lieberman, of late and by necessity not a Democrat but an "independent." * * *

The Truman reference is nonetheless revealing, because it suggests that perhaps Mr. Bush has begun to realize he will get little credit for his Middle East policies during his own presidency. His critics on the left in particular want to portray him as another LBJ, forlorn over a misbegotten war, and destined for historical disdain because of it. But Mr. Bush hardly resembles the LBJ who more or less came to agree with his Vietnam critics. He seems far more like Truman, both in his personal combativeness and also in his conviction that his vindication will come down the road.

One of his main goals now, also like Truman, is to institutionalize some of his antiterror policies by putting them on firmer legal and political ground so future presidents can use them. That's what his speech this week on military tribunals was mainly about, and the same goes for warrantless wiretaps and CIA interrogations of al Qaeda suspects. For all of the controversy they've caused, Mr. Bush is convinced that the next president will be grateful to have these tools. And despite all the partisan rancor surrounding them, Mr. Bush's legacy in defending them is likely to be lasting.

When I put to him the criticism made by Newt Gingrich, among others, that the U.S. security bureaucracy is too slow and unwieldy, he couldn't rebut it fast enough. "I disagree strongly," he says. "We were stove-piped in the past. We had an FBI whose primary responsibility was white-collar crime or criminality. We had a CIA that couldn't talk to criminal investigators. And we've changed all that."

Mr. Bush adds that the intelligence he receives is "quantifiably better" than it was before 9/11. One reason is the warrantless al Qaeda wiretaps, which gather intelligence from what he calls "the battlefield" in this conflict. "And so the data points are becoming richer, and the analysis is more complete, because now the reports I get on analysis have input from different parts of the intelligence community that John Negroponte is overseeing." Mr. Bush isn't likely to call legislation he signed a failure, but this is still the most reassuring thing I've heard about the CIA in years.

This is the fourth time I've interviewed Mr. Bush at length in the last eight years, going back to his time as Texas governor. One of the notable things about him is how similar he seems. He has always been supremely confident in his decisions and focused above all else on pushing forward, not looking back. If he is tortured by doubt, he doesn't show it to journalists. Some see this as obstinance, but he sees it as firmness of conviction.

Whether or not he's right about the elections this fall, you have to respect his willingness to put that conviction on the line. "I said in my Inaugural Address, we should end tyranny in the 21st century," he says. "And I meant that."

Mr. Gigot is the editor of The Wall Street Journal's editorial page.

DOJ_NMG_0061206

Analysis: War Focus Holds Political Risk (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 9, 2006

President Bush is casting the war on global terrorism as the central issue of the midterm elections. But it's a risky political strategy.

The approach carries reminders of failures in Iraq, prisoner treatment at Guantanamo Bay, warrantless wiretapping at home and Osama bin Laden's endurance abroad.

"We learned the lessons of Sept. 11," Bush said Thursday in the latest in a new round of speeches on the subject. "We're working to connect the dots to stop the terrorists from hurting America again."

GOP strategists hope the new focus, including efforts by Republicans in Congress to press for votes on a string of anti-terror initiatives, will burnish Bush's image as commander in chief in responding to the 9/11 attacks and help to divert attention from Iraq.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday that Bush will make a prime-time address from Oval Office on Monday to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks and that the White House had requested network air time at 9:01 p.m. EDT.

But Democrats were quick to portray the president's recent statements — including his acknowledgment Wednesday of a secret CIA prison system and the movement of 14 high-profile detainees to Guantanamo — as an admission of failure.

"Republicans have ignored the lessons of 9/11 and failed to make America as safe as we can and should be," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said on Thursday. "They want to stay the course in the face of failure. We won't. We'll change course in Iraq."

With the electorate in a sour and generally anti-incumbent mood, majority-party Republicans have little choice but to run on the war against terrorism, suggest activists in both parties.

Frank Luntz, a GOP pollster and strategist who helped orchestrate the "Contract with America" campaign in 1994 that helped Republicans seize control of both House and Senate, sees parallels between then and now — but in reverse since Republicans now control both chambers.

"There is a deep desire for change and a consistent widespread rejection of the status quo," he said.

Republicans have little choice but to make the war on terrorism their central theme, Luntz said. "They have to, because this is their one area of strength. This goes to the core difference between the two parties and their visions. If you can't communicate a core difference, what can you do?"

Democratic pollster Mark Mellman noted that the one-time commanding Republican edge over Democrats on national security "has been dramatically diminished."

"The conclusion of a lot of polls is that people in this country do not feel safer and they feel that George Bush's policies in Iraq and elsewhere have increased the likelihood of terrorism against the United States, not decreased it," Mellman said.

Six in 10 in a recent AP-Ipsos poll said there will be more terrorism in the United States because the U.S. went to war in Iraq. A CNN poll published earlier this week asked the public if the war in Iraq was part of the war on terrorism. Fifty-three percent said "no;" 45 percent said "yes."

With two months to go before congressional elections that will determine whether Republicans can extend their control of Congress, Americans seem concerned over the threat of terrorism but ambivalent over assigning credit — or blame — to efforts to contain it.

"We're in a lot better shape than where we were before," Grant Miller, 28, a car salesman and Democrat said over lunch in Crestwood, Ky.

Fellow Kentuckian Tim Cox, 46, gave the president solid marks for combatting terrorism, which he said was his biggest present concern. "We're doing what we should be," the factory worker said while stopping by the post office in PeeWee Valley, Ky.

Frank Satterly, 45, a Republican who works as a meat cutter in New Albany, Ind., called it "pretty darn good" that there have been no further terrorist attacks in the U.S. in the past five years. However, he said, no matter who is president, "We're still going to have a terror threat. This is not going away."

Heavy emphasis on the war against terrorism could backfire for the Republicans, particularly if things get worse in Iraq, southern Lebanon, or in dealings with Iran.

But Democrats could also overplay their hand by being too harshly critical of the president.

"At any point, there could be a rally-around-the-president effect if there's another terrorist incident, another big arrest, or if — God forbid — we're attacked again," said James Thurber, a political scientist at American University.

DOJ_NMG_0061207

Democrats Urge 9/11 Unity (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Democrats are challenging Republicans to put politics aside as they craft a resolution commemorating the anniversary of September 11, but also are accusing the majority party of making the country less safe in the five years since the terrorist attacks.

"Today, we are still living in a state of homeland insecurity," said Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat, who serves on the House Homeland Security Committee. "That is really what the Bush administration has as a legacy five years after 9/11."

Leaders from both parties will temporarily put their differences aside and unite for a Capitol Hill ceremony Monday evening to mark the anniversary.

"September 11th is not a time for politics," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland. He went on to outline his view of Republican security failures.

"September 11th is a time for remembering and resolve," he said. "On September 12th, frankly, we can, in my opinion, talk about the things that I am talking about today."

Republicans, meanwhile, plan to use their record on terrorism issues as they fight to hold onto power this fall.

On Wednesday they will offer a resolution honoring September 11 as a day of remembrance, Republican aides said. The resolution, a draft of which was obtained by The Washington Times, says that the American people "will continue to fight the war on terrorism" and "will never succumb to the cause of the terrorists."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California this week told Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois the draft she had seen "injects controversial political issues" and praises congressional legislation "that was highly controversial on a bipartisan basis."

The objectionable clauses include lauding "legislative accomplishments" such as the USA Patriot Act, the passage of the House's strict border enforcement-only plan in 2005 and the creation of the Department of Homeland Security.

Republicans say similar clauses were included in past resolutions, and in 2002 lawmakers unanimously approved a resolution that said President Bush had signed "numerous laws providing additional resources for the overseas effort against terrorism, as well as additional tools" for U.S. law enforcement.

In 2004, the House voted 406-16 for a resolution that championed "innovative programs" that have secured the nation and applauded the capture of Saddam Hussein. Neither resolution mentioned the Patriot Act.

Mrs. Pelosi asked the speaker to model the resolution after last year's version, which said the House would take "whatever actions necessary to identify, intercept and disrupt terrorists."

Republicans balked at the Democratic requests.

"Democrats seem to care more about the November elections and risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on 9/11 than work with us in a bipartisan way," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

House Leaders Spar Over Resolution Honoring Victims Of Sept. 11 (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans and Democrats can't agree on how to honor the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks five years after the tragedy pulled the nation together.

The House of Representatives is scheduled to vote next week on a resolution marking the anniversary, but Republican Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California are at a standoff over the wording of the nonbinding, purely symbolic legislation.

As drafted, the resolution mourns the nearly 3,000 victims, condemns terrorists, praises the military and law enforcement, and vows vigilance.

But it also lauds several Republican-led legislative moves that Democrats opposed or sought to modify: the USA Patriot Act, which gives law enforcement officials tools to combat terrorism that some Democrats think infringe too much on civil liberties; and the House's border security bill, now stalled, which would charge illegal immigrants as felons.

Democrats want Republicans to strike those and other references to legislation. But, as of Friday, Republicans were holding firm.

"By slashing out all those programs, they stay on message saying, `This is a do-nothing Congress.' That's why they want the recognition of those programs out," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "I think the American people should be very concerned that Democrats are even trying to politically use the 9/11 resolution as a way to gain the majority in November."

DOJ_NMG_0061208

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider countered that Republicans loaded the resolution with controversial references to put Democrats in a box: By signing on to the resolution, they'd be giving those programs their tacit support, but by withholding their names from a 9/11 resolution, they'd be taking a risky political stand.

"It is the worst kind of political posturing on a day that should be sacrosanct," Crider said. "The fifth anniversary of 9/11 is a day we should commemorate with the seriousness and unity that Americans from all walks of life came together with on Sept. 11, 2001."

Unless Hastert and Pelosi reach a truce, Democrats may offer a competing resolution. Then it would be up to the Republican majority to decide whether to let them vote on it or to block it.

The House won't be able to vote on any resolution in time to mark the anniversary, as it's not in session again until Tuesday.

Five Years After 9/11: How Have Things Changed? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Since then, passenger levels have recovered and are higher than the pre-9/11 level. But changes have made traveling more cumbersome. Wait times at airports have increased because of new security measures. In August, British authorities said they foiled a plot to blow up U.S.-bound airplanes with liquid bombs, leading to a ban on passengers carrying gels or liquids on board.

The U.S. in the World: After the attacks, there was an outpouring of support from the international community. The U.S. tightened some alliances; Pakistan, for instance, received no military financing from the U.S. before the attacks, but last year got $298 million.

But while some countries remain allies in the war on terror, the U.S. has lost some support. Syria initially cooperated with the U.S., but that has "radically diminished," says Anthony Cordesman, a national security expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Polls show support for the U.S. falling in many countries; in Turkey, 12% of people in a Pew Research poll said they had a favorable opinion of the U.S. in 2006, down from 52% in 2000.

--Lauren Etter * * *

POINTS OF VIEW

"I quite frankly think the U.S. is pretty much the same place it was on Sept. 10... The goal is to fight the enemy but keep America the same as always -- and by and large it is."

-- James Carafano, senior research fellow, The Heritage Foundation

"On Sept. 12 there was this combination of a tremendous vulnerability -- a sense of vulnerability that we hadn't felt in a long, long time since Pearl Harbor perhaps -- combined with a tremendous sense of optimism about the ability to prevail...There's still a feeling of vulnerability because there is a recognition that we are a relatively free and open society and that at some level it is relatively easy to pull off a terrorist attack."

-- Christopher Preble, The Cato Institute

"In the larger scheme of life's problems, the idea of getting hit in your neighborhood or at your workplace is no longer the kind of urgent concern we thought it might be [after 9/11]. Part of this is the law of probability. People are starting to realize that the likelihood of anyone coming home to roost nearby is very low."

-- Michael O'Hanlon, analyst, The Brookings Institution * * *

FACTS

Since 2001 the number of student visas has declined 20%. Visas for artists, athletes and entertainers are up 2%. Still world renowned Spanish guitarist Paco de Lucia and Cuban musician Ibrahim Ferrer had to cancel U.S. concerts because they could not secure a visa.

Red, orange, yellow, blue and green are the colors of the government's post-9/11 threat-warning system. The federal level has never dropped below yellow or "elevated." It has been raised to orange or "high" eight times. It has been raised to red or "severe" once.

The U.S. government's Rewards for Justice program has paid out more than $62 million to people credited with giving information leading to the prevention of a terrorist attack or the capture of a terrorist. There are 29 people on the government's list of "Wanted Terrorists."

The U.S. sponsors more than 50,000 hours of television and radio broadcasts to the broader Middle East -- quadruple the number of hours in 2001. The U.S. budgets for international broadcasting to the Arab and Muslim world have increased 237% in 2006 from 2002.

Before 9/11, the World Trade Center was the world's fourth tallest building. Today, the world's tallest building is the Taipei 101 in Taipei.

DOJ_NMG_0061209

Of the 4,960 terrorist incidents world-wide last year, 47% occurred in Iraq, about 10% in West Bank/Gaza and 4% in Afghanistan.

Waiting For Al Qaeda (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

John Mueller has an awkward question for those of us in the terrorism industry, which is his term for the journalists, politicians, bureaucrats and assorted "risk entrepreneurs" who have alarmed America about terrorism.

For five years, we've been telling Americans that Sept. 11 changed everything. "It will always be a defining moment in our history," President Bush says in this year's Patriot Day proclamation. We declared it a harbinger of a new clash of civilizations, a global ideological struggle — World War III, in Newt Gingrich's words.

We reported intelligence estimates of thousands of Al Qaeda terrorists and supporters in "sleeper cells" in America. In May 2004, Attorney General John Ashcroft said that Al Qaeda's preparations for an attack were 90 percent complete. We braced for acts of terrorism forecast to occur during the political conventions, the presidential campaign, on Election Day, after Election Day. Through yellow and orange alerts, we kept in mind the Department of Homeland Security's warning: "Today's terrorists can strike at any place, at any time and with virtually any weapon."

So what's keeping them? That's the question raised by Mueller, a political scientist at Ohio State University, in the current issue of Foreign Affairs.

"Why," he asks, "have they not been sniping at people in shopping centers, collapsing tunnels, poisoning the food supply, cutting electrical lines, derailing trains, blowing up oil pipelines, causing massive traffic jams, or exploiting the countless other vulnerabilities that, according to security experts, could so easily be exploited?"

The Bush administration likes to take credit for stopping domestic plots, but it's hard to gauge whether these are much more than the fantasies of a few klutzes. Bush also claims that the war in Iraq has diverted terrorists' attention there, but why wouldn't global jihadists want the added publicity from attacking America at home, too? Al Qaeda's leaders threatened in 2003 to attack America — along with a half dozen other countries that haven't been attacked either.

Mueller's conclusion is that there just aren't that many terrorists out there with the zeal and the competence to attack the United States. In his forthcoming book, "Overblown," he argues that the risk of terrorism didn't increase after Sept. 11 — if anything, it declined because of a backlash against Al Qaeda, making it a smaller and less capable threat than before. But the terrorism industry has been too busy hyping Sept. 11 and several other attacks to notice.

It has found a new audience for old dangers. For more than half a century, experts have warned that terrorists could destroy a city with a weapon of mass destruction. They still might, but their failure so far suggests it isn't easy to do, and it didn't suddenly become easier on Sept. 11.

There are plenty of fighters willing to use terrorist tactics locally during civil wars and insurrections, as in Afghanistan, Iraq, Chechnya or Kashmir. But it's harder to recruit competent warriors to fight abroad, and harder for them to operate in orderly countries where the citizenry and the authorities both want to stop them.

"Outside of Afghanistan and Iraq," Mueller says, "the number of people killed around the world since Sept. 11 by groups in sympathy with Al Qaeda is not that high. These are horrible and disgusting deaths, but they're not a sign of a diabolically effective organization. The total is less than the number of Americans who drowned in bathtubs during this period."

As it is, he figures, the odds of an American being killed by international terrorism are about one in 80,000. And even if there were attacks on the scale of Sept. 11 every three months for the next five years, the odds for any individual dying would be one in 5,000.

Compared with past threats — like Communist sociopaths with nuclear arsenals — Al Qaeda's terrorists are a minor problem. They certainly don't justify the hyperbolic warnings that America's "existence" or "way of life" is in jeopardy, or that America must transform the Middle East in order to survive.

There undoubtedly will be more terrorist attacks, either from Al Qaeda or others, just as there were before 2001. Terrorists might strike Monday. There will always be homicidal zealots like Mohamed Atta or Timothy McVeigh, and some of them will succeed, terribly. But this is not a new era. The terrorist threat is still small. It's the terrorism industry that got big.

Five Years On (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

September 11, 2001, it is often said, was a day that "changed everything." Five years later, it remains to be seen whether that's really as true as it deserves to be.

DOJ_NMG_0061210

The significance of events is not always captured at the moment in which they happen: Some, like the American Revolution, grow with time; others, like the French Revolution, diminish. But the meaning of events can be instantly and enduringly obvious, or nearly so. On a cloudless September morning, 19 young Muslim men from four Arab countries combined simple means and fanatical determination to murder nearly 3,000 men and women, most of them civilians who rose that morning never imagining themselves to be at any risk. The killers aimed at famous targets in two great cities, a spectacle for the world to behold. We watched from our offices across the street from the World Trade Center, and every day we gaze at the pit they left behind.

Part of the tragedy is that this wasn't their first strike. Similar deeds by people of similar beliefs had been committed before against American targets, albeit not on U.S. soil. The attacks of 9/11 exposed not just the flaws in airline security but, far more important, our failure to comprehend the nature and scale of the threat we were facing.

HOT TOPIC

Five Years After 9/11: How Have Things Changed?1

Osama bin Laden had declared war on us years earlier, but we insisted on seeing him as a small menace, not unlike Abu Nidal and the terrorists who had hijacked planes or killed Israelis over the previous decades. However, bin Laden is above all a man of ambition, not grievance, and his ambition is to re-establish an Islamic Caliphate after his own fashion, one that can destroy every trace of what the West represents within its own sphere and, someday, in ours, too. * * *

So it seemed to us on September 12, 2001, when we wrote in this column that the attacks intended to "prove that freedom and democracy are not after all the wave of the future." We added that "we can honor yesterday's dead by rallying our diplomatic, moral, financial and as necessary military resources to ensure that that purpose is convincingly defeated."

Today, there is less confusion than before about al Qaeda's purposes, particularly after its vengeful turn on fellow Muslims in Casablanca, Riyadh, Amman and Baghdad. But there remains a great deal of doubt about our own purposes. There is doubt whether the methods employed by the Bush Administration to defeat al Qaeda have worked, or been won at too high a moral and diplomatic price, or backfired by giving would-be jihadis fresh reasons to hate us. There is also too much doubt whether broadening the focus of the war to rogue regimes hasn't been a colossal distraction. And there is a deeper, creeping doubt whether the goal of "convincingly defeating" our enemies is even plausible.

So it's worth taking stock of what has -- and hasn't -- been achieved in five years. We presume that bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman Zawahiri, are alive, probably in the Pakistani hinterland. But we know that Mohammed Atef, the mastermind of the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in East Africa, was killed in Afghanistan in an American air strike. We know that Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri, one of the masterminds of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole, is in U.S. custody, as is Abu Zubaydah, who allegedly planned the failed millennium attacks. We know the U.S. captured Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the al Qaeda operations chief and mastermind of September 11, as well as his successor, Abu Farraj al-Libbi. We know the U.S. killed al-Libbi's senior deputies, Haithem al Yemeni and Abu Hamza Rabia. We know that Midhat Mursi, author of al Qaeda's explosives manual, is dead.

This is not an exhaustive list. And while we do not know what proportion of al Qaeda's senior ranks are dead or in jail, Zawahiri must write letters to associates to find out whether his messages have aired on al-Jazeera. Al Qaeda has spawned imitators and affiliates, which trade on its radical infamy. But the ability of bin Laden and Zawahiri to plan and execute terrorism seems to have been massively degraded, and it shows in the fact that five years later there has been no major terrorist attack in the U.S., nor any, anywhere, comparable in scale to the attacks of that day.

Nobody likes to tempt fate, so it's only natural that our political leaders would not advertise this fact too loudly. But at least it should temper the criticism of those who claim that the U.S. policy of aggressively interrogating suspects has yielded no credible information, a point President Bush finally got round to making this week. And it is a strong rebuttal to the argument that, by invading Iraq, the Administration lost focus on the terrorist threat and made America less safe.

The war in Iraq is alternately criticized as a major strategic blunder, something the U.S. should never have done in the first place; or as a tactical fiasco, a worthy enterprise incompetently executed. We would have more sympathy with the second argument if the history of all warfare were not a (retrospective) study in far greater "incompetence," from Grant's Wilderness campaign to the needless slaughter of Marines at Peleliu. We've cited many of the Administration's mistakes over the last four years, going back even before the war to its (largely the CIA's) reluctance to trust and work with all but its own favored Iraqi exiles. But these columns aren't about to support a war only to back away when things get rough. The mistakes in Iraq at least have some hope of being corrected.

The deeper Iraq argument is that the U.S. should never have gone to war against a country that "posed no threat," a point supposedly proved by the failure to discover weapons of mass destruction. In fact, Charles Duelfer's definitive post-mortem report on Iraq's WMD painted a different picture: Saddam maintained weapons programs that were in "material breach" of U.N.

DOJ_NMG_0061211

resolutions. And he intended to reconstitute his former programs as soon as the sanctions regime was lifted, something he was well on his way to accomplishing thanks to the global bribery scheme that was the U.N.'s Oil for Food program.

But the notion that Saddam posed no threat beyond WMD capabilities is wrong, and in hindsight the Administration miscalculated politically by emphasizing WMD as it did. That error owed largely to the pressure it was under to take the case for war to the U.N., where Saddam's violations of his disarmament obligations served as an actionable cause of war. But the real WMD in Iraq's arsenal was Saddam himself, the threat he posed to his people and his neighbors, and the misbegotten conceits he inspired in a region hungry for a new Saladin or Nasser, someone to redeem Arab honor by standing up to the West.

This was the boil that most needed to be lanced if there was to be any hope that the societies from which the September 11 hijackers hailed could be meaningfully reformed. Saddam in power meant U.S. forces in Saudi Arabia, a chief grievance in bin Laden's fatwa against America. It also meant $25,000 checks for the families of Palestinian suicide bombers, and the costly maintenance of the no-fly zones and the preservation of U.N. sanctions, which the war's current critics once told us were the cause of thousands of Iraqi deaths from malnutrition and the dearth of medical supplies.

Saddam in power meant that virtually no other Arab problem, such as Syria's occupation of Lebanon, could be addressed, let alone resolved. In short, Saddam in power locked the Arab world -- and America's involvement in it -- into shapes and patterns that were the source of so many of its political and social ills, and that could only be broken by his removal. And, to a remarkable extent, that is just what happened in the two years after the war.

Consider where things stood a year ago on the fourth anniversary of September 11. Israel had just withdrawn from the Gaza Strip, a territorial concession never achieved throughout the seven years of the Oslo peace process. The Palestinian Authority was democratically led by Mahmoud Abbas, not Hamas. Lebanon had just been freed from 29 years of Syrian occupation, and the Syrian regime of Bashar Assad was facing a potentially regime-changing investigation into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had gone to Cairo to demand political change; Mr. Mubarak responded by agreeing to a multiparty presidential vote that, while rigged, was a step forward from the previous uncontested referenda on his rule. And despite terrible violence and plenty of second-guessing by the global commentariat, Iraqis freely ratified the most liberal and democratic national constitution in Arab history. * * *

The last year has seen some setbacks, which go far to explain the overglum mood surrounding the current anniversary. Yet it is by no means clear that those failures owe to some flaw in the overall U.S. strategy as opposed to tactical mistakes and the simple fact that we are fighting a determined, resourceful enemy that is itself adapting to our moves. The victory for Hamas, the troubles in Iraq, the uncertain outcome in the recent war in Lebanon, and above all the renewed aggression of Iran all pose major challenges. Mr. Bush's party may pay a price for those setbacks in November, though the President has begun to fight back, as he shows nearby.

We're glad he is doing so, because the great challenge for this presidency is to remind Americans that the threat they face is undimmed even as the events of September 11 recede in memory. The costs of responding to 9/11 have been many, and the temptation is strong to think we can withdraw from Iraq, or from the larger Middle East without consequence to our own security. The abiding lesson of that day five years ago is that this is a dangerous illusion.

On September 12, 2001, we wrote with some optimism about the "resilience" of modern industrial democracies. That resilience has been proved time and again the past five years, and the challenge is to prove it again for the next five, or 50, if that's what victory requires.

Thatcher To Attend Sept 11 Memorial Events In Washington (AFP)

AFP, September 9, 2006

Former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher will attend events in Washington to mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, her office said.

The 80-year-old baroness will on September 11 attend a church service and a commemorative ceremony with US Vice President Dick Cheney, who invited her to Washington.

The ceremony will take place at 8:46 am (12:46 GMT), the precise time when members of the Al-Qaeda terror network crashed the first hijacked plane into the World Trade Centre in New York.

Afterwards Thatcher will attend a ceremony at the State Department, where she will meet US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The trip will be Thatcher's first to the United States since she attended the funeral of former US secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger in April.

Thatcher was Britain's prime minister from 1979 to 1990 and formed a close partnership with then US president Ronald Reagan, who died in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0061212

She holds the presidential medal of freedom, one of the two highest United States civilian awards.

US's Rice To Thank Canada For Support After September 11 Attacks (AFP)

AFP, September 9, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will mark the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001 attacks in Halifax, Canada, the State Department said.

"Secretary Rice wanted to go to Canada on September 11th as a way of thanking Canada and the Canadian people for all that they did on that day," said department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"On September 11th, America closed its air space, and the Canadian government and the Canadian people took in many, many flights and many, many people who were essentially stranded because they could not continue flying into American air space," he said.

After the attacks on New York and Washington by four teams of airplane hijackers, Canada received 224 flights carrying 33,000 passengers which were diverted away from the United States.

"That was just an extraordinary act of trust, generosity and kindness in a moment of need, and Secretary Rice wanted to travel to Canada to thank the Canadian government and the Canadian people for those extraordinary act," McCormack said.

Travelling with Canadian foreign Minister Peter MacKay, on September 12 Rice will visit Pictou, MacKay's electoral district in Nova Scotia province.

Where's The Clarity? (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, September 9, 2006

Terrible as they are, wars can be clarifying events. Like thunderstorms, they purge the diplomatic air. They force people to take sides and, if they are total wars, they leave one victor standing. This is what happened during World Wars I and II (the latter being mainly an extension of the former) and the cold war. In the end, fascism and totalitarianism were vanquished—with the exception of a few redoubts, like North Korea—freedom was left the sole victor and America was seen as its champion. George W. Bush would have us view the "war on terror," which turns five years old on Monday, in this light as well. "This is the great ideological struggle of the 21st century—and it is the calling of our generation," the president said this week in a dramatic rendezvous-with-destiny speech timed to the 9/11 anniversary. "Freedom is once again contending with the forces of darkness and tyranny"—the terrorists who would seek to impose what he called a "totalitarian Islamic empire."

The president's opponents say the war on terror is nothing at all like the last century's biggest conflicts. With a crucial midterm election approaching, Democrats in particular are eager to portray what Bush calls the war on terror's "central front"—Iraq—not as another glorious fight against totalitarianism but as another Vietnam, a quagmire unrelated to the fight against Al Qaeda. Vietnam, of course, was not a clarifying war, at least for Americans. Indeed the war provoked so much confusion and self-doubt about U.S. policy that its impact is still felt today, 31 years after the fall of Saigon. To Bush's critics, the "Vietnam Syndrome"—a casualty-shy reluctance to use force—has now been replaced by a parallel, and equally paralyzing, "Iraq Syndrome."

The truth is that, year by year, the so-called GWOT (global war on terrorism) has become less and less clear in its direction and goals—and less and less like any previous war. What began as a crystal-clear fight against a small, self-contained group of murderers has become a kind of murky, open-ended World War III in which the identity of the enemy is less certain and our allies seem to grow less reliable. While at the beginning no one had any use for Al Qaeda—Americans, Russians, Chinese, Europeans, Arab regimes—now that the Bush administration has expanded the war to include all terrorists and their "state sponsors," very few nations seem to be buying fully into the U.S. vision. Many of those who hated Al Qaeda, for example, never accepted the link to Saddam Hussein's Iraq. And some of these countries are ambivalent at best about making Hizbullah and Hamas (both of which disavow any link to Al Qaeda), or their sponsors, Iran and Syria, part of the same struggle. "We're a nation at war," Bush says. But we all must now ask: with whom exactly?

In two remarkable speeches delivered in Washington this week, the president sought to recover some of the clarity of 9/11, returning the war on terror to its origins. On Tuesday he restored Osama bin Laden to his place as America's central bogeyman—after a three-year period of barely mentioning his name—and compared him to Hitler and Lenin. The next day, the president brought families of 9/11 victims into the East Room for a dramatic speech in which he acknowledged, for the first time, the existence of the CIA's secret prison program and an "alternative set of procedures" used to interrogate key Al Qaeda suspects rounded up in the early years after 9/11. He made a vigorous case that "questioning the detainees in this program has given us information that has saved innocent lives by helping us stop new attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0061213

He also pointed to his most signal success: the lack of a follow-up assault on the U.S. homeland in the five years since 9/11 (except for the still-unsolved anthrax attacks of that fall). Both speeches were political masterstrokes, especially coming two months before an election that has Republicans in serious trouble over questions of the president's competence and credibility. The problem is that, measured against the policies the president has pursued over the past five years, Bush's rhetoric does not describe the war on terror we have come to know.

On Tuesday, speaking before the Military Officers Association of America, Bush exhorted his listeners to take bin Laden's rants seriously, reminding them of what happened when the world powers of the day ignored "an exiled lawyer" (Vladimir Lenin) and a "failed painter" (Adolf Hitler) who laid out their bloody, revolutionary programs early on. "Bin Laden and his terrorist allies have made their intentions as clear as Lenin and Hitler before them," Bush said. "The question is: Will we listen? Will we pay attention to what these evil men say?" Bush declared that "we will not rest ... until this threat to civilization has been removed."

In light of the facts that have since been confirmed, this description does not fully account for Bush's own conduct over the past five years. Bin Laden, after all, didn't just write a pamphlet on 9/11—he carried out his plans, directing his henchmen to kill thousands of Americans on their own soil. It was a moment of absolute, terrifying clarity: in retribution for 9/11, according to every Western code of justice and honor, bin Laden should have been relentlessly pursued until he was dead or captured. Yet we now know that the Bush administration allowed itself to be distracted from that task as the months passed after 9/11. Gary Berntsen, the CIA officer in charge of the operation, told me a year ago that he knows for certain that bin Laden was trapped in Al Qaeda's Tora Bora hideaway after the fall of Afghanistan's Taliban rulers in late 2001. As Berntsen records in his 2005 book "Jawbreaker," bin Laden told his followers, "Forgive me," and apologized for getting them pinned down by the Americans. But Bernsten says, the Pentagon refused to put in the necessary troops.

This account is corroborated by Bernsten's then boss, CIA senior officer Henry Crumpton (now the State Department's counterterrorism chief), who made clear to Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney that America's Afghan and Pakistan allies couldn't take out bin Laden. "We're going to lose our prey if we're not careful," Crumpton told Bush and Cheney, according to Ron Suskind's new book, "The One Percent Doctrine." Numerous accounts have also established that, shortly after Tora Bora, the president began diverting Special Forces troops, Predator drones and other resources involved in the hunt for bin Laden to Iraq.

Yes, Bush sought this week to clarify his broader strategic goals in the war on terror. "The experience of September the 11th made clear, in the long run, the only way to secure our nation is to change the course of the Middle East," he said. And that may well be true. But what about the short run and the medium run? The chief culprit of 9/11 and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are still free. And Bush administration officials concede, anonymously, that there is a good chance the two will never be caught, especially now that Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, with the administration's blessing, has pledged not to continue troop incursions into the tribal areas where bin Laden and Zawahiri may be hiding.

We also know—again, these are now historical facts, not opinions—that while Bush resorts to the rally-the-citizenry (or electorate) rhetoric of World War II and the cold war, he has sought to tax-cut his way to victory, driving up record budget deficits, underfunding the U.S. Army and quashing all talk of a draft. Even in Iraq, the Army is desperately trying to stabilize Baghdad with one brigade of Stryker fighting vehicles because there are no others that are ready. "We need several brigades, but we don't have them," a senior military official told me this week, citing the Army's pleas for emergency funding. "Since 9/11, for all the rhetoric about us being involved in a global war, there's been nothing of the kind," historian Robert Dallek, who has written of the national mobilization efforts during World War II and the cold war, told me. "It's generally been business as usual."

Then there is overarching issue of whether Iraq ever should have been part of the war on terror at all—or, instead, whether it made the GWOT hopelessly murky. In his speech Tuesday, Bush called Iraq the "capital" of Al Qaeda's would-be totalitarian caliphate and said it "is the central battlefield where the outcome of this struggle will be decided." But military experts now say that the continuing violence since the killing of Abu Mussab al-Zarqawi, the top foreign terrorist in Iraq, last June is evidence that the insurgency there is mainly indigenous, largely unconnected to the larger war on terror. "This proves how small a part foreign fighters play in Iraq," says John Arquilla, an intelligence expert at the Naval Postgraduate School. "There's a real Lewis Carroll quality to all of this rhetoric, where what is up is down, and what is right is wrong. The president says that Iraq is the central front. But the president also says Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11. A visitor from Mars just entering into this debate would surely be struck by the contradictions in these statements. And then to invoke bin Laden as a bête noire now while closing down Alec Station [the CIA's bin Laden monitoring group, which was disbanded earlier this year] seems a contradiction as well."

Five years on, little of the GWOT conforms any longer to Bush's clarifying rhetoric. The president argued again this week, as he has tirelessly, that "the lack of freedom" in the Middle East helped create September 11. No one doubts that more freedom and democracy will help to cure the pathologies of the Arab world. But the truth is that the group that orchestrated 9/11 grew up in Afghanistan—not part of the Middle East—during the anti-Soviet jihad of the 1980s. It was conceived by Arab men who'd left their countries and formed European- and Asian-based cells. Their philosophy, mainly based on ultra-orthodox Salafism, was spread by a nominal American ally, Saudi Arabia, underwritten by petrodollars supplied by oil-addicted Westerners. Initially at least, the "Islamo-fascism" that the Bush team refers to had little to do with the mainstream struggle in Islam. It also remains a distinct phenomenon from Hamas and Hizbullah, or the Muslim Brotherhood movement in Egypt.

DOJ_NMG_0061214

Some scholars of Islam, such as Gilles Kepel, also argue that extremist Islamist groups were shaped at least as much by European fascist and communist influences as by Arab dictatorships. In an interview, a senior administration official who helped draft Bush's latest "national strategy for combating terrorism"—also released this week—could not cite any authoritative studies linking the rise of democracy with the defeat of terrorism, other than to say, "I'm personally a huge fan of John Stuart Mill." "There's a real disconnect here," says Princeton scholar G. John Ikenberry. "They've come to this without serious thought about how you get democracy and what its impact is."

A parallel lack of clarity led to the interrogation scandal that Bush sought to put behind him Wednesday. The president announced the transfer of CIA-held Al Qaeda suspects to Pentagon custody and the prospect of future trials, in what a senior administration official described as a concession to June's Supreme Court ruling that held Bush's enemy-combatant detention policies to be unconstitutional. In his big speech, Bush defended these policies as a way of applying his broad doctrine of pre-emption of terror to the interrogation room, justified by the need to "break" often zealous and uncooperative Al Qaeda prisoners for clues on forthcoming plots and insights into the global terrorist network. The president was eager to describe how a daisy chain of intelligence breaks from the 14 men he named this week led to the exposure of Al Qaeda's anthrax program and numerous averted attacks, including a "planned strike" on U.S. Marines at Camp Lemonier in Djibouti, another one on the U.S. Consulate in Karachi "using car bombs and motorcycle bombs" and "a plot to hijack passenger planes and fly them into Heathrow or the Canary Wharf in London."

Most Americans, frankly, wouldn't have much of a problem if someone like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind behind 9/11, was beaten to within an inch of his life in some dark room somewhere (which is probably what happened after he was captured in May 2003). But the exposure of the two-year-old interrogations scandal—culminating in an embarrassing series of stories about the CIA secret prison program—was also a direct result of the administration's conflation of the original "war on terror" with the counterinsurgency war in Iraq. As detailed in several Pentagon investigations, a handful of techniques that might be legally and even morally justifiable against a handful of true bad guys mentioned by Bush on Wednesday came to be used indiscriminately against many more detainees, a number perhaps running into the thousands in Iraq. What began as a carefully controlled experiment in new techniques used to ratchet up the pressure on resistant Al Qaeda leaders beginning with Abu Zubaida in the spring of 2002—handled by a small number of skilled operatives working for the CIA—came to be used by ill-trained guards at Abu Ghraib prison. If this conflation hadn't occurred, it's far less likely there would have been a scandal of this proportion in the first place.

Finally, another thing that hasn't been clarified five years on is the politics of the war on terror. And just two months from a critical election in which Bush won't be running, but his legacy will be at stake, the president has once again proved he is a master of the game, painting the congressional Democrats as defeatist. This debate, which we will hear a lot more about in coming weeks, is also very different from previous wars. During World War II and, to a lesser extent, the cold war, politicians made a conscious, painstaking effort to bridge party lines, which were every bit as viciously partisan as today. Democrat Harry Truman and Republican Dwight Eisenhower, says John Arquilla, "crafted grand strategy that everybody in America, right and left, accepted for decades. They knew they needed broad support. We don't have that now. We're trying to wage the war on terror with the support of only part of the American people."

Perhaps the only thing that is clear any longer is that the war on terror will continue for a long time to come. And so will the war of words over the war on terror.

Arrest Evidence Stands In Padilla Terror Case (LAT)

By Vanessa Blum

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

MIAMI — A federal judge has refused to throw out evidence related to the 2002 arrest of alleged Al Qaeda operative Jose Padilla at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

Rejecting defense lawyers' requests, U.S. Magistrate Stephen Brown said in a pair of rulings that jurors should be allowed to consider the terror suspect's statements prior to his arrest in May 2002, as well as items in his possession at the time including about $10,000 in cash, a cellphone and a phone book containing numbers for alleged Al Qaeda contacts. Brown's rulings, signed Tuesday, became public Friday.

After his arrest, Padilla, now 35, was designated an enemy combatant by President Bush and held in military custody for 3 1/2 years before being transferred to Miami to face terrorism-related charges. His trial is set to begin in January.

DOJ_NMG_0061215

Padilla is charged with providing material support and resources to terrorists. Government officials had said he wanted to detonate a radioactive bomb on U.S. soil.

Defense lawyers argued Padilla's arrest was illegally based on information obtained from alleged terrorists held overseas, at least one of whom claimed to have been tortured.

Anything their client said to the FBI should be thrown out because he was not informed of his rights to remain silent and to be represented by an attorney, the lawyers said.

Brown said such warnings were unnecessary because the agents questioned Padilla before placing him in custody.

As for the torture allegations, the judge said even if true, defense lawyers failed to prove that the FBI agent applying for Padilla's arrest warrant knew or should have known about them.

The rulings come after U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke, who oversees the case, threw out a main charge against Padilla and his co-defendants because it duplicated allegations in other charges.

Looking For Agreement On Tribunals For Detainees (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — The main Senate Republican in talks with the White House over bills to establish tribunals for terror suspects said Friday that a small set of problems divided the two sides and that they would negotiate through the weekend in an effort to reach a compromise.

The senator, John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said "90 percent" of the proposal that the White House submitted this week reflected a proposal that he and other Republican senators who have taken the lead on the question had drafted over the summer.

The senators, Mr. Warner, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona, maintain that they can work with the administration to resolve the differences, but they showed few signs of yielding on the disputed questions. "The determination simply has to be made on what flexibility the administration wants to show," Mr. Warner said.

The disputed issues are the same ones that the Supreme Court cited in striking down a system of tribunals that the administration established after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. They include whether suspects can be excluded from their trials and what types of evidence would be admissible.

"I feel strongly about this," Mr. Warner said. "I want to be supportive of the president."

But as a lawyer and former Navy secretary, he said, "I feel this bill has got to pass what I call the federal court muster, so this thing doesn't get tangled up in the courts again and go all the way to the Supreme Court, and then down she goes again."

Mr. Warner said that his committee would have its legislation ready for a vote next week, whether or not the White House agrees to all its provisions. He predicted that the Senate would quickly pass it.

"We don't need a lot of time,'' he said. "We all know what the issues are. I don't see a prolonged debate."

There is no certainty that the committee bill will reach the Senate floor if there is no deal with the White House. The Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, has said he will decide next week whether to bring the committee bill to the floor or bring up the version that President Bush proposed on Wednesday.

House Republican leaders have said they intend to pass the White House version.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the tribunals the White House established violated the Constitution and international law by denying terror suspects basic human and legal rights.

Chiefly, the court objected to excluding suspects from trials and allowing hearsay and evidence obtained under coercion. It faulted the administration system to have a military lawyer oversee the proceedings, as opposed to a judge, as in military courts-martial. The court added that the jury size was too small.

Mr. Bush's new proposal allows for a military judge and expands the jury from a minimum of three people to five, the minimum the court said was required under courts-martial, with 12 for cases involving the death penalty.

The administration proposal would allow hearsay and evidence obtained by coercion, if the judge rules it was probative and reliable.

The plan would also deny the accused the right to see and therefore respond to classified evidence that the jury could use to convict him, although the defendant could be allowed a summary of it.

That provision, Mr. Graham said this week, would be struck down by a court "in 30 seconds."

Mr. Graham in particular, a former military lawyer and a military reserve judge, has been inclined to follow the advice of the military lawyers on the shape of the tribunals.

DOJ_NMG_0061216

Mr. McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, has argued that any system would set a precedent for how other countries try American troops and that passing a system that excluded the defendant opened up Americans to being tried in kangaroo courts elsewhere.

A spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross in Washington said Friday that it would visit the 14 new detainees being held at the naval base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, as soon as it received permission from the Defense Department.

An official with the Red Cross in Washington, Simon Schorno, said: "We do not have a date yet. But as soon as we get confirmation, we will undertake a visit as soon as possible."

Mr. Schorno said his organization had a team of about 10 people on standby. The team, which includes officials in the Washington office, will draw Red Cross employees from elsewhere to work as translators.

He said the first order of business would be to interview the detainees "and give them the means to contact their families through Red Cross messages."

The Red Cross, Mr. Schorno added, will assess the detention conditions in the undisclosed locations where the inmates had been held and now at Guantánamo.

By agreement with the United States government, the Red Cross will, in exchange for access, not make public its views on the conditions of confinement and treatment.

Mr. Schorno said his organization might announce the fact of the visit when it occurred because of the wide public interest in it.

A Solution For Trials (WP)

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

IN SENDING legislation to Congress to authorize military trials at Guantanamo Bay, President Bush appears to be hoping that, with an election just around the corner, Congress will not have the stomach to deny him the latitude he demands both on the trials themselves and on larger questions of the treatment of detainees. But quietly, over the past few weeks, a trio of Republican senators -- Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John McCain (Ariz.) -- has put together a remarkably good alternative bill on the subject. The draft balances profound and difficult interests thoughtfully and with considerable respect both for the uniqueness of the current conflict and for the American tradition of fair trials and due process. It is, in almost all respects, superior to the president's proposal.

The Senate draft would require that military commissions function much like regular courts martial. Commissions would not be permitted to convict on the basis of classified material the accused cannot see, and evidence obtained by torture or abuses just short of it would not be admissible. At the same time, the bill would give the administration needed flexibility on the use of hearsay evidence and on authenticating evidence collected in the rough and tumble of warfare. Finally, it would also make clear that commissions can try alleged conspiracies -- a point about which several justices had raised questions when the Supreme Court decided the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld this summer.

The draft, which is still in flux, is not perfect. The jurisdiction of the commissions it would create would be too broad and could sweep in people who should not face military trials. The bill also would prohibit those convicted from challenging their convictions in federal court except under a constrained appeals process. Several other provisions -- such as one giving defendants the right to represent themselves -- should be reconsidered. But these problems can be fixed. The administration's bill has more fundamental flaws -- starting with the fact that the trials themselves would deviate from the usual rules of courts martial more than necessary. In particular, while the bill bans evidence obtained by torture, it would permit the admission of evidence obtained by coercion just short of it in certain situations. It would still permit a conviction based in part on evidence the defendant has had no chance to see or rebut -- something the military's top uniformed lawyers insist is not necessary.

More troubling still, it would amend the law to limit the application in the current conflict of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions -- which prohibits cruel and degrading treatment of detainees. The administration's bill would define Common Article 3, which the Supreme Court has applied to the conflict with al-Qaeda, as requiring only what U.S. law -- the same law the administration has twisted to allow for abusive interrogations -- already requires. To top it off, the bill would strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over all pending cases involving detainees at Guantanamo, and thus any future review of trials or detentions.

President Bush is pushing aggressively for quick action on his bill. But the Senate needs to work from its own, far better, draft -- which, with relatively few changes, could provide a sound legislative basis for fair and orderly trials.

Lindsey Graham: Accused Terrorists Must See Evidence Against Them (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061217

SENECA, S.C. - Sen. Lindsey Graham said Friday that he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them.

Graham, a military lawyer who's a colonel in the Air Force Reserve, read the White House bill late Thursday evening on a plane from Washington to Greenville, S.C. He pored through the 86-page document until, on page 34, he reached a clause that would prohibit defense lawyers from sharing classified information with defendants they represent. He marked it with a red pen.

"That's the killer," the South Carolina Republican said. "I fell over when I read it."

Graham said he supports 90 percent of the bill, which Bush sent to Congress on Wednesday. But, he said, "I don't feel good about telling someone - no matter who they are - `We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why.'"

"It's a bridge too far, and it's not necessary," Graham said in an extensive interview with McClatchy Newspapers in his hometown of Seneca. "It will result in putting the (military) commissions in legal jeopardy and eroding our standing in the world community."

Graham, 51, said that every general and admiral at the top of the country's military justice system agrees that classified information can be shared with accused terrorists without jeopardizing national security.

Maj. Gen. Scott Black, the judge advocate general of the Army, told the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday: "I believe the accused should see that evidence."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has given the Armed Services Committee until Tuesday to produce a bill, Graham said. The panel's chairman, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, and Sen. John McCain share Graham's view on the handling of classified evidence, setting up a possible clash in the Senate next week.

Graham said Frist has vowed to bring Bush's bill directly to the Senate floor on Tuesday. Graham said he agrees with Frist that Congress must act soon so terrorist trials can begin at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bush called on lawmakers to pass his tribunals measure quickly so detainees can be tried. The president increased the political pressure by disclosing that 14 senior al-Qaida members, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, were being sent to Guantanamo Bay from secret CIA prisons overseas.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the Bush administration had exceeded its authority in establishing military tribunals without congressional action, prompting the need for legislation.

Senior lawyers at the White House, the Justice Department and the Pentagon argue that allowing terrorists to see classified evidence could expose how the United States has pursued al-Qaida and would put informants within the terror network in danger. But Graham said he's certain the Supreme Court would reject a law that denies accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"It would be a tragedy to take one of the masterminds of 9/11, hold them accountable, only to have the case rejected by the Supreme Court for no good reason," Graham said.

"I'm frustrated when people say we're trying to give terrorists classified information," Graham said. "Well, that's garbage. We're going to protect our classified information, and we're going to protect our methods and sources."

Graham said that if his differences with the White House can't be bridged, he's prepared to push an amendment giving accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"I think I will draft an amendment that will get majority support in the Senate, and there will be plenty of Republicans voting for it," Graham said. "I'm just predicting that we win. I don't know by what margin."

The House is set to take up tribunals legislation the week of Sept. 18.

Air Force Col. Morris Davis, who would run the Guantanamo trials, said accused terrorists will get fair trials and his corps of lawyers will work with whatever legislation Congress passes.

Davis said the 10 cases that moved forward before the Supreme Court ruling, including Hamdan's, didn't require the use of classified evidence to gain convictions.

"The world needs to see that we're giving these guys a fair trial," Davis said Friday in a telephone interview. "We want them to be open. We're going to do everything possible to declassify any evidence used in court. I don't think it's in anyone's interest to do things in secret."

Graham said it's possible to provide evidence without revealing how it was obtained.

"I don't mind giving the accused the phone conversation (transcript) of how they were plotting," he said. "But there's no need to tell them how NSA (the National Security Agency) works. There's no need to divulge confidential informants who put us on the terror trail and led us to evidence we will use to convict."

While a few other parts of Bush's measure concern Graham, they're not deal-breakers for him. The prohibition on sharing classified information, however, goes to the heart of what he said he taught Afghan military lawyers during an Air Force Reserve assignment there last month.

"The United States can't say it's a rule-of-law nation and at the same time potentially impose the death penalty on evidence never seen by the person to be put to death," Graham said.

Why Lindsey Graham Is Blocking Bush On Terror Trials (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, September 9, 2006

The GOP planned to play the national security card on Capitol Hill this election season, but they are being trumped by one of their own: South Carolina's Lindsey Graham. As they had in the last two election cycles, Republicans intended to force a series of "bad votes" for the Democrats this September, designed to make them look weak on defense and national security. Pushing through hard-line bills that would authorize President Bush's programs of domestic surveillance and terrorism tribunals, the White House and Republican leaders thought, would force Democrats either to oppose popular anti-terrorism initiatives or play a supporting role to the GOP's star turn defending the homeland.

But three Republican Senators are scuttling the party leadership's plan. Two are Senate stars — John Warner, head of the armed services committee, and John McCain, the party's frontrunner for the 2008 Presidential campaign. The third, Graham, is the youngest and most conservative. But his role may be the crucial one. As the Senate's only serving judge advocate general in the armed forces, he carries authority on the subject of military trials and he has made it clear that he will oppose any attempt by either party to turn what he calls the "legal infrastructure of the war on terror" into a campaign device.

"I hope they don't create an environment where military commissions become a political football where they push things that are just over the line," he told Time outside a Judiciary Committee mark-up on the surveillance bills. "There are too many kids that have been killed or wounded for us to play around with this. The legal infrastructure in the war on terror will be necessary for decades to come, not just for the next election, and we have an obligation to make sure that our troops have the clarity they need in fighting this war."

The biggest issue of disagreement between Graham and the White House is over rules of evidence. In its proposed rules for military tribunals, the White House wants to be able to introduce evidence that can be withheld from the defendant. The Administration wants those rules of evidence, moreover, to apply not just for alleged terrorists but for foreigners accused of conspiracy and other lesser charges. Graham and the Pentagon's leading lawyers want to allow military judgeS to make the decision whether classified evidence against detainees is important enough to the case to be shown to the defendant.

"They want to do something that is new and novel and that is very problematic," Graham says. "How can you effectively defend someone if you can't even talk to them about the case? I do not think that will survive judicial scrutiny." More important, he argues (as do Department of Defense lawyers) that restricting the rights now for even the worst of America's detainees could mean similar restrictions on the rights for America's armed forces captured in the future. "It's a bridge too far, and that's a precedent that could come back to haunt our troops," says Graham.

For now, Graham is winning. Though the White House has continued to beat the issue in speeches and press conferences, its legislation is stalled on the Hill. Democrats are doing their part, of course. Wisconsin's Russ Feingold exasperated Judiciary chairman Arlen Specter Thursday by introducing four amendments to the surveillance bill Specter had negotiated with the White House last June. The bill failed to make it out of committee and, like the military commissions bill, faces an uphill battle to reach the floor for a vote.

Graham may yet back down — he has been a key ally for the Administration on other controversial matters of detention in the past — but for now he's standing firm. "If you try to create political winners and losers this year then I think you've let those men and women on the front line of this war in the military and other agencies down," he says. "Politics will not protect us. 'Bad votes' will not protect us. What will protect us is an interrogation system that is constitutional and effective."

Linking Faces To Terror: Bush's Clever Footwork (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

NEW YORK

A lot of words have been expended on President George W. Bush these past years, many of them harsh, and in the cacophony a single thought has perhaps been overlooked: He's a pure political animal.

When an election nears, and a critical midterm congressional vote is just nine weeks away, Bush is galvanized and the traits that have won him four straight elections at state and national level re-emerge: a relentless energy, a pitiless focus, an uncanny sense of timing, an agenda-setting determination and a folksy empathy with the average American that belies his blue-blooded lineage.

DOJ_NMG_0061219

The thoroughbred has been in plain view this past week as the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks on Monday nears. A combination of this moment, whose solemnity will play to the commander- in-chief's authority, and the adrenaline of an accelerating campaign seem to have banished, for now, Bush's second-term drift.

Speech after presidential speech, day after day, has hammered on or around the theme that brought Bush his victory in 2004: terrorism and the supposed resolve of Republicans and wobbliness of Democrats before this mortal threat to America.

This being Bush, the oratory has had its risible side. We've seen the bizarre lumping together of "Lenin and Hitler" - not Stalin, but Lenin! - to exemplify the murderous menace to liberty that Bush believes Osama bin Laden and his ilk pose once more, demanding resolve rather than Chamberlain-like appeasement.

We've also been treated to a new favored presidential iteration of the threat - "Islamo-fascists" or "Islamic fascists" - an odd formulation for the loose-knit, stateless groups of vaguely like-minded anti- Western Muslim fanatics whose movement has few, if any, of the characteristics of 20th-century totalitarian systems. After all, these guys don't even wear uniforms.

But these are considerations for which Main Street has little time. Bush knows that. He wants the popular imagination to align current American military efforts in Afghanistan and Iraq with the boys wading, in freedom's name and through a hail of Nazi fire, onto the beaches of Normandy in 1944. And damn the details.

The theme is, of course, a tired one by now. Americans are a lot less receptive to it than they were two years ago. The heavy toll of Iraq and the growing difficulties of Afghanistan - not to mention expensive gasoline and an uncertain economy - have made reality harder for Bush to mold to his political ends.

But he's ingenious. His love of wrong-footing an opponent appears undiminished. Underestimating Bush's political acumen has proved costly to many a Democrat. That was illustrated this week by the most effective of his speeches, one that did introduce a new element into the election and the terrorism debate.

By bringing 14 high-level terror suspects out of secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency and into the relative open of the Guantánamo Bay detention center, and by demanding that Congress approve war-crimes trials of these men by military tribunals, Bush seemed to change the political dynamic.

He put a face to an increasingly faceless phenomenon: "terror." There, suddenly, were the visages of three senior Al Qaeda suspected operatives: Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, Ramzi bin al-Shibh, and Abu Zubaydah. They were a reminder of the successes in fighting back against those who brought murder and mayhem to America five years ago.

By detailing some of the critical intelligence gleaned from interrogations of these and other prisoners, Bush also contrived a more persuasive posing of the core question in the fight against terrorism than he has mustered in a long time.

That question is: what degree, if any, of the exceptional measures including secret prisons and interrogation so aggressive as to skirt the borders of torture was - and remains - justified in trying to keep a traumatized country safe? Smart people in good faith are going to come down on different sides of that question. Two facts are indisputable. America has not been attacked since Sept. 11, 2001. And the cost to the international image of the United States, and to its self-image, of the creation of an obscure prison labyrinth beyond the rules of law and habeas corpus has been huge. The country's authority and effectiveness have thereby been diminished.

What Bush in effect did, by abruptly bringing part of a shadowy world to the surface, was to make the best possible case for his approach. He raised his game when it mattered, as he has before.

He also created an immediate political challenge for Democrats. With an anniversary - and Hollywood - refreshing memories of 9/11, they must now decide if they can afford to be seen to stand in the way of the president's proposed trials of the suspected, and now visible, authors of the attack.

That's a delicate dilemma. The Supreme Court rebuffed the proposed procedures in June, but a perception of Democratic obstinacy in delaying military tribunals for the likes of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed could carry a heavy political price.

The Democrats still have many weapons in their arsenal: the myriad fiascoes of Iraq, the simmering anger of Americans over the administration's incompetence, the global unpopularity of Bush. The president's speeches have not, for now, altered the outlook for November: a likely Democratic retaking of the House and an outside chance of Democratic control of the Senate, too.

But Bush is fighting, with a verve that is startling for a second-term president with no possibility of re- election himself. Already, he's clawed his popularity levels back into the 40s from the 30s. The last week has been a timely reminder to the Democrats: underestimate this political thoroughbred at your peril.

Judgment At Guantanamo (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

As it enacts new rules for military commissions, Congress -- as well as the public -- should keep two overriding principles in mind. One: While the jihadists detained at Guantanamo Bay must have due process of law before they can be criminally punished, they are not -- despite a billowing cloud of confused reasoning, misleading testimony and downright propaganda -- entitled, under the U.S. Constitution or relevant international law, to the same level of procedural protections enjoyed by the lawful soldiers of sovereign states. Two: The methods of warfare employed by unlawful combatants in the war on terror fully justify extraordinary trial rules.

Let's take the first issue. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the Supreme Court invalidated the Pentagon's original military commission rules, holding that they must be the same as in American courts martial. But it reached this conclusion only because of language -- requiring military commission and courts-martial procedures to be "uniform insofar as practicable" -- in the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Congress can and should change this language.

As to international law: Under the Geneva Conventions, captured enemy soldiers accused of criminal violations are entitled to courts-martial procedures only if they qualify as "lawful" or "privileged" combatants. At a minimum, this requires their association with a group that has a regular command structure, wears uniforms, carries its arms openly, and obeys the laws of war -- including the injunction against deliberate attacks on civilians. Al Qaeda and its allies do not qualify.

Thus the Guantanamo detainees are not entitled to be tried by courts martial unless Congress specifically says so. Congress should now join the president and declare explicitly that they are not so entitled. While unlawful combatants have always been considered a scourge to humanity, today they pose the greatest single threat to organized society, and every opportunity must be taken to de-legitimize them. Permitting them the same rights as honorable soldiers undercuts this goal.

With regard to the second issue -- fair trials -- it is precisely because jihadists deliberately target civilians for attack that there is a greater premium on the development and protection of intelligence sources and methods than in conventional warfare: Terrorist attacks must be prevented, not merely defeated. Consequently, the cost of exposing classified information during a public trial is far greater. Military commissions must, when necessary, permit portions of the proceedings to be closed to the public, with less restrictive evidentiary rules.

The Supreme Court approved this procedure in the leading case of Ex parte Quirin (1942), where eight German agents, including an American citizen, were tried by military commission. Here the Court accepted the trial of "unlawful" enemy combatants conducted in secret with substantially relaxed rules of evidence, and without a jury. After the war, similar rules were utilized for military commissions by all of the common law countries, including Great Britain, Canada and Australia.

These procedures are also consistent with current international norms. Both the United Nations International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda have routinely closed portions of trials (Slobodan Milosevic's trial proceedings were on many occasions closed to the public), and their rules permit the admission of "any relevant evidence . . . deem[ed] to have probative value," including hearsay. The International Criminal Court also permits closed proceedings -- to protect, among other things, "confidential or sensitive information" -- and follows highly discretionary evidentiary rules.

But can a defendant himself properly be excluded from any part of his trial, effectively keeping the identity of at least some witnesses secret? This implicates a core right of confrontation, and makes it more difficult to ensure a fair trial. However, there are a number of possible measures that can protect the defendant's interests. For example, a particular witness's identity may be hidden from the defendant, but not his lawyers. The judges may be required to discount, but not disregard, evidence that the defendant has not himself seen.

Congress should realize that, while the key test in any trial is whether the defendant has had a full and fair hearing and a meaningful opportunity to defend himself, the military and civilian justice systems can meet these goals in different ways. Also -- and despite the occasionally hysterical critics of the administration -- there is no established international law bar to keeping some evidence from the defendant in exceptional circumstances. Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions does not address the issue. It simply requires that defendants be afforded "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."

What these indispensable guarantees include are not settled in international law. In practice, U.N. criminal tribunals have permitted numerous ex parte contacts between prosecutors and judges, as well as significant limits on the defendant's right of confrontation. In the Yugoslav Tribunal, witness statements rather than live testimony have been allowed, as have depositions from other trials which the defendant's lawyers have not had the opportunity to contest.

Moreover, the Yugoslav Tribunal has also made clear, in The Prosecutor v. Tadic, that the testimony of anonymous witnesses would be permitted in exceptional circumstances. The Bush administration proposal would also permit the use of "anonymous" evidence only in exceptional circumstances. In any case, the relevant tribunal rules have changed many times over the years -- further evidencing the very unsettled state of international law in this area.

Overall, Congress should give unlawful enemy combatants their legally entitled rights -- but no more. The real choices in crafting procedures for the trial of detainees in military commissions are a matter of policy. In this regard, the president's military commissions bill carefully balances the key relevant policy imperatives -- ensuring a fair trial without undermining national security -- and yet gives unlawful enemy combatants more due process than they've ever received in history. It should be promptly enacted.

DOJ_NMG_0061221

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey, lawyers in Washington, served in the Department of Justice under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Bin Laden's Blueprint (WT)

By Claude Salhani

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Five years after the horrific September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York, the Pentagon and Pennsylvania, many Americans are still asking questions, trying to understand what happened that fateful morning, and why. And five years after the attacks, a great many unanswered questions remain.

In a speech to the nation Tuesday, President Bush tried to explain. He said Osama bin Laden had a multiphased strategy which was to have been carried out in the months and years after September 11, with the ultimate aim of reestablishing the Muslim Caliphate.

· The first stage, the president said, was to have been to expel the Americans from Iraq.

· The second stage called for establishing an Islamic authority, or emirate, which would be developed until it achieves the level of the Caliphate.

· The third stage would be to extend a jihad wave to the secular countries that border Israel.

· And the fourth stage would be a clash with Israel.

Said Mr. Bush: "We must not, and we will not, give the enemy victory in Iraq by deserting the Iraqi people."

Much in line with what the president said, the following are excerpts from a United Press International story titled "The potentate of the Super-Stan," written by this author on Sept. 19, 2001 -- only eight days after the attacks:

Like any revolution that needs to survive, Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda movement must continue to grow, or it will die. In his quest for Muslim expansion, bin Laden would like to see the "Balkanization," or in this case the Islamization, of Central Asia. Maybe Islamization is the wrong word because there is little that is Islamic about his ways, which, says Professor Akbar Ahmad, chairman of Islamic Studies at the American University's School of International Studies in Washington, D.C., "are not Islamic at all."

"What makes it worse for Muslims is that the West is equating the Taliban's un-Islamic acts with Islam. This is a double affront to Muslims," Mr. Ahmad told UPI. "The first step the West needs to undertake is to better understand Islam."

Nevertheless, bin Laden is using Islam, much like Adolf Hitler used National Socialism, and Pol Pot communism. Had he been politically active in the 1960s or 1970s, he would just as easily have adopted communism as a platform in order to propel his cause. But mix in religious fervor and any revolution becomes all the more potent, and dangerous.

"It's a very complex situation," said Mr. Ahmad. This pan-Islamic movement "may be called Taliban in one country, and it is called something else in others." Several intelligence sources say bin Laden's network extends to more than 60 countries.

The Taliban's main aim, according to Mr. Ahmad, is to "shake up the West's structure." While bin Laden and the Taliban are not openly talking about a greater Islamic entity, others, such as Al Muhajeroun, a group based in Britain, and with whom bin Laden enjoys close ties, are talking about a Caliphate.

Bin Laden's first step was to hijack Islam to fit his cause, passing himself off as a fervent religious man. That, of course, is meant to win him the support of hordes of fanatics who know little, if anything, of the Koran. On the other hand, as the chief executive officer of terror, he knows exactly what he is doing and where he wants to go.

Anyone with his mindset would clearly not be content to remain holed up in the bleak caves of Afghanistan. So the question, of course, is what next?

In order to better grasp bin Laden's long-term thinking you will need to look at a map of Central Asia.

Afghanistan, where bin Laden had set up camp, is a desolate country without much of an infrastructure, reeling under a heavy burden following years of Soviet invasion, war and a disastrous civil conflict -- a perfect place from which to launch a revolution. Much of the terrain is inaccessible, except by horseback, making the task of modern armies impossible. Just ask the Russians.

To the south and east of Afghanistan lies Pakistan, another country that sits on the fence of Muslim fundamentalism. The Taliban have warned Pakistan that siding with the United States would bring down the wrath of the Muslim world upon it.

Pakistan, an Islamic country, is in a most precarious situation. The percentage of the population that supports the fundamentalists is in question, but some analysts believe the Taliban enjoys strong support in the army and the intelligence services.

DOJ_NMG_0061222

This gives the country's ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, a very fine line to tread. It also makes him an important friend of the United States and any Western coalition.

"The situation for Pakistan is very difficult," said Mr. Ahmad. "Pakistan is between a rock and a hard place. Musharraf is sitting on a tiger," said Mr. Ahmad. "You either ride it or you are inside its belly."

With its nuclear capabilities, Pakistan would represent an ideal asset for bin Laden and the Taliban, should it fall off the fence and into their hands. Think of the consequences.

Regardless, bin Laden's next step would be to extend the reach of his Muslim fundamentalism. Tajikistan, to the northeast, Uzbekistan to the immediate north and Turkmenistan to the northwest -- all three are former Soviet republics with whom Afghanistan shares a border and a common religion.

Besides geographic expansion, giving them greater power in numbers (a combined population of more than 35 million), these countries offer a wide range of natural resources. Turkmenistan borders the Caspian Sea, a short hop to Azerbaijan, another former Soviet republic, and a Muslim country. Given that scenario, the new Muslim empire, or Caliphate, governed by bin Laden or the Taliban would encircle Iran, itself a Muslim nation, also rich in oil and other natural resources.

Look at the map again and see the implications for the rest of the oil-rich Arabian Gulf. Iraq, Kuwait, Bahrain, the Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Oman are only a small step and a revolution away. Remember the old domino effect theory much feared by the West -- especially the United States -- during the Vietnam War?

Now look at the map again; we are back in the Middle East. Palestine, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, North Africa and sub-Saharan Africa are the natural extension for bin Laden's Caliphate.

Think this is an unbelievable scenario? It was done a few centuries ago. Bin Laden is far too astute to content himself with the caves of Afghanistan. Read between the lines of his communiques and the picture will become much clearer.

Claude Salhani is international editor for United Press International.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Urges Congress On Security Gaps (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

The nation's homeland security chief urged Congress on Friday to approve plans to better protect seaports and chemical plants from terrorists — or risk another attack on the scale of 9/11.

In a speech outlining public protections the government has taken since Sept. 11, 2001, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff also rebuked critics who have resisted stepped-up safeguards that might be costly or inconvenient.

"That kind of backsliding runs directly contrary to the lessons of 9/11," Chertoff told an audience of hundreds at Georgetown University. He was referring to critics, including lawmakers, of plans to require tamper-resistant driver's licenses and border-crossing cards that some consider too costly.

"If we had it five years ago, there would not have been a 9/11," Chertoff said, noting that nearly all the 9/11 hijackers had fake ID cards. "God help us if we don't take the steps to put into place as soon as we can to prevent another 9/11."

Approving tougher security measures at ports would "be a fitting tribute to the fifth anniversary" of 9/11, Chertoff said. And if Congress gives Homeland Security authority to regulate chemical facilities, "we will implement it promptly," he said. "That will raise security for Americans all over this country."

The Senate is considering port security legislation, which lawmakers are pushing to win full congressional approval by the end of the month. But plans to let the Homeland Security Department regulate the chemical industry are stalled.

House Democrats, too, faulted the Republican-controlled Congress for failing to close security gaps highlighted by the 9/11 Commission earlier this year. The commission gave Congress and the Bush administration several failing grades for remaining vulnerabilities that could be exploited by terrorists.

"We created the 9/11 Commission to ensure that our nation was never left unprepared again," said Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, D-Miss., top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee. "Five years after 9/11, it is time to move forward and do the right thing."

Airport Screening Technology Developed (AP-Y)

By Scott Lindlaw

AP, September 9, 2006

At the airport check-in of tomorrow, "getting through security" should take 30 seconds.

DOJ_NMG_0061223

Passengers breeze through a series of scanners that probe for explosives, weapons, even drugs. Shoes stay on feet, laptops in cases. A machine confirms that a bottle of wine is wine, and not a disguised cocktail of bomb ingredients.

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks prompted a clampdown at the nation's airports and a new era of aggravation at security checkpoints. They also accelerated a race to develop better screening technology, research that has advanced with each thwarted terrorism plot.

Some of these devices are already snooping your luggage as part of a 2002 congressional mandate that all checked baggage be scrutinized for explosives, but technical glitches and funding problems stand in the way of other technologies.

Key questions remain: Are these ready to handle thousands of passengers per hour, and their belongings?

"Some things are imminently deployable. Some things are further off," said Steve Hill, spokesman for GE Security, the unit of General Electric Co. that makes transportation security equipment. "We are not light years off."

Although one futuristic device known as the "puffer" already is in use at San Francisco International and 36 other airports, the government halted its continued rollout recently because of concerns about reliability. The Transportation Security Administration declined to elaborate.

Critics also question whether the Bush administration is investing enough, even as it spent nearly $1 billion in fiscal 2006 on explosive-detection equipment for checked luggage and checkpoint screening.

TSA and the Department of Homeland Security have repeatedly failed to spend tens of millions of dollars that Congress earmarked for new airport security equipment.

In 2003, TSA cut most of its $75 million research budget to try to address a deficit. Its research office was later consolidated into DHS's research arm, which has failed to spend $200 million from past years, leading lawmakers to rescind the money this summer.

"The TSA is groping around, moving money," said Rep. Peter DeFazio of Oregon, a senior Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee. "They don't have enough money to have enough employees, and they can't buy new equipment."

Even as the recent British terror plot was unfolding, Homeland Security quietly tried to take away $6 million that was supposed to be spent this year developing new technology for detecting explosives.

There will never be enough money or improvements in technology, said Richard Lanza, senior research scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"We're always faced with this unpleasant and nasty fact: people are going to come up with new explosives which won't be detected by this," Lanza said. "You're just trying to make it harder for the bad guys."

Among the newer technologies, the puffer is a tall, clear cylinder that looks like a Star Trek transporter. Passengers chosen largely at random are hit with quick blasts of air — not quite enough to ruffle the hair — to dislodge trace particles of explosives or narcotics from a passenger's skin and clothing. An instant microscopic analysis determines whether the passenger has been exposed to illicit substances.

In the future, luggage will be "sniffed" for minute traces of explosives or bombarded with neutrons, subjecting it to CT scans, which differs from traditional x-rays in that they take hundreds of pictures of an object from a variety of angles.

Passengers at San Francisco's international terminal can glimpse a "Checkpoint of the Future" as envisioned by GE Security.

The company has set up camp next to the checkpoint of today, a working security zone where plastic bins clatter and passengers shuffle through metal detectors. The GE "lab" is a nonworking checkpoint where the company is researching and tweaking its gear in hopes of winning government approvals and ironing out technical glitches.

Much of that gear is mock-up equipment where company officials can demonstrate the dream: a half-minute process, starting with a device that scans a passenger's finger for explosives and drug particles. A conveyor belt would use CT to peer at carry-on items. A body scan would look through clothing for knives, guns and bombs. A shoe scanner would end the need to kick off footwear.

GE Security said it has spent more than $100 million over the last five years in developing next-generation aviation screening technologies and products.

The government is particularly interested in developing the ability to quickly analyze what's inside liquid containers following the recent discovery of a London-based plot to bring down airliners using explosives disguised as common household items, said Jennifer Peppin, a spokeswoman for the TSA's Western region.

Rapiscan Systems Neutronics and Advanced Technologies of Santa Clara is trying to perfect a device that can peer into bottles, books and shoes and identify explosives inside. The scanner, slightly larger than a tipped-over phone booth, hits the object with neutrons and analyzes the gamma rays that bounce back, telling the machine which elements are present.

One recent afternoon, Rapiscan's chief operating officer, Pat Shea, placed a bottle of wine in the machine's drawer and started the analysis. A whirring sound followed for about 40 seconds, followed by an analysis: the bottle indeed contained wine.

DOJ_NMG_0061224

Despite all the years and dollars his company has poured into research and development, Shea cautions against an over-reliance on technology.

"No one device is a silver bullet," he said. "The devices are a tool that's badly needed. You've got this classic needle in a haystack search, but made much easier if you have a magnet to work with. If you have to reach through the haystack with your hand until something pricks your finger, it'll take a long time."

Is Utah Tops In Terror? (DESERET)

By Lee Davidson And Geoffrey Fattah, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 9, 2006

State logs 96 cases categorized as terrorism in '05; most are ID theft

Federal data on criminal cases show Utah tops the nation in terrorist-related activity. But does it really?

The U.S. Department of Justice reported 96 terrorism-related prosecutions in the Beehive state in 2005. That represents one out of every eight such cases nationwide, well ahead of the second-place 80 filed in the Eastern District of Virginia (in the suburbs of Washington), and the third-place 67 in the Southern District of Texas.

But Utah has not turned suddenly into a stronghold for al-Qaida.

A Deseret Morning News review of the cases shows that most of them likely would not be considered terrorism-related by people outside of the Justice Department. In fact, 87 of the 96 were identity-theft cases. None of the cases reviewed had any apparent ties to organized crime or terrorist groups listed in court documents.

The Justice Department provided only vague, general reasons why such cases were coded as terrorism-related for national databases. Officials say that terrorists use crimes like identity theft to fund their efforts, making those crimes a potential threat to national security.

"Since our goal is to charge defendants before they can put their plans into action, this very often leads to the use of non-terrorism statutes such as fraud or false statement charges, immigration violations, identity theft and other offenses that often carry lesser penalties than offenses associated with completed terrorist acts or conspiracies," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. He added that smaller offenses allow officials to disrupt and prevent more serious attacks.

The U.S. attorney for Utah's spokeswoman, Melodie Rydalch, said her office could not comment and was instructed to refer all comments to Washington. Questions forwarded via e-mail to the U.S. Department of Justice's office of public affairs asking for comment on the Utah cases were not answered.

Perhaps the reason for the high number of terrorist-related cases in Utah has to do in part with the way the Utah office classifies some cases. Because the Utah Identity Theft Task Force is a component of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force, identity-theft cases often are termed as terrorist-related.

While some of those those cases are not directly linked to a terrorist plot, others are considered "domestic terrorism" because they have been linked to groups, such as white supremacists, who use identity theft to fund their efforts.

Even if cases have no terrorist link, federal prosecutors rationalize that crimes involving stealing personal information, illegal entry into the country and compromising airport security threaten national security.

There might also be another reason for the numbers. The Justice Department has used such statistics (along with data from all federal districts) in efforts to obtain anti-terrorism funding and to bolster support for the Patriot Act.

The findings emerge from raw data collected nationally from the Justice Department by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse (TRAC) and analyzed by the Morning News.

The data reported that 743 terrorism-related cases were prosecuted in 2005, and 96 of them were in Utah.

Utah's number that year was twice as high as the 47 such prosecutions it had in 2004, which was then the third-highest in the nation. Before that, reported terrorism-related prosecutions were fairly rare in Utah: just nine in 2003, three in 2002 and none in 2001 or 2000.

The vast majority of the reported terrorism-related cases in Utah were for identity theft, immigration or drug violations that did not seem, in court documents, to have clear links to terrorist groups.

Some examples include:

· Jamie A. Barlow, who worked for an orthodontist, pleaded guilty to using the point-of-sale terminal in that office to illegally credit her account with $11,000. Court records say Barlow was given 90 days' house arrest and ordered to pay restitution.

· Eric Arthur Andersen and Deborah Gaye Bower pleaded guilty to charges stemming from fraudulently obtaining a credit card by using his brother's personal information, and then attempting to buy a $2,000 computer from Best Buy.

· Anne Kristine Bennett, Timmothy Ray Grimsley and Jacqueline Carrie Nelson pleaded guilty to charges stemming from stealing checks from the mail and going on a $3,000 spending spree with them in Weber and Davis counties.

DOJ_NMG_0061225

· Robert Brad Young pleaded guilty to charges stemming from use of stolen and counterfeited checks, identity theft and use of false identification.

· Blissen Bacala Coelho pleaded guilty to charges stemming from using someone else's Social Security card to open a credit union account, and then using that account for check kiting.

Only a few cases seemed to approach what most people would likely consider as terrorism, and maybe even they lack strong ties.

For example, Juan Carlos Justo-Martinez pleaded guilty to charges of trying to take a box cutter on an airplane and possessing false immigration documents. Court records show he was sentenced to time served and released on the condition that he "shall not illegally re-enter the United States."

Sue-Betty Owens was prosecuted, but had her case dismissed, for supposedly interfering with flight crew members on a SkyWest flight from Salt Lake City to Kalispell, Mont. Indictments said a flight attendant asked her to stow her handbag, but Owens refused and threw the bag at the attendant.

Joshua Lutman, a Starbucks Coffee employee at the airport, pleaded guilty to charges stemming from trying to sneak a friend into restricted areas at the airport through improper use of his identification badge.

Controversy over possible erroneous classification of cases as terrorist-related is nothing new.

For example, the Philadelphia Inquirer in December 2001 reported that the Justice Department inflated terrorism statistics in annual reports to Congress by including improper cases. It said the Justice Department did that, in part, to justify its budget requests.

Because of criticism from that newspaper story, the Justice Department switched from using FBI data about terrorism-related cases to using data from the offices of U.S. attorneys.

However, a 2003 report by the U.S. General Accountability Office said it still found that about half the supposedly terrorism-related cases that it reviewed had been misclassified by the U.S. attorneys offices and the Justice Department.

That GAO report also concluded that the Justice Department "does not have sufficient management oversight and internal controls in place ... to ensure the accuracy and reliability of its terrorism-related conviction statistics."

University of Utah law professor Wayne McCormack, who teaches a course on law related to terrorism, said he understands why federal officials would treat such crimes as terrorist-related. "There have been many instances," he said, pointing to a cigarette smuggling ring broken up between Virginia and Pennsylvania where the difference in tobacco tax was collected and used to fund Hamas efforts.

"That's the frustration. It could be terrorist-related, but you just don't know," McCormack said. As for the Utah statistics, "It looks pretty fishy."

Share Data -- And Protect Rights (WP)

By Sophie In't Veld

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

In his op-ed of Aug. 29, "A Tool We Need to Stop the Next Airliner Plot," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff claimed that the fight against terrorism is being hampered by European privacy concerns about the U.S. government's use of data collected on airline passengers. This is a very serious allegation that calls for a reaction and some qualification.

Europeans are no less concerned about the threat of terrorism than our American friends, not least since several attacks have occurred on our own continent since Sept. 11, 2001 (Madrid, London, the murder of filmmaker Theo van Gogh in Holland) and many more have been prevented. But we are also very aware that one aim of terrorists is to undermine our democracy, the rule of law and our human rights. We should never grant them the pleasure of achieving that goal.

Many Europeans have only recently acquired freedom and democracy, having lived for decades under authoritarian regimes. Therefore we are extremely aware of how precious democracy is. Due democratic process -- holding the executive to account, maintaining proportionality, transparency, the possibility of judicial review and respect for the rule of law, including international agreements -- is of the essence.

But the first question that must be answered about any anti-terrorism measure is this: Does it help make our world safer? Since Sept. 11 a host of measures have been taken in the fight against terrorism, often in a rush and in a climate of fear. It is high time for an in-depth evaluation of the results: Are the measures effective in terms of increased security? How many bad guys did we catch? How many plots were prevented? How many innocent citizens were held by mistake? Do we need further measures, or can some of them be revoked or adapted?

Asking critical questions, and insisting on proper safeguards and proportionality, are vital parts of the democratic process. Arguing that democracy, the rule of law and civil liberties get in the way of the fight against terrorism is nonsense. On the contrary, they are our best defense against those who want to destroy our society.

DOJ_NMG_0061226

No one will deny that data collection and information sharing are necessary in the fight against terrorism. But such measures should not go beyond what's needed to achieve that purpose, and any restriction on the freedom and privacy of citizens must be accompanied by safeguards against mistakes and abuse, and by provision for proper means of redress.

In the case of the European Union-United States Passenger Name Record (PNR) agreement, neither condition has been met. The United States requires 34 items of data from travelers to the United States. E.U. citizens are not covered by American privacy laws, as U.S. citizens are, so they have little protection in this regard. The United States was not willing to make any promises to provide such protection but agreed only to "undertakings" in this area. It's hardly surprising that the European Parliament was not reassured.

It can be done differently, as shown by the PNR agreement between the European Union and Canada. Canada requires only 25 data items, and the protection of personal data that applies to Canadian citizens has been extended to cover E.U. citizens traveling to Canada.

In general, for the purpose of identifying certain individuals, the so-called APIS data (name, passport number, etc.) are sufficient. In practice, the carriers do not provide all 34 items requested by the United States but only the eight to 10 available to them. The need for further data has not been convincingly demonstrated. There may be a case for it, but as I understand democracy, it is up to the authorities to prove they need personal data, not to parliaments or individual citizens to prove that they don't.

A very critical report by the privacy officer of the Department of Homeland Security and an evaluation of the implementation of the E.U.-U.S. agreement show that implementation by the United States has been slow and inadequate. At the time of the evaluation, passengers did not receive any information about the PNR program and their rights. Contrary to what was agreed to, the United States has so far failed to switch from the so-called PULL system (whereby the United States has direct access to the computer systems of the European carriers) to the PUSH system (whereby the carriers forward the data). There are serious questions regarding the use of data for purposes other than the ones agreed on and over the forwarding of data to third parties.

Secretary Chertoff states that the United States does not do ethnic profiling. To my knowledge no Western nation has admitted to ethnic profiling as an official policy, but we all know it happens in practice. So-called "trusted traveler" programs are essentially that. What chance has, say, a 25-year-old man with a beard, wearing a turban or having a Muslim appearance (whatever that may be) of being a "trusted traveler"?

Europeans are eager to work with their American friends and allies to eliminate the scourge of terrorism. But friends and allies work together on the basis of mutual respect, trust and shared values. Issues such as Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, illegal rendition flights and secret detention camps, the SWIFT spying scandal and the unsatisfactory implementation of the PNR agreement have done much harm to the traditional trust between the transatlantic partners. If we want to beat the terrorists, it is essential that trust be restored. That will not be achieved by tough language between the parties but through respect and willingness to seek compromises.

I am convinced that together we can find ways to protect our democracy and freedom while preserving our hard-won civil rights. Only in that scenario do the terrorists lose.

The writer is a Dutch member of the European Parliament and its Committee on Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs.

Police On The Lookout For Terrorists With Missiles Near Airports (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Police officer Steven Benner was on patrol in northern Anne Arundel County, driving his unmarked sport-utility vehicle through parking lots, climbing onto rooftops and peering down access roads that wind through wooded areas.

Suddenly, a jetliner screamed a few hundred feet overhead. That Southwest Airlines jet -- and the many other low-flying airliners here -- was the reason he was combing the area. Benner, an officer with the Maryland Transportation Authority Police, was looking for threats from shoulder-fired missiles around Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport.

Benner said he tries to think like a terrorist. He looks for people who seem out of place, such as those parked in restricted areas who might be taking notes or photographs as reconnaissance for an attack. Sometimes he drives off the beaten path to potential launch sites. He knows it wouldn't take much to get off a shot: A missile could be fired from the back of a moving pickup truck.

"They don't do things by the book, so we can't do things by the book," Benner said, adding that he is also on the lookout for people monitoring him. "If we do this randomly and every so often, they are not going to be able to pattern police movements. I like to be a little smarter than them, a little faster than they are."

DOJ_NMG_0061227

Since British police said they foiled a plot to blow up airliners over the Atlantic, security authorities have focused on the threat of explosive liquids and gels. But the commercial airline industry faces a variety of threats, including bombs in cargo, hijackings and shoulder-fired missiles.

The U.S. government says shoulder-fired missiles have been used in at least 36 attacks on civilian aircraft in the past three decades, all overseas. Many security experts say the threat of attack in the United States is more remote than in other countries, particularly those in Africa and the Middle East.

Still, the possibility worries police and intelligence officials because many missiles are on the black market and many terrorist groups have them. Authorities estimate that terrorist organizations have several hundred to several thousand shoulder-fired missiles, which can cost as little as $5,000. In a report to Congress last month, the Department of Homeland Security called missile attacks a "real and international concern."

To counter the threat, the U.S. government has spent more than $100 million to develop a reliable anti-missile system to install on commercial planes. The systems, which are mounted underneath aircraft, detect missile launches and then fire laser beams at the weapon to disrupt its guidance system and send it off course. The military already uses such countermeasures on its aircraft.

The government hopes to develop systems that would cost about $1 million each for installation on thousands of jetliners. But widespread deployment of such devices on the U.S. commercial fleet would probably take at least a decade. The Department of Homeland Security is spending an additional $10 million to test different anti-missile systems, some of which could be ground-based, at airports. Most security experts say commercial jets are most vulnerable when landing or taking off because they are going relatively slow and are low to the ground.

In the absence of technological solutions, police have filled the gap. Police at Dulles International Airport and Reagan National Airport conduct patrols, but a spokeswoman declined to discuss security efforts in detail.

Shoulder-fired missiles are small and can fit in a large duffel bag. Some have ranges of up to three miles, and some can reach altitudes of 15,000 feet.

Most departments began the patrols after two missiles barely missed an Israeli jetliner taking off in Kenya in late 2002. A DHL cargo plane was badly damaged after being struck by a missile in Iraq a year later. In response, the U.S. military cleared a large area around Baghdad's airport, and commercial planes have taken the dramatic approach of flying over the airfield at 10,000 feet and then corkscrewing down to the runway to avoid missiles.

Maryland Transportation Authority Police officials have briefed officers on the missiles' range and effectiveness. Each officer has been given photographs of the missiles, which are known in law enforcement circles as "manpads," for man-portable air defense systems.

The photos, which include close-ups of the individual components, are displayed in the department's BWI squad room with a large map that shows "BWI Manpad Sites," nearly a dozen locations that police check at random intervals because they think they would make good launching sites.

The biggest part of the effort focuses on officers such as Benner, who on a recent afternoon spent 90 minutes checking the perimeter of the airport. He inspected the Amtrak train station for explosives and drove through parking garages to ensure that no terrorists were hiding there. He also checked school and business parking lots.

He has never confronted anyone suspected of being terrorist, but he has kicked out people picnicking in restricted areas and questioned aviation enthusiasts who gather at airports and take notes on the comings and goings of planes.

Gary W. McLhinney, chief of the Maryland Transportation Authority Police, said the patrols are one of the oldest and best tools he has to combat a potential attack. "The patrols are an important and an effective use of our resources," McLhinney said. "This is such an important issue."

Airport police have expanded their anti-missile networks by reaching out to other law enforcement organizations that patrol potential launch sites. The U.S. Park Police, which monitors many of the parks and roads along the Potomac River, has stepped up patrols because of the threat posed to planes heading to and from National Airport.

Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford said the department has trained maintenance crews and park service employees to recognize those who may be attempting to launch a missile and those who may be scouting for an attack. "We have to be constantly vigilant," Pettiford said.

Police officials said they work closely with the Transportation Security Administration and the FBI to learn about threats.

When the TSA was created after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, security officials reached out to community associations to enlist the help of neighborhood watch groups. Scott McHugh said he pushed for such community briefings when he was the federal security director at Dulles in 2002 and 2003. He and other former federal security directors say the community meetings have dwindled and occur at only a few airports. He said TSA officials have failed to implement policies that could effectively counter the threat.

DOJ_NMG_0061228

TSA spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said in an e-mail that security officials meet with community and business groups and that they work closely with local police and federal law enforcement on the issue of shoulder-fired missiles.

New York Muslims Beset By Suspicion (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall And Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

The Muslim owner of the Dar-us-Salaam store on Atlantic Avenue in Brooklyn was polite, but he didn't want to talk.

At the Firdous cosmetics shop next door, a bearded young Moroccan was equally wary, when asked how things had changed for the city's Muslims since the September 11 terror attacks.

"We get so many people coming and asking questions about this. My boss says it's best to say nothing. We just want to move on," he explains.

Five years after the attacks, the mood on Atlantic Avenue is guarded. New York survived the aftermath of the attacks without any major outbreaks of violence against Muslims or Arabs. But on Atlantic Avenue, and in Bay Ridge and Bensonhurst and Sunnyside, things are not as they were.

Said Mahmoud, who operates a cart selling coffee, doughnuts and bagels in midtown Manhattan, says that following the attacks he was shocked to hear construction workers telling their friends waiting at his cart not to give their business to an Arab. "We were lucky we were not in some other country, where maybe they kill you," he says.

New York's Muslim community numbers about 600,000. The number of mosques in the city has grown from half a dozen in the early 1970s to more than 140. But after being shaken by the widespread detentions of suspected illegal immigrants that followed the 9/11 attacks, recent events have highlighted tensions.

In July, a New York court found Shahawar Matin Siraj, a 23-year old Pakistani immigrant, guilty of conspiring to blow up the city's Herald Square subway station, one of the city's busiest.

The Siraj case underlined the level of monitoring of some sections of the city's Muslims. Charges were brought against Siraj after a police informer began operating in his mosque.

"Muslims now see themselves as being put in this category of suspicion," says Louis Cristillo, who heads a Columbia University teaching college project on issues affecting Muslim youth in New York. "There is de facto racial profiling in airports and public transportation."

He says there are also claims of scores of lower level racist incidents, such as children being teased or beaten up at school, or of girls having head scarves ripped off.

More optimistically, he argues the city's Muslim community is more integrated than immigrant Muslim communities in the UK, France and Germany. "Once you're naturalised in the US, you have the same rights as everyone else," he says.

But Mr Mahmoud, in midtown Manhattan, finds a bitter irony for Arab Americans. "Many people came here in the spirit they did not like the things their own governments did, and they wanted freedom. And now, when they see things like detentions without trial, what must their feelings be?"

KC Man Linked To Early Al-Qaida (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 9, 2006

Did a Kansas City college student help Osama bin Laden start al-Qaida?

Federal law enforcement officials think he did. So do private-sector experts on international terrorism.

Now, a new book that chronicles the history of al-Qaida portrays former Kansas City resident Mohammed Loay Baizid as a confidant of bin Laden in the early years of the terrorist organization.

While The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, by Lawrence Wright, a staff writer at The New Yorker magazine, provides Baizid's firsthand account of his association with bin Laden, the former Kansas City resident's activities already have been extensively documented in federal court transcripts and law enforcement documents. He even was mentioned in the 9/11 commission report.

"He was one of the guys there when it all got started," said John Lumpkin, a senior fellow at GlobalSecurity.org, an Alexandria, Va.-based defense-policy research firm and clearinghouse of military information. "He definitely was a major figure."

Jack Cloonan, who as an FBI agent questioned Baizid with the cooperation of Sudanese authorities shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, said he had seen a list of original al-Qaida members.

"His name is on it," Cloonan said of Baizid. Cloonan now is president of a private security firm, Clayton Consultants.

Baizid has denied that and said he was not present at the meeting that many consider the birth of al-Qaida.

DOJ_NMG_0061229

Although many think Baizid was an integral part of al-Qaida's early days, his role in the organization as it evolved into a worldwide terrorist organization is less clear. His name has come up in the trials of terrorism figures, but he apparently has never faced charges himself.

Wright and others think Baizid long ago cut his ties to bin Laden and al-Qaida.

Cloonan said he and other FBI agents came to Kansas City in 1998 to investigate Baizid's background. After the Sept. 11 attacks, Cloonan was part of a joint FBI-CIA team that went to Khartoum, Sudan, to interview people with connections to al-Qaida, including Baizid.

"We really don't know the full length and breadth of his involvement," Cloonan said.

Galvanized by call

According to Wright, Baizid was 24 in 1985 when he answered the call to jihad and traveled from Kansas City to Pakistan and later Afghanistan to fight the Russians. Wright spent five years researching his book and met Baizid in 2003 in Khartoum.

Baizid's family immigrated from Syria when he was a teenager and in Wright's book, Baizid is quoted as saying that he was a "typical young middle-class American man" when he read a tract by Abdullah Azzam, who has been described as one of bin Laden's main spiritual influences.

In the tract, Azzam called on Muslims to rally together to aid Afghanistan in its fight with the Soviet Union.

Baizid declined to be interviewed by The Kansas City Star, but Wright told The Star that in interviews the former Kansas City resident said he was seeking adventure and became "galvanized" by Azzam's call.

Baizid only intended to stay a short time, but after flying to Pakistan, he called a telephone number that was printed on the tract he had read and Azzam answered the phone. Bazid said he did not know what he would have done otherwise.

In Pakistan, Baizid met Azzam, bin Laden and other Arab volunteers in the fight against the Soviets. He adopted the name Abu Rida al-Suri.

"I went to Afghanistan with a blank mind and a good heart," Baizid is quoted in the book as saying. "Everything was totally strange. It was like I was born just now, like I was an infant, and I have to learn everything new. It was not so easy after that to leave and go back to your regular life."

That regular life included studying engineering at the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Baizid was enrolled at UMKC from August 1982 to May 1984, according to university records that do not reflect whether he obtained a degree. A university spokesman said privacy laws did not permit the release of grade information or the names of professors Baizid studied under.

An acquaintance of Baizid's in Kansas City in the early 1980s, also an immigrant from Syria, recalled an easygoing young man who enjoyed playing cards with friends and walking on the Country Club Plaza and who was always quick with a joke.

"He always liked to tease and try to be funny," said the man, who asked that his name not be used for fear that it might hurt his business.

In the next decade, Baizid allegedly became a business adviser and fundraiser for al-Qaida, according to extensive sworn testimony and documents from federal investigators and terrorism experts filed in federal courts in Chicago and New York during terrorism trials. Lorenzo Vidino, a terrorism analyst for the Investigative Project, a Washington-based counterterrorism research and investigative center that was founded in 1995, said Baizid's role in the formation of al-Qaida and its later fundraising efforts in the United States, cannot be overemphasized.

"It's no exaggeration to say he was one of the four or five founding members," said Vidino, co-author of the book Al Qaeda in Europe: The New Battleground of International Jihad.

Members of Baizid's family, including his uncle Adnan Bayazid, who lives in the Kansas City area, declined requests to comment.

But Adnan Bayazid told U.S. News & World Report in a 2002 article about American jihadists that his nephew had helped buy supplies for Afghans fighting the Soviets and had since grown disillusioned with bin Laden. He also suggested that another person with a similar name may be responsible for some of the things attributed to his nephew.

Bayazid also mentioned his nephew's connection to bin Laden in the 1980s and '90s in an article in the Kansas City Jewish Chronicle.

Mohammed Baizid allegedly was still in Pakistan in 1988 when a pivotal event in the history of al-Qaida occurred. At a meeting of bin Laden and a handful of others, plans were discussed to organize the group that would become al-Qaida. Wright said that Baizid denied he was present, but the handwritten notes of that meeting were made by Baizid, according to later federal court testimony and documents prepared by the U.S. Justice Department.

In the early 1990s, bin Laden relocated to Sudan, and Baizid went with him.

In Wright's book, Baizid is described as bin Laden's "main business adviser" for various enterprises in Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0061230

By 1994, Baizid was back in the United States. He obtained an Illinois driver's license and allegedly became a leader of the Chicago-based Benevolence International Foundation, a purported charitable organization. Federal authorities later shut down the group for allegedly funneling money to al-Qaida. Its director pleaded guilty to a charge of racketeering.

In documents later seized by authorities, Baizid is referred to as being president of the foundation at one time.

Vidino said the group functioned as one of the main Al-Qaeda fundraising groups in the United States.

Baizid's first known contact with U.S. law enforcement came in what Vidino called a "mysterious story" that unfolded Dec. 16, 1994, in California.

According to trial testimony and court documents, Baizid was with bin Laden's brother-in-law, who was detained after arriving in San Francisco on a flight from the Philippines.

But Baizid was released, and Vidino said he has never been able to determine the reason or where he went after that.

Wright said that Baizid has a comfortable life in Sudan and operates several businesses.

"I know he would like to come back to Kansas City," Wright said. "He's bored and frustrated in Khartoum."

But Baizid is afraid that U.S. authorities will arrest him, even though Wright said law enforcement officials have told him that Baizid is not facing any charges.

"I think he's harmless and should be allowed to come back," Wright said.

Paulson Sizes Up Wall St Disaster Defences (FT)

By David Wighton And Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Concerns about Wall Street's ability to withstand a terrorist attack, natural disaster or flu pandemic have prompted Hank Paulson, the new US Treasury secretary, to review the financial market's disaster-planning.

In one of his first acts in the post, the former Goldman Sachs chief executive has asked the president's working group on financial markets to assess the improvements made since September 11 2001. This comes amid continued Wall Street concerns – five years after the World Trade Center attacks – about the resilience of power and telecommunications services.

September 11 exposed weaknesses in the industry's disaster planning and closed the equity market for four days.

Experts say financial services companies in New York and London have improved the resilience of their operations. But some senior Wall Street figures are concerned that the utilities, on which the financial markets depend, have made less progress. There is also greater focus on the impact of a flu pandemic.

Scott Parsons, US deputy assistant Treasury secretary, said the utilities had made "tremendous improvements" but added: "We remain concerned about how to provide better resilience in telecommunications, which is the financial sector's single biggest dependency."

Wall Street firms blamed many of their problems in 2001 on the damage to one of Verizon Communications' five switching centres in lower Manhattan.

Some Wall Street disaster planners believe more pressure needs to be put on the utilities by their regulators. They are encouraged by the early interest taken by Mr Paulson, who was involved in the issue at Goldman Sachs.

Recently, many financial services companies and regulators have focused on their ability to operate in the event of a flu pandemic when many staff would want to work from home.

Anxiety Remains On Wall St Disaster Planning (FT)

By David Wighton, Deborah Brewster, Paul Taylor And Anuj Gangahar

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

When Dick Grasso, the then chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, reopened trading on September 17 2001, it was a symbol of Wall Street's resilience in the face of terrorism.

But the four-day closure of the exchange also underlined the serious disruption caused by the attacks on the World Trade Center, due partly to flaws in Wall Street's disaster planning.

Five years and billions of dollars of investment later, many of those flaws have been addressed and there is little doubt that financial markets in New York – and in other leading financial centres – would now be more resilient in the event of a similar disaster.

But concerns remain, not least about the key utilities on which the financial services sector depends and the industry's ability to handle other sorts of threat, such as a flu pandemic.

Scott Parsons, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for critical infrastructure, says the most basic lesson learned from September 11 was the need for back-up facilities far enough away from a main site.

DOJ_NMG_0061231

Most companies' contingency plans had focused on localised potential problems. "Some firms had their back-up in the basement of their buildings or right across the street," says Mr Parsons. As a result, some lost access to both their primary and back-up facilities.

"Institutions also generally had not considered the possibility that transportation of personnel could be significantly disrupted and preclude the relocation of staff to alternate sites," said a 2002 report by the Federal Reserve and other regulators.

The regulators subsequently introduced new guidelines on back-up facilities and many companies have invested heavily in new operations.

The Bank of New York, for example, has built two identical data centres, one 40 miles from its 1 Wall Street headquarters and one – completed just six months ago – 750 miles away. A leading clearer of bond trades, BoNY was badly disrupted by the September 11 attack.

"Each is a replica, just waiting for the other to fail," says Don Monks, BoNY's vice-chairman.

Many financial services companies in London have made similar moves and the UK Financial Services Authority said in a study in December that most companies now had "highly resilient" IT systems and could continue normal operations within a day of a disaster.

According to Gregory Ferris, chairman of the Securities Industry Association business continuity committee, another key lesson of September 11 was the need for better communication within the industry during a crisis. The SIA and other industry bodies set up a command centre to improve co-ordination. "Recovery efforts following the 2003 New York City blackout and other events, such as the 2005 transit strike and national immigration rallies, were more effective because this structure was in place," he told a congressional committee in June.

Another area of focus has been collaborative testing, such as a big exercise for the New York securities markets set for October 14, says Anna Ewing, chief information officer of the Nasdaq stock market. "These tests are now much more intensive and are really aimed at ensuring that transactions can still get done in the event of a crisis."

Banks and securities firms are also paying greater attention to their power and telecommunications systems. Much of the disruption caused by September 11 was the result of problems with utilities, which proved unexpectedly vulnerable.

"We didn't know how much of the telecoms infrastructure was concentrated in seven buildings in downtown Manhattan . . . and the main unit needed to operate for the other six to operate," recalls Mr Monks. BoNY now demands much more information from its suppliers and has also leased five fibre optic cables to connect its data centres.

Verizon Communication says it has further decentralised the infrastructure that supports Wall Street and made it easier to re-route voice and data traffic in a crisis. It has also installed another 40 miles of fibre optic cabling in lower Manhattan, much of it configured in "self-healing" rings.

But some senior Wall Street operations executives believe infrastructure suppliers have not faced as much pressure from their regulators to increase resilience.

Telecommunications is also a concern for many financial services companies as they draw up plans to deal with a possible pandemic. The assumption is that following an outbreak large numbers of employees will stay at home and companies are investigating how much of their operations could be done from home.

9/11 Has Spurred Only Modest Changes In New York City And National Building Codes (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

The destruction of the World Trade Center produced calls for a wholesale re-evaluation of the way tall buildings are designed and built, but five years later, the changes to New York City's building code, and others across the nation, have been few and modest.

Skip to next paragraph

Related Twin Beams to Light Sky Again. But After 2008? (September 9, 2006)

Recommendations from a major federal investigation into the collapse are still being debated and may yet result in modifications to a national building code that the city plans to adopt. So far, though, 9/11 has not been a turning point for code revision, in the way past disasters were — like the Triangle Shirtwaist fire of 1911.

In New York, some suggestions have been quietly shelved. Proposals for more and wider stairwells in skyscrapers, for example, were set aside in part because the real estate industry felt threatened by the loss of rentable space.

Other ideas, like hardening building components to withstand major fires, are mired in technical debates among engineers that could take years to resolve.

DOJ_NMG_0061232

To some critics, the pace of revisions is evidence that the sense of urgency aroused by the attacks has faded. Others argue that the attacks were so extraordinary an event that they cannot be the basis for sweeping changes in the way skyscrapers are designed and built.

"No building is safe from everything," said Patricia J. Lancaster, an architect who has been the commissioner of the city's Department of Buildings since 2002. "It's up to the owners to assess how much risk their building, their piece of land, their edifice, is at. There's no one answer to the question of what you should do. That's why not everything is mandated in the building code. If you mandate too much, then we'll be building concrete bunkers."

Developers of some planned buildings, like the Freedom Tower at ground zero and the Bank of America tower in Midtown, are voluntarily meeting higher standards than those required by the code, in part because anxious tenants now seek them. It is unclear, however, whether such efforts will continue as market conditions evolve.

Ms. Lancaster has overseen two major responses to 9/11 that are expected to change the city's building code for the first time since 1968.

The first was to convene a task force that made 21 recommendations for immediate changes in the city's code in response to the disaster. The second was to support the gradual adoption of standard building, electrical, plumbing and fire-safety codes used by most states and cities in the United States; this would be a major change for the city, which has long insisted on setting its own standards.

Both studies reflect a desire to learn from 9/11.

The planes that day severed five of the six stairwells in the twin towers, fatally trapping as many as 1,500 people on the upper floors. Analysts have said many more might have escaped if there had been more stairwells and if they had been made of reinforced concrete rather than lightweight gypsum board.

The New York City building code currently requires only three stairwells in a tall building, regardless of whether it is 10 or 100 stories. Federal investigators have said that, given the size and number of the stairwells, the evacuation would have been much slower and many more people would have died if the towers had been fully occupied that day. A former director of the World Trade Center told the 9/11 Commission in 2004 that stairwells needed to be wider to speed up evacuations.

Changing the code's provisions for stairwells was not one of the things recommended by the task force of industry representatives, engineers, city officials, and fire-safety experts, but city officials point out with some pride that a majority of the 21 recommendations did become law in 2004. Among the new requirements: all high-rise commercial buildings over 100 feet must have sprinkler systems installed within 15 years; exit paths, doors and stairs must be marked with glow-in-the-dark materials; and buildings have to maintain plans to evacuate occupants in all kinds of emergencies, not just fires.

The task force decided against requiring more and wider stairwells and instead backed encouraging the change. It asked the Department of City Planning to encourage developers to build more and wider stairwells by excluding stairwells when the city calculates how big a building can be.

The proposal would have removed a disincentive against adding stairwells, since developers want to maximize every inch of rentable space. But it would also have meant taller buildings. City planners rejected the idea, and it has not been revived.

But After 2008? Asked why the task force did not simply recommend requiring more stairwells, Ms. Lancaster said, "We were not successful in gaining consensus on that issue." She added, "If you increase a stairwell by one inch at the top of a 90-story building, you are giving up dozens and dozens of square feet of rentable space."

Similarly, the task force agreed to encourage but not require the use of impact-resistant materials for elevator and stairwell enclosures. Ms. Lancaster said the group recognized that the gypsum board used to enclose the trade center stairwells was inadequate, but that it would not have been appropriate to specify a harder material, like cinder block. "We can't show favoritism," she said, adding that several other materials were just as durable.

Glenn P. Corbett, an assistant professor of fire science at John Jay College of Criminal Justice, said the city was too lenient in giving owners 15 years to install sprinklers. "Ten years, in my opinion, was plenty of time to do it," he said.

Ms. Lancaster, however, described the changes as significant, hard-won concessions given the expense of improvements like sprinklers and the political clout of the real estate industry. "I think it's a miracle we got this passed at all, frankly," she said of the sprinkler change.

"The real estate industry was pretty darn good about stepping up to the plate and going along with this stuff," she said. "They were sobered, as were the rest of us, after 9/11. When they became convinced that this would really help people in an extreme event, they adopted it. It's really pretty striking. Those guys have big bucks."

Marolyn Davenport, a vice president at the Real Estate Board of New York and a member of the task force, said the code revisions were a compromise among competing interests, and the code itself only a baseline standard. Many developers of tall buildings were voluntarily surpassing it, she said. "That's true of anything being built in a prime location in Manhattan," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0061233

For example, many features of the 54-story Bank of America tower, now under construction at 42nd Street and Avenue of the Americas, will reflect the concerns of a post-9/11 world: bollards to block bombs, shatterproof glass, extra-thick steel and wider staircases encased in thick concrete. Many were not required under the code but were sought by the bank, as anchor tenant, or the developer, the Durst Organization.

Burdensome restrictions would make construction too expensive, Ms. Davenport said. “While you want to incorporate safety features, at the same time we have to compete with the surrounding areas,” she said.

The second prong of the city’s response has been to wait for changes in model codes that are supposed to result from a $16 million study by the National Institute of Standards and Technology. The 10,000-page study, released last October, concluded that design flaws did not cause the collapse of the towers, but that there were significant ways to improve the durability of skyscrapers and the ease of evacuations.

Some federal, state and local lawmakers and many engineers have criticized the study’s recommendations as too vague and said they did not provide enough guidance for code revisions.

David Scott of Arup, an engineering firm in New York City, who is chairman of the Council on Tall Buildings and Urban Habitat, an international nonprofit professional organization, said, “A lot of people were disappointed by the NIST report because it was a bit vague and didn’t tell people what to do, and didn’t do the research to back up what it did tell people to do.”

S. Shyam Sunder, the lead investigator for the federal study, said it was not his team’s job to rewrite the code. “It was part of our design to be performance-oriented in our specifications,” he said. “We felt the private sector and code organizations were the most qualified to translate performance recommendations into specific code language.”

That process will move forward this month with hearings in Florida, where a panel of experts will review whether 19 of the recommendations should result in changes to the International Building Code, the model code used by most states and cities.

The recommendations address issues like preventing a total collapse when part of a building is damaged by fire or other calamity; the use of spray-on fireproofing; the reliability of automatic sprinklers; the use of elevators by rescue workers and people fleeing; the durability, width and number of stairwells; the marking of exit paths; and the storage of fuel oil. The recommendations will be voted on in March.

Sally Regenhard, the co-chairwoman of the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, which lobbies for more stringent building codes, said she was disappointed by the slow progress. “It’s hard for me to tell you what tangibly has changed,” said Ms. Regenhard, whose son, Christian, a probationary firefighter, died on 9/11. “All we have is a lot of recommendations.”

Dr. Sunder said he believed that the recommendations would get into the national codes, eventually. Others are less optimistic.

“Shyam is an incredibly capable, smart guy who led an impressive group of people to put this thing together,” said Guy Nordenson, who runs a structural engineering firm in New York and teaches at Princeton. “The problem is, their process didn’t lead to a wider consensus-building that would allow these recommendations to get implemented.”

Jon D. Magnusson, a principal in Magnusson Klemencic Associates, a structural engineering firm in Seattle, said the institute’s recommendations, if adopted, would only provide a false sense of security. “None of the proposals, had they been previously a part of the code, would have changed the outcome in the events of 9/11 or at Oklahoma City,” he said. “You simply cannot out-build determined terrorists.”

After Attacks Changed The World, The Recovery Changed A City (WP)

By Michael Powell And Michelle Garcã-a

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

NEW YORK -- You're sitting in the center of the fabulousness. The stinky old Fulton Fish Market is gone, and cobblestone streets are lined with boutiques and $1 million condos with floor-to-ceiling windows, and the sky is that razor blue.

Almost like that day.

Five years ago, this neighborhood in downtown Manhattan, a few blocks from the twin towers, was covered in half a foot of gray ash. Now, Jason Lowney, 28, and Patrick Darragh, 24, down drinks and talk that emphatic guy talk, and Sept. 11 feels pretty distant.

"People thought downtown would be a ghost town," says Lowney, a husky and dark-haired insurance adjuster. "I think it's stronger ."

Darragh nods. Then he lets slip that his uncle was on the 80th floor of the South Tower and died that day. Darragh wanted to migrate here after college.

"It was like a defensive thing," he says. "You even saw it immediately afterward. . . . New Yorkers never had any apprehension."

DOJ_NMG_0061234

Some days the hole in the heart of this city appears healed over. The braggadocio is back and the jackhammers rattle near Ground Zero. The scar that is the 16-acre hole is still there, a monument to political paralysis. But a forest of blue condominium towers rises, Hermes and Tiffany are opening shops downtown, Goldman Sachs is throwing up a 43-story office tower, and those Viking-stoved, Jacuzzi-ed lofts still attract high-roller bid-a-thons.

More than 5,800 apartments have been built in Lower Manhattan since 2001, and the median residential sales price has jumped 75 percent. Big corporations -- the Bank of New York, Goldman and Moody's Investors Service -- are building millions of square feet of new office space.

"The luxury stores are moving in, and with luck we'll soon . . . start building at Ground Zero," said Kathryn Wylde, president of the Partnership for New York City, which represents the city's largest businesses. "A lot of major corporations have committed to staying in place, and that wasn't at all clear in 2001."

So if you measure health by beautiful offices and million-dollar lofts -- and what upper-middle-class New Yorker hasn't these past five years? -- you might conclude that all's swell.

Then you walk to the corner of Barclay and Church streets, where five years ago a cluster of cops and waiters and reporters watched the city's biggest tower fall out of the sky. No one moved, it wasn't real -- and then everyone ran as 30-story clouds of ugly gray smoke and dust and biomass rocketed up Church.

Nearby there is an outdoor exhibit of photos of Ground Zero, beautiful photos of women in tears and St. Paul's Chapel, spire lost in that cloud of dust, and firefighters huddled in the darkness around the remains of one of their own. A sturdy cop looks at the photos and wipes at his eyes.

Congenitally contentious, Bill Dobbs is a war opponent, a fighter for gay rights and a tilter at windmills. He might be expected to cast a querulous eye at the memory of the twin towers, those monuments to David Rockefeller's capitalist vision. But he is also a New York chauvinist, and he admired the towers' brassy size and yearns for something like them to rise again.

"I loved those towers -- when the other buildings quit, those two just kept going," he says. "Look across the harbor from Staten Island -- God, it's horrible to see our skyline now."

Then there is the air. So many firefighters and police officers and paramedics and construction workers and good Samaritans pawed through the wreckage and tended to the rescuers and vacuumed out the high-rises that still stood. Andrziy Nereci remembers feeling like a hero. On the edge of Freedom Plaza, on the south end of Ground Zero, this Polish man with a bushy blonde mustache points to the skyscrapers he wiped clean of toxic dust: the Verizon building and Bank of America. He was handed a flimsy paper mask, he knew it wasn't enough.

"I risked my life and health," he said. "When we went to the 15th floor, the building could have fallen down; we didn't know."

Now he and thousands wheeze and cough. Mount Sinai Medical Center studied 9,500 people who helped at Ground Zero and other sites, and concluded in a report released this week that seven of 10 suffer from chronic lung illness contracted while breathing the post-9/11 air. This is the same air that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency proclaimed safe. Federal officials also suspended workplace safety regulations for the cleanup sites.

Nereci overstayed his visa; he is not a legal immigrant. City and state officials have resisted paying lots of health bills for workers, but he is the lowest of the low. "In some sense, I regret it," he says. "If I had not worked there, I'd have a life."

Post-2001 New York has not been terribly kind to the $51,000-median-family-income New Yorker. In the first months, city and state officials held "listening sessions," and there was talk of parks and affordable housing.

Plans for parks remain, but it would take a microscope to find affordable housing in downtown Manhattan. Out of $2 billion in federal aid expended at in the neighborhoods around Ground Zero, officials have created 77 units of subsidized housing.

By contrast, bonds issued for redevelopment went to 13 new luxury residential buildings with 4,468 market-rate units, including one that was in the works before the attacks. The state also handed out $539 million in business-recovery grants. Hundreds of millions went to large corporations. Exactly $62 million went to owners of small shops and food stores.

Bettina Damiani lives in Brooklyn and keeps a sharp eye on downtown Manhattan for Good Jobs New York, which has scrutinized the spending. She sees an age-old New York story playing out. "Well, we certainly reinforced the status quo, which is that if the real estate industry is doing well, by golly, we all are," she said. "Here's my motto for downtown: Bring free-market capitalism back to Lower Manhattan."

Less clear is what the years since have done to the ephemera that make up a city's soul. Sarah Fisch is a classic New Yorker, in that she arrived in 2000 from somewhere else -- Texas, in her case -- and is pretty intense about her new home. After the attacks, her little subculture of poets and performance artists flowered.

"They were chomping at the bit," she said. "People performed out of a need to escape and wanting to connect with one another."

DOJ_NMG_0061235

Then rents rose so high in Lower Manhattan, the tiny theaters and poetry clubs shuttered. People began to move, to Seattle, Yonkers, wherever. Fisch was broke and sick, and she saw the makeshift memorials in Union Square every day as she walked to one temporary job or another.

"It made me think I'm cannon fodder. I'm the girl in the office while everyone else is out having corporate breakfast," she says.

This autumn she began her second semester of classes. No more starving artist; she wants a PhD so she can get a steady teaching job. She too is the determined face of post-9/11 New York.

Business As Usual Economic Fears After 9/11 Proved Mostly Unfounded (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath And Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

After terrorists attacked the U.S. five years ago, many worried that the economy would lose its hard-won vitality. Companies would need to hire security staff instead of production workers, build up costly inventories and face delays as goods moved across tightened borders.

This is what has happened instead: The number of security guards on business and government payrolls has declined, companies are holding less inventory, and the amount of freight moving though the nation's ports has soared. Not only has the economy grown, it has become more efficient. And office construction in downtown New York and Washington has continued.

Despite fears in 2001 that the terrorism threat would impose a great expense on the nation's business and weigh on the economy, "there is nothing like that showing up," said Bart Hobijn, an economist with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York who has examined security-related spending.

Michael O'Hanlon, a security expert at the Brookings Institution, said that "in the private sector, all that's generally been done is a few more security cameras and guards at the most vulnerable of sites: some skyscrapers, some chemical plants." He added, in an email exchange: "Any one owner of any facility is very unlikely to be attacked, yet quite likely to suffer competitively if he [or] she pays the price for more protection and no one else in the same economic sector does the same."

Several forces are behind the surprising turn. In 2001, years of heavy spending on technology had already begun paying dividends for many companies, permitting them to become more efficient even as they had to divert some resources to security. Massive government stimulus -- hastened by an economic downturn that was in place before the attacks -- helped the economy crawl out of its slump and get on a sustainable growth path. The medicine included steep interest-rate reductions, tax cuts, emergency spending increases and a federal backstop for terrorism insurance -- meaning the U.S. would front part of insurers' losses in the event of a major attack. Meanwhile, crime rates were falling, reducing security needs in some places even as fears of domestic terror rose.

The Sept. 11 attacks did have a major short-term impact on the economy, especially certain sectors, such as airlines and autos. In the case of cars, for example, the Big Three U.S. makers rushed to clear inventories by rolling out zero-percent financing.

And there are other costs to the struggle against terrorism ignited by 9/11, such as the higher price of oil because of supply disruptions and the fear of them -- the so-called terror premium. Then there are the costs that all but defy accounting: the value of lives lost, of individuals injured in battles overseas, of economic opportunities lost by military reservists who are serving abroad.

Earlier this year, Joseph Stiglitz, a former Clinton administration economist and a Nobel prize-winner, and Linda Bilmes, a Harvard professor, took a broad approach to accounting for the Iraq war, including valuations for lives lost and individuals injured, and attached a price tag of up to $2 trillion.

In a narrower look at the post-9/11 costs, Mr. Hobijn of the New York Fed estimates last year's U.S. public and private-sector spending on domestic security at $90 billion, covering everything from guards in city office buildings to federal grants for ports to install surveillance gear. The figure is a little more than $30 billion greater than annual spending on domestic security before the attacks. That's a substantial rise, yet considering that the giant U.S. economy churns out more than $13 trillion of goods and services a year, it's little more than a rounding error.

Whether the nation is more secure today is a different matter, and one that is much harder to measure. It is possible that a five-year stretch without an attack at home has lulled business leaders and politicians into complacency about the threat, and they aren't spending enough on security.

It also isn't clear whether the federal government, which has borne most of the cost of increased security spending, has set the right priorities. Federal spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, which isn't counted in Mr. Hobijn's estimate of domestic-security spending, is $120 billion in this fiscal year alone, the Congressional Budget Office calculates. That dwarfs what is spent to protect buildings, ports and borders. It also creates large chunks of deferred expense in the form of national debt.

DOJ_NMG_0061236

At one company in Rockford, Ill., the effect of the terrorist attacks is close to imperceptible. "Security, as far as 9/11, hasn't really impacted us that much here," says Greg Bubp, chief financial officer of Eclipse Inc., a private manufacturer of industrial heating equipment. Rockford is about 90 miles northwest of Chicago. Mr. Bubp says that, being that far from a major city, he hasn't felt the need to step up security measures at Eclipse's facilities in the U.S. or abroad. "It's something that we need to be aware of, but we're not necessarily in hot spots," he says.

Instead, he has been focused on running his business more efficiently. By working more closely with suppliers, the company has been able to reduce the amount of inventory it keeps on hand at plants from about 100 days' worth of sales to about 80 days' worth since 2001.

U.S. businesses, on average, held inventories equal to a bit more than 43 days' worth of sales in mid-2001, just before the terrorist attacks. If businesses had decided to build up stocks as a buffer against supply disruptions, the ratio of inventories to sales would have risen. Instead, it fell to under 38 days by mid-2006, as companies used new technology and new business practices to hold less on their shelves for every dollar of sales.

Executives at many companies say security is an important issue and a significant budget item. The Business Roundtable, an association of chief executives from the nation's largest companies, created a task force to address security issues right after 9/11, establishing, among other things, a hotline with the White House for crises.

In a just-completed survey of chief financial officers at 434 U.S. companies, 42.4% said they had increased planning for business disruptions since 2001. In the survey, conducted for The Wall Street Journal by Duke University and CFO Magazine, 21.4% said they were paying more for insurance against terror and business disruptions.

But the executives also said that terrorism ranked near the bottom among today's worries. And hard evidence of a pickup in private-sector security spending is spotty.

Insurers take in several billion dollars a year in U.S. terrorism-insurance premiums, estimates Robert Hartwig, chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. Before 9/11, terrorism coverage was included in standard policies. For U.S. businesses, the cost today likely isn't a heavy burden -- it's roughly equal to what they pay to insure their directors and officers against personal losses for the actions they take in their posts.

Moreover, after five years with no new U.S. attack, the cost of terrorism insurance recently has been dropping. The median price of it fell 25% last year from 2004, according to a study by Marsh Inc., the insurance-brokerage unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos.

Spending on private-sector security services such as alarm monitoring systems and guard services was already growing briskly before 9/11, and continued doing so afterward. Yet the pace of its growth slowed slightly, according to data from Freedonia Group Inc., a market-research firm. It says such spending grew at a 6.8% annual rate between 2000 and 2005, down from a 7.1% pace in the second half of the 1990s. In all, the private sector spent about $39 billion on security services last year, vs. about $28 billion in 2000, the firm says.

Freedonia sees the growth in this spending easing off to a 4.3% annual rate in the second half of this decade, largely because of reduced crime rates. However, Mark Visbal, director of research at the Security Industry Association, sees robust growth in spending on equipment like closed-circuit television.

While the economy has largely shrugged off the effects of 9/11 and the terrorism threat's security demands, it is possible that strains will show up gradually over time. Bernard Groseclose, for one, says he is starting to feel them.

He is the chief executive of South Carolina State Ports Authority. Its Charleston hub is among the 10 most active ports in the nation, managing traffic last year that was equivalent of two million 20-foot containers. So far, Mr. Groseclose says, his ports have managed to sustain their efficiency through five years of beefing up security.

Truckers had worried that installation of tall radiation monitors, which scan trucks as they leave ports, would slow traffic in and out. But Mr. Groseclose says the turnaround time for trucks has held steady at a little more than 20 minutes since the monitors were installed.

However, he complains that his operation has been forced to fund security spending on a closed-circuit television system, fencing and a beefed-up police force after the federal government failed to provide grants to cover all the required new security. The ports authority imposes security surcharges of $2 per container, something it didn't do before 9/11. And this fee will soon rise to $4.

One result of having to bear security costs is that the port has put off needed investment to expand its bustling facilities. "There has been no follow-through from a [federal] funding standpoint," Mr. Groseclose says. "I think that is a real problem.... There is not a lot of spending on expansion projects going on right now and security is one reason. "Mark Zandi, of Economy.com, is concerned about the long-term effects of the broader struggle to combat terrorism. Counting the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, he estimates the U.S. government has poured nearly half a trillion dollars into the effort since 2001, increasing federal debt to fund the effort. "In any given year it is not significant, it is not awe-inspiring," Mr. Zandi says. "Over a long period of time, the dollars add up."

DOJ_NMG_0061237

Early Accounting For 9/11 Aftermath Despite Dire Forebodings, Stocks, Productivity Are Up, But Final Reckoning Awaits (WSJ)

By Edward Chancellor, David Vise And Rob Cox

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Stocks fell by 11% in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. At the time, many anticipated dire economic consequences. Fears of financial Armageddon turned out to be exaggerated. Five years later, stocks are up by a third from shortly after the markets reopened. However, it's too early to draw up a final reckoning for that terrible day.

In the months before September 2001, the economy was suffering from the collapse of the tech-stock bubble. The response to the attacks probably sped up its recovery. The Fed accelerated its program of rate cuts, and the government loosened the purse strings. Consumers went on a patriotic spending spree. In the month after 9/11, car sales jumped an extraordinary 26%.

Measured in terms of economic activity, the impact was far less severe than Hurricane Katrina, according to research firm Global Insight. Nor has the "clash of civilizations" arrested the process of global integration, as many feared at the time. Instead, the pace of world trade has picked up. Despite rising tensions in the Mideast, the flow of petrodollars from the Gulf is unabated.

The "War on Terror" that followed 9/11 has boosted U.S. military and security expenditures. Yet foreign loans have enabled Americans to have more guns without skimping on the butter. Economists would normally expect the expansion of such essentially nonproductive activity to have a harmful effect on overall economic efficiency. That hasn't happened. It turns out that average productivity growth over the past five years has actually been greater than during the 1990s.

Yet there may still be some future costs to bear. The drop in skilled immigration and foreign students that followed could affect long-term growth prospects. As the war in Iraq drags on, it could well become a greater economic burden. Finally, the economic recovery was accompanied by a surge of consumer borrowing. That's left many households in the red. As the housing market slows, they will come under increasing pressure to settle their bills. Only then will a truer financial accounting for 9/11 be possible.

Yahoo or Boo-Hoo?

A Microsoft takeover of Yahoo is often hailed as a cure for the House that Gates built. It would certainly give Microsoft's Internet operations more clout. Yahoo's shareholders, who've seen their investment decline by around a third this year, would probably welcome a juicy buyout premium. Yet a deal's unlikely to be done. Blame Europe's antitrust cops.

The frostiness of Microsoft's relationship with European Union antitrust officials burst into public view anew on Thursday. The company warned it might be forced to delay release of the next version of its operating system, Windows Vista, in Europe. It seems Microsoft and Brussels can't agree on what features it must exclude from Vista, how much Microsoft may charge, and what secrets it must reveal to would-be rivals.

For Microsoft, the European standoff has left it trying to do business with one hand tied behind its back. Several members of the European Parliament accused regulators this past week of micromanaging the software giant. But the authorities, led by Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, counter that Microsoft's brass-knuckled approach is responsible for the continuing litigation.

This sour relationship would probably lead European antitrust officials to take a dim view of a Microsoft-Yahoo alliance. They wouldn't need to look too hard. In Europe, Google and Microsoft are battling for Internet dominance. Google's currently winning the race with 156 million unique monthly visitors. Microsoft is second with 144 million, while Yahoo is third with 100 million. With a takeover of Yahoo, Microsoft would take the lead.

The dominance of American Internet firms is already politically unpopular in Europe. A Microsoft-Yahoo combination would make life more difficult for existing European-owned Internet businesses, such as those operated by France Telecom, Telecom Italia and Belgacom, which all rank third in their home markets.

European regulators have already blocked a megamerger between two U.S. firms -- the proposed tie-up of General Electric and Honeywell five years ago. It's only too likely they'd bring out their knives again if Microsoft made a bid for Yahoo.

Forward-Dating

Much ado has been made about backdating options, an unsavory practice that has minted potential fortunes for many executives. But in some cases it may actually benefit a corporate chieftain to delay the pricing of options.

DOJ_NMG_0061238

Take, for instance, the "forward-dating" of options for Viacom's new boss, Philippe Dauman. The longtime sidekick to chairman Sumner Redstone was given his new job over the Labor Day break. Investors fretted that Mr. Redstone was tightening his grip over Viacom. By last Wednesday, the media company had lost 7% of its value.

Yet the market's displeasure at his appointment hasn't cost Mr. Dauman. Although he received share options that Viacom valued at $12 million, the exercise price of these options was pegged to the close of trading Friday. That's about $2.75 a share cheaper than if they had been priced at the close of trading on Sept. 1, just before Mr. Dauman's return.

Viacom says waiting a few days to price options for incoming chief executives is not uncommon, which is true. Hewlett-Packard did the same when it named Mark Hurd its new boss last year, costing him dearly because the stock rose after Carly Fiorina was ousted. PC-maker Gateway this past week said its new leader's options will be priced on his first workday.

But Ford Motor chose a different tactic when awarding Alan Mulally three million share options. These have an exercise price of $8.28 apiece, the average price on Sept. 1, when he signed his contract and several days before his appointment became public. Because investors liked the news, Ford shares rallied and Mr. Mulally is now nearly $1.5 million richer on paper.

Had Viacom followed the same practice, Mr. Dauman's options would be worth almost $1 million less. To avoid the impression that companies are still playing tricks with executive pay, they should adopt a uniform practice when dishing out stock options to their new hires.

Democrats Maintaining The Pressure On 9/11 Film (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

Despite word of small last-minute cuts meant to soften the film's depiction of President Bill Clinton and his aides, members of his administration and Democratic officials yesterday stepped up their campaign to force ABC to cancel its disputed mini-series, "The Path to 9/11."

The Democratic National Committee delivered to the network a petition with more than 200,000 names that demanded withdrawal of the film, which the petition called "right-wing propaganda."

Officials of the committee said they would continue to collect and deliver signatures until ABC "does the right thing and pulls this scandalous project."

Senator John Kerry and Al Gore, Mr. Clinton's vice president, also released statements castigating ABC.

But the debate was not entirely one-sided. Among a variety of conservative Web sites that accused Democrats of politicizing Sept. 11 was that of Conservative Voice.

"Former President William Jefferson Clinton and his minions are strong-arming the folks at ABC Television," a commentary on that site said, "in order to stop a docudrama being aired during the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. The Clintonistas are conducting a full-court press to prevent Americans from learning the truth."

As for ABC, its officials stood by earlier statements that the mini-series was a docudrama, not a documentary. The network, which this summer sent copies of the film to journalists for review, also said: "No one has seen the final version of the film, because the editing process is not yet complete. So criticisms of film specifics are premature and irresponsible."

At least before any late editing, the five-hour film depicts some Clinton administration officials, including Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and Samuel R. Berger, national security adviser, as placing obstacles in the way of strikes against Osama bin Laden.

Both Ms. Albright and Mr. Berger have called such depictions a fabrication.

One particular target of Democratic anger is Thomas H. Kean, chairman of the commission that Congress created to investigate the events leading to the Sept. 11 attacks. Mr. Kean was a senior consultant to the mini-series, and in a strongly worded letter to him dated yesterday, Ms. Albright and Mr. Berger expressed "deep dismay" that he had played such a role.

"Actors portraying us do contemptible things we never did, and say things we neither said nor believed," the letter read. "What's more, in many instances these portrayals are contradicted by your commission's own findings."

The letter outlined five such instances in the mini-series' first half, due to be broadcast tomorrow night.

The Walt Disney Company, ABC's corporate parent, was also under pressure. Bruce R. Lindsey of the Clinton Foundation and Douglas J. Band, counselor to Mr. Clinton, sent a second letter to Robert A. Iger, Disney's chief executive, saying they remained concerned about the impact the mini-series would have on public perception of events.

"We expect that you will make the responsible decision to not air this film," the letter said.

The former president's wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, was somewhat more guarded in remarks at an event at Columbia University.

"My bottom-line view," Ms. Clinton said, "is that when it comes to something as serious and historically significant as 9/11, the truth is enough and we ought to stick to the facts."

DOJ_NMG_0061239

The Republican national leadership was quiet on the mini-series, though President Bush did complicate ABC's broadcast plans by scheduling a speech to the nation for 9 p.m., Eastern time, on Monday, the fifth anniversary of the attacks.

That is the night that ABC plans to broadcast the mini-series' second half. The network said yesterday that it would most likely break into the telecast to show the speech and then resume the film.

Scott Collins And Tina Daunt, (LA)

By Scott Collins And Tina Daunt,

LA Times, September 9, 2006

Latimes.com | Entertainment News

Submit Events | Add a Restaurant | Advertise | Print Edition | Archives | Help

· Newspaper Ads

· Grocery Coupons

· Personals

September 9, 2006

E-mail story Print Most E-Mailed

ABC Stands By Its 9/11 Story — Almost

After minor edits in response to Democratic critics, the miniseries will air as scheduled. It's already set off a bitter election-year dispute.

Sep 9, 2006

The continued mauling of the National Mall

Sep 9, 2006

Unseemly Memorials

Sep 9, 2006

Enter your ZIP code to find complete local listings.

TV & Radio

Walt Disney Co.'s ABC is forging ahead with plans to air a miniseries starting Sunday despite controversy over its efforts to dramatize — and some say unfairly politicize — the events leading up to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Producers said late Friday that they had finished making minor edits to "The Path to 9/11" amid a firestorm of protests from leading Democrats including Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, who warned that telecasting "right-wing political propaganda" might violate the terms of ABC's government-mandated broadcast license.

ADVERTISEMENT

Critics say that, among other things, the film fabricates scenes and unfairly blames the Clinton administration for failing to capture or kill Osama bin Laden. The network, for its part, has urged critics to withhold judgment until the final version airs.

Whatever viewers ultimately see, it's clear that the five-hour $40-million docudrama, highlighting years of intelligence failures and political bickering before the attacks, has detonated an election-year bomb that's reverberating from Hollywood to Capitol Hill.

The movie is also threatening the bipartisan work of the Sept. 11 commission, whose Republican chairman, former New Jersey Gov. Thomas H. Kean, served as a paid consultant on the project and has played a key role in ABC's public-relations campaign.

At least two other commission members — former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste and Jamie S. Gorelick, a former deputy attorney general under President Clinton — have vehemently criticized the miniseries project. And two former Clinton officials, Madeleine Albright and Samuel "Sandy" Berger, expressed dismay with Kean's involvement. Clinton spokesman Jay Carson called ABC's actions "despicable" and said the film was "indisputably wrong."

Kean, in an interview Friday, continued to defend the movie as a "first-class project," adding that although the filmmakers took the recent criticisms seriously and made adjustments when warranted, much of the hostile reaction was political grandstanding from partisans who had seen little if any of the film. "That's the blogosphere, frankly," Kean said of the controversy.

The situation was further complicated Friday, when ABC and other networks agreed to carry live a 15-minute speech from President Bush on Monday night, the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. This speech will air at 9 p.m. Eastern time, forcing ABC to interrupt Part 2 of the miniseries in many markets, including New York and Chicago.

The sharp partisan divide over the miniseries has been seized upon in recent days by radio talk show hosts, bloggers, columnists and the like, so much so that the rancor has largely overshadowed the film's critical reception, which has been mixed.

The flap also underscores the challenges docudramas face in such a hyper-politicized environment. In 2003, supporters of President Reagan were incensed by a CBS movie that fictionalized scenes and put words into Reagan's mouth. CBS yanked "The Reagans" before its airdate and moved it to a much-less-watched sister network, the pay cable outlet Showtime.

Indeed, many conservatives have complained that Democrats have a selective memory. They point out that Democrats seemed unconcerned about Michael Moore's 2004 documentary "Fahrenheit 9/11," which pilloried the Bush administration for its response to the terrorist attacks. (Then-Disney Chief Executive Michael Eisner, saying he wanted the company to avoid political controversy, declined to release that film; it obtained another distributor.) Conservative radio commentator Rush Limbaugh recently labeled Clinton and Democrats as "just a bunch of thin-skinned bullies now trying to pressure ABC."

When ABC announced "Path to 9/11" last summer, executives seemed to expect a groundbreaking movie that could garner high ratings, even if they did not anticipate the political uproar.

Steve McPherson, the network's entertainment chief, compared the project to ABC's 1983 TV movie "The Day After," which examined the aftermath of a nuclear strike in middle America. "That was such an important movie for a lot of people, and it wasn't about entertainment," McPherson told the trade paper Daily Variety. "It was about putting out a message, and this ['Path to 9/11'] falls into the vein of things you do because you think they can be valuable."

But the network may have at least inadvertently politicized the Sept. 11 film by hiring writer-producer Cyrus Nowrasteh, a politically conservative Iranian American Muslim.

In an interview last month with FrontPage Magazine, Nowrasteh, whose writing credentials include TNT's acclaimed miniseries "Into the West," said the ABC film would be unsparing in its view of anti-terrorism during the Clinton years. "The 9/11 report details the Clinton's administration's response — or lack of response — to Al Qaeda and how this emboldened Bin Laden to keep attacking American interests," Nowrasteh said. "The worst example is the response to the October 2000 attack on the USS Cole in Yemen where 17 American sailors were killed. There simply was no response. Nothing."

Former Clinton aides have disputed Nowrasteh's characterization of the report and the administration's reaction to the Cole bombing.

An Aug. 23 screening of the ABC miniseries at the National Press Club in Washington proved a turning point. More than 200 people attended, including Kean, the producers and many family members of Sept. 11 victims. The producers showed only the first half, and a DVD of the entire film was given to guests on the way out. Al Felzenberg, press secretary for the Sept. 11 commission, said that afterward there was "a lot of emotion in the room." "It was very gripping," he added.

Others were outraged.

"There were significant deviations from our report," said Ben-Veniste, who attended the event. During a question-and-answer period after the screening, he added, "I questioned why ABC would fictionalize events that were set forth with great care. We didn't get satisfactory answers."

By the middle of this week, Democratic protests clustered around two main areas. The film, they said, falsely claims that former national security advisor Berger and former Secretary of State Albright blocked CIA and military efforts to kill Bin Laden in the late 1990s.

Moreover, critics say, "Path to 9/11" is wrong to suggest that Clinton was too preoccupied with the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal to focus on combating terrorism.

Because ABC has apparently made many edits to the film in recent weeks, it's impossible to say how much if any of this material will survive in the version that is to air Sunday and Monday.

But Leo Braudy, a professor and cultural historian at USC, said he believed the dust-up stemmed from the fact that "there is no narrative that everyone accepts about 9/11."

"The 9/11 commission comes out with one narrative, which no one reads. Then movies take a piece of it — there's 'United 93' and 'World Trade Center.' The Bush administration is pushing its own narrative of the meaning of 9/11 as justification for its policies. And now a miniseries comes into being that creates a narrative in a semi-documentary, fictionalized manner, which is very persuasive.

"Suddenly people who felt they know what really happened are being preempted by this fiction. Naturally they are going to be upset about it," he said. "Narrative creates closure."

Braudy wonders whether Americans are ready to see movies on the terrorist attacks: "I don't think we have enough historical distance."

Clinton, Other Democrats Assail ABC Docudrama 'Path To 9/11' (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton has urged ABC to "tell the truth" in its hotly disputed docudrama on the battle against Osama bin Laden as network executives scrambled to make last-minute changes to fictional scenes.

Clinton told reporters in Arkansas Thursday night that ABC executives should provide an honest accounting in "The Path to 9/11" -- "particularly if they're going to claim it's based on the 9/11 commission report, they shouldn't have scenes which are directly contradicted by the factual findings of the 9/11 commission. I just want people to tell the truth and not to pretend it's something it's not."

An ABC spokeswoman said yesterday that changes are being made to a number of scenes in the film, including one deletion involving The Washington Post. ABC plans to air the film tomorrow and Monday -- despite another letter from the Clinton camp yesterday asking that it be pulled -- although it is trying to figure out how to accommodate President Bush's prime-time speech Monday and a planned panel discussion after the movie.

Democrats -- joined yesterday by former vice president Al Gore -- have mounted a campaign against the film, which depicts Clinton administration officials as undermining attempts to capture or kill bin Laden. Actor Harvey Keitel, who plays an FBI agent in the film, has joined the critics, telling CNN's "Showbiz Tonight" that he has had arguments with the filmmakers over elements that were "wrong."

"You can't put these things together, compress them and then distort the reality. . . . You cannot cross the line from a conflation of events to a distortion of the event," Keitel said. "Where we have distorted something, we made a mistake, and it should be corrected."

In another salvo, nine prominent historians -- including Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., Sean Wilentz and Michael Kazin -- released a letter urging the film's cancellation. Calling ABC's explanation that the movie will be identified as a dramatization "disingenuous and dangerous," they said: "A responsible broadcast network should have nothing to do with the falsification of history, except to expose it."

One scene that is being revised -- to what extent is unclear -- involves former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger refusing to approve a CIA plan to snatch bin Laden in Afghanistan, which Berger and the Sept. 11 commission say never happened.

The Post is mentioned in an advance copy of the movie, in which CIA officials are seen discussing with an Afghan rebel leader and each other the difficulties of keeping track of bin Laden.

"Besides," one CIA official says, "ever since The Washington Post disclosed we intercept his calls, UBL has stopped using phones altogether. He is using couriers like they did a thousand years ago."

Post management contacted ABC and objected to the reference yesterday. An ABC spokeswoman said that the scene had already been reviewed at the request of the network's lawyers and that the explicit reference to The Post will be cut.

An Aug. 17, 1998, Post article quoted a former CIA official as describing "intercepted electronic communications among bin Laden associates." Four days later -- the day after a U.S. cruise missile attack against bin Laden launched in retaliation for the bombing of two American embassies in Africa -- a Washington Times article said that bin Laden "keeps in touch with the world via computers and satellite phones."

At a news conference in December, Bush said that "the fact that we were following Osama bin Laden because he was using a certain type of telephone made it into the press as the result of a leak." He chastised the media for helping "the enemy" by "revealing sources, methods and what we use the information for."

Scott McClellan, then the White House press secretary, said afterward that Bush was referring to the Washington Times article, which had also been cited in the Sept. 11 commission report.

But bin Laden's communications had been disclosed much earlier. Time magazine noted bin Laden's use of satellite phones in December 1996. Terrorism analyst Peter Bergen did the same thing on CNN in 1997 while reporting on an interview he had conducted with the al-Qaeda leader.

Bush Asks To Interrupt Show (KCS)

By David Bauder

The Kansas City Star, September 9, 2006

NEW YORK | ABC, still dealing with angry former Clinton administration officials about an upcoming Sept. 11, 2001, miniseries, also faced a request Friday from President Bush to interrupt the film for a speech.

The president has asked networks to clear time for an address to the nation at 8:01 p.m. Central time Monday, the scheduled start of the last hour of “The Path to 9/11.”

The network did not immediately say what it would do. It has said the miniseries, which stretches five hours commercial-free Sunday and Monday, is still being edited amid concerns by former Clinton officials that it drastically distorts history.

DOJ_NMG_0061242

"No one has seen the final version of the film, because the editing process is not yet complete, so criticisms of film specifics are premature and irresponsible," the network said in a statement Thursday.

ABC said that for dramatic and narrative purposes "the movie contains fictionalized scenes, composite and representative characters, and dialogue and time compression."

A group of historians, including Arthur Schlesinger Jr. and Princeton University's Sean Wilentz, wrote Friday to Robert Iger, CEO of Walt Disney Co., which owns ABC, urging him to scrap the miniseries. They said permitting inaccuracies to heighten drama is "disingenuous and dangerous."

The Democratic National Committee said it delivered a petition with nearly 200,000 signatures to ABC's Washington office urging the network to drop its "right-wing factually inaccurate mocudrama."

The controversy is reminiscent of the one that erupted over a 2003 CBS miniseries about the late Ronald Reagan. In the face of political pressure over that film's accuracy, CBS canceled it, and it later aired on the Showtime cable network.

Harvey Keitel, one of the actors in "The Path to 9/11," said he questioned whether some of the material was accurate.

"When I received the script, it said 'ABC history project,' " Keitel said in an interview with CNN Headline News' "Showbiz Tonight."

"I took it to be exactly what they presented to me: history. And that the facts were correct. It turned out not all the facts were correct, and ABC set out trying to heal that problem. In some instances it was too late because we had begun."

Scenes being reviewed by the network and producers involve Samuel Berger, the former national security adviser, and Madeleine Albright, the former secretary of state, and efforts to capture Osama bin Laden, according to an official close to the film.

A cut of the film distributed to TV critics depicts a team poised in darkness outside bin Laden's cave fortress in Afghanistan while an actor portraying Berger in Washington stalls on giving the final go-ahead to carry out the seizure. He confers on videophone with CIA chief George Tenet.

"Look, George," Berger says, "if you feel confident, you can present your recommendation to the president yourself."

Tenet responds angrily, then Berger's screen goes blank. He has hung up.

Having waited on the phone for clearance, the mission's lead CIA agent must give the rest of the team the bad news: The mission is aborted.

The next scene shows archival footage of President Bill Clinton's video testimony about his relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

Albright objected to a scene that reportedly shows her warning the Pakistani government before an air strike on Afghanistan, which she said was false and defamatory.

Former administration officials and Senate Democrats called the movie "terribly wrong."

Clinton, speaking with reporters after a Democratic fundraiser in Arkansas on Thursday, said that he had not seen the film but that "I think they ought to tell the truth."

The director, David Cunningham, in an earlier interview with The Associated Press, said the people putting the film together would hear conflicting reports all the time.

"These might be from experts who were there in the same room, and they're telling us completely opposite things," he said.

He said he would use the Sept. 11 commission report to try to resolve those disputes.

"There was no agenda for this movie to go after a particular party or person," Cunningham said. "We were showing what happened, and the people who were involved along the way. This is not a blue-state/red-state movie."

Former New Jersey governor Thomas Kean, a Republican who led the commission, defended the miniseries.

"It's something the American people should see," he said Friday in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America." "Because you understand how these people wanted to do us harm, developed this plot, and how the machinations of the American government under two administrations not only failed to stop them, but even failed to slow them down."

The Unslammed Phone (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Sandy Berger is lucky they didn't show him stuffing government documents into his bra.

After all, cinematic license is cinematic license.

Regarding ABC's tarted-up 9/11 movie that sparked a furor among Clintonites who felt they were unfairly blamed for the rise of Osama, I hate to be so quaint as to defend reality. There's not much point. It's as dead as dial-up.

DOJ_NMG_0061243

In Hollywood, reality comes with quotation marks around it, as in fixed and scripted "reality" shows. In New York, hybrids of fiction and nonfiction are lavishly rewarded; publishers want the reality part to sell the fiction part and the fiction part to enhance the reality part. In Washington, the Bush team is on a cynical and dangerous new pre-election push to present its fantasies about Iraq as reality, accusing reality-based critics of "moral or intellectual confusion," as Rummy put it.

When a reporter asked President Bush a couple of weeks ago what Iraq had to do with 9/11, he blurted out the truth: "Nothing." But momentarily dismissing that fantasy isn't about to dissuade him from others. "One of the hardest parts of my job is to connect Iraq to the war on terror,'' President Bush told Katie Couric this week. I bet. Making up is hard to do.

The administration's shameless mau-mauing was undercut yesterday by a 376-page Senate Intelligence Committee report slapping Bush hawks for relying on the flawed information provided by Ahmad Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress to help make the case for war. The report also reaffirmed that Saddam viewed Osama in a negative light, and unveiled a C.I.A. assessment rejecting the president's continuing claims about prewar links between Saddam and the Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. The 2005 C.I.A. finding concluded that Saddam "did not have a relationship, harbor, or even turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates."

W. is pulling out all the stops this week to try to make people forget he was in charge when the twin towers were hit, but if he's doing so great, why is Osama releasing new tapes while Afghanistan crumbles while Pakistan stands ready to implode while Lebanon has already exploded while Iran goes nuclear and taunts us while Al Qaeda in Iraq calls on its followers to kill Americans "by a sniper bullet, spear, explosive or martyrdom car"?

Conservatives are crowing at the prospect of an ABC movie written by one of their own that blames 9/11 on a flaccid Clinton national security team.

Bill was distracted by the Monica fallout, just as W. was distracted, on Osama and Katrina, by his insistence on living life as usual in Crawford. Bill had no natural inclination to use American force and fumbled on how to strike back at Osama. W., petulantly, did not want to focus on terrorism because his predecessor had.

W. had a clear narrative thread in 2001; all he needed to do was go after the bad guys who hit us. Instead, he obsessed about other bad guys who happened to pose no danger to us.

Why do presidents and filmmakers dealing with the most stunning events in recent American history feel the need to go beyond facts? Isn't the dire actuality enough? Oliver Stone implied that Lyndon Johnson and Nixon might have been in some tortuous way connected to plots to kill J.F.K.

The ABC movie promoted itself as a serious work based on the 9/11 commission report and featuring Tom Kean, the commission's co-chairman, as a co-executive producer. (It's impossible to imagine Earl Warren producing a movie about the events in Dallas.) But if it's making a claim upon people's attention as a trustworthy and accurate description of events that bear on all our lives, you've got to stick with the truth. You can't pick and choose when you want it to be history and when you want it to be art. (Quel art.)

Sandy Berger yelped about a scene that depicted him refusing to authorize a military strike to kill Osama and slamming down the phone on a C.I.A. officer at a key moment. Cyrus Nowrasteh, the Republican and Limbaugh pal who served as the writer and a producer, told KRLA-AM in Los Angeles that the scene was improvised.

They distorted history to throw in a standard cliché of melodrama? (The 9/11 Commission Report as Douglas Sirk would have filmed it.) Why compromise your movie by adding tacky things that don't increase its aesthetic power and detract from its moral power?

The argument over which president is to blame for 9/11 is tiresome. Both obviously bear some blame. There are no West Wing heroes in this story.

An Untrue 'Path'? (NSWK)

By Marc Peyser

Newsweek, September 9, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton is blasting the ABC 9/11 docudrama "The Path to 9/11" for being inaccurate and unfair. You've got to love the irony of that. Wasn't he the guy who hired Hollywood filmmakers to create a campaign biopic of his life? Sure, "The Path to 9/11" makes up dialogue, invents scenes and creates a composite character or two, but sometimes you have to craft the facts in a certain way to tell a complicated story. Just like sometimes you have to reconsider what the definition of "is" is when you don't want people to know you've had an affair with a White House intern.

But let's remove Clinton, and politics, from the situation. Does the president make a fair point? Is "The Path to 9/11" unfit for broadcast because it plays fast and loose with history? After all, "The Path to 9/11" claims to be a balanced and detailed account of the government's decadelong fight against extremist Islamic terrorists. It actually starts with the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center and tries to connect the many and disparate lines that became the blueprint for the attacks in 2001. The movie's theme is that government officials in two administrations had numerous opportunities to stop the various players—from the 19 hijackers to Osama bin Laden himself—but they bungled the job because they were overly concerned with political appearances and petty interagency feuds.

Clinton's major beef is over a scene where his security adviser Richard Clarke (played by Stephen Root), stops the CIA from assassinating bin Laden out of concern that the president wants to avoid any political damage should the mission go awry. The movie then cuts to real footage of Clinton testifying that "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky." The obvious implication is that Clinton ducked pulling the trigger because he was too preoccupied with his political future, especially since it was undermined by his own personal drama. (And if that implication isn't obvious enough, the camera immediately cuts from Clinton to a suggestive shot of the looming phallic Washington monument).

Was Clinton too distracted to act? Maybe. Is it plausible to suggest that? Certainly to some people, including the filmmakers. And frankly, that should be enough. "The Path to 9/11" isn't a documentary; it's a docu-drama. Part of the idea of fictionalizing historical events is to tell a story, to get at a deeper truth than a documentary could. After all those Oliver Stone movies—not to mention dozens of "reality" TV shows—viewers know the difference between real history and an entertainment that uses history as its subject. If the Reagans can survive the snarky look at their relationship posited by the mini-series "The Reagans," certainly Clinton can survive "The Path to 9/11," too. This isn't a history lesson. It's a television show.

That said, ABC shouldn't be let off the hook entirely for "The Path to 9/11." The mini-series itself—which, by the way, is hugely engrossing and more than a little scary—should stand on its own. But the network's own PR for the movie opened the door to Clinton's complaints. The filmmakers, including producer Marc Platt and director David Cunningham, have been very outspoken about how "The Path to 9/11" is steeped in history. They say it's based primarily on the government's own 9/11 Commission report.

Former New Jersey governor Tom Kean, who co-chaired the commission, was a senior consultant on the movie and has personally vouched for the movie's accuracy in recent months. "This is the story of how it happened," Kean said at a news conference in July. Added Platt: "Our ambitions and our goals and our standards were all about accuracy." ABC was so impressed with the "accuracy" of the movie, it has planned to send it to schools as a teaching tool. What's more, the network will show the movie with no interruptions, which seems like a tacit way of saying this movie is too important, too truthful to be sullied with something as phony as a commercial. Pompous? Oh, yeah.

And now that pomposity has come back to bite them in the behind. If ABC hadn't acted as if "The Path to 9/11" was the definitive word on the events leading up to 9/11, perhaps the public officials depicted in it, including former national-security adviser Sandy Berger and former secretary of State Madeleine Albright, wouldn't be complaining about inaccuracies. You can't sell your movies as "extraordinarily educational," which is how Platt has described it, then throw on the mantle of fiction when someone whose life was fictionalized complains.

The fact is, networks are always chicken when it comes to political pressure. After all, CBS got so nervous about "The Reagans" that it made sister network Showtime air it. Even though ABC says it's standing by its movie now, I wouldn't be surprised if some of the most egregiously fictionalized scenes—including one where Berger slams down the phone on a CIA operative—were excised when the mini-series hits the air. Frankly, the Monica Lewinsky references—there are actually just two of them—do come across as gratuitous and semipolitical and could easily be edited out, too. There's plenty of blame to go around in "The Path to 9/11" without them.

Congress Criticizes Federal Response To Illnesses After 9/11 And Seeks More Spending (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

After listening to recovery workers at ground zero and downtown residents emotionally describe how they had been ignored and insulted as they sought help for health problems after 9/11, members of a Congressional subcommittee roundly criticized the federal response yesterday and called for sharply increased medical spending.

Subcommittee members, joined by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles E. Schumer, accused the Bush administration of ignoring the health problems that arose among workers who toiled at ground zero and the claims of downtown residents who say they were also sickened by the dust. The administration has done little to prepare for a similar disaster in the future, they said.

"Today it appears the public health approach to lingering environmental hazards remains unfocused and halting," said Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican from Connecticut, and chairman of the House Subcommittee on National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations, which held the hearing in Lower Manhattan, a block from ground zero. "The unquestionable need for long-term monitoring has been met with only short term commitments."

DOJ_NMG_0061245

The subcommittee hearing, the fourth to be held since the Sept. 11 attack, came amidst rising concern about the long-term health effects on about 40,000 workers and volunteers who were exposed to toxic smoke and dust on the debris pile. The subcommittee is examining the way the limited federal funding has been used to address the health problems and is to look for ways to better coordinate those efforts.

Representative Vito Fossella, a Republican from Staten Island, criticized the government for not having done even basic work to record how many people participated in the cleanup and recovery operations.

Senator Schumer said the $55 million in federal funds set aside for medical treatment of rescue and recovery workers was inadequate. "We need a federal commitment that everyone who needs help will get it," Senator Schumer said.

Steven M. Centore, of Flanders, N.Y., was a team leader at ground zero for the Department of Energy's radiological assistance program. He said that he is now suffering from respiratory, circulatory and gastrointestinal problems. .

Mr. Centore, 49, said he struggled with the federal workers' compensation system and had received no financial help from the system. "I feel like it's a contest to see if they're going to give in first or I'm going to die first," he said.

The federal government, and especially the Environmental Protection Agency and its former administrator, Christine Todd Whitman, were accused by Representatives Jerrold Nadler, a Democrat whose district includes Lower Manhattan, and Anthony D. Weiner, a Democrat from Brooklyn, of having falsely stated in the first days after the attack that the air downtown was safe to breathe. At an appearance yesterday in Harlem, Senator Clinton said that she felt that Mrs. Whitman and her agency "deliberately misled people" into thinking that it was safe to return to Lower Manhattan.

A report by the Inspector General's office in 2003 found that the E.P.A. went beyond what it knew in making general statements about the safety of the air downtown after the attack. It also found that the White House had at least indirectly influenced the wording of some statements by removing cautionary language. Mrs. Whitman strongly defended herself shortly after the release of that report, saying that her statements reflected what was known at the time and applied to areas outside ground zero.

Lea Geronimo, a resident of the Lower East Side, said it was the assurance from the E.P.A. that led her to return to her home and office three blocks from ground zero a week after the towers collapsed. She said she developed bronchitis and severe rashes a few months later.

"Our lives will never be the same, and we will not tolerate half-measures and the whisper of a promise," she testified. "We need a comprehensive long-term treatment and study program to provide immediate care for residents and workers in Lower Manhattan."

The health of downtown residents has not been as well studied as that of ground zero workers, but limited medical surveys have indicated that many residents developed respiratory problems after 9/11, though the extent to which those problems have persisted is not known.

More than 100 residents gathered Thursday night at St. Paul's Chapel to demand screening and treatment.

Mr. Nadler, who attended the Thursday meeting and yesterday's hearing, said he had introduced a bill that would make rescue and recovery workers, downtown residents and schoolchildren who are sick eligible for treatment under Medicare.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of Manhattan and Queens, introduced a bill that would reopen the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund to make assistance available to those who are ill.

And Senator Clinton said at the hearing yesterday that she would push for an additional federal appropriation to cover the rising costs of medical treatment. "We cannot rest until we put into place a system to care for every single person who was affected by 9/11," she said.

Dr. John Howard, the federal 9/11 health care coordinator, told the committee that the $75 million appropriated for screening and treatment will be available next month and should be considered "a down payment," that will be supplemented as officials prepare estimates of the number of people who need help, the cost of caring for them and the types of programs they will need.

On Thursday, Dr. John O. Agwunobi, the assistant secretary for health of the Department of Health and Human Services, was named by Michael O. Leavitt, the department secretary, to lead a policy task force to develop programs for dealing with the 9/11 health issues.

Dr. Howard said he would continue in his current position as coordinator with groups in New York while also helping to shape new policies.

EPA, NYC Blamed For 9/11 Health Problems (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, September 9, 2006

City and federal officials came under withering criticism Friday from lawmakers who charged that ground zero workers were not protected as they clambered over a smoking pile of toxic debris — and have not been properly cared for since.

Former Environmental Protection Agency head Christie Todd Whitman was the most frequent target during a day-long House hearing about the health woes afflicting thousands of ground zero workers.

Whitman stressed in the days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that the air in lower Manhattan was safe, although she also said workers at the World Trade Center site needed to use protective breathing gear. In a "60 Minutes" segment to be aired Sunday, she said the responsibility for offering such gear to workers lay with the city.

Whitman is being sued over her public assurances, and she was accused Friday of doing too little to protect workers.

Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., who chaired the hearing, said Whitman's September 2001 statements "defied logic and everybody knows that."

Whitman defended herself Friday, insisting that it was up to local authorities to make sure rescue workers wore protective breathing gear.

"We agreed then, and I reiterate now, that the air on the site was not clean ... We were emphatic that workers needed to wear respirators, a message I repeated frequently. But I did not have the jurisdiction to force workers to wear them — that was up to their superiors," Whitman said in a statement.

City officials already under fire for their own role in the ongoing health problems disputed Whitman's claims.

City Health Commissioner Thomas Frieden said the federal government was responsible for work safety at the site, and added that he did not think Whitman's post-Sept. 11 assurances were "an appropriate way to word the message."

In a Sept. 13, 2001, press release, the EPA said the air around the disaster site was relatively safe. On Sept. 16, 2001, Whitman said that tests showed air pollution levels "that cause us no concern." Two days later, she said she was glad to reassure New York and Washington residents that their air and water were safe.

Others appearing at the hearing before the House Subcommittee on National Security, Emerging Threats, and International Relations, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., accused the EPA of lying to New Yorkers and endangering public health.

At a separate event Friday, Mayor Michael Bloomberg defended the city's handling of the disaster, saying it distributed masks.

"Nobody knew whether there would be health issues down the road, and they made the decisions that they thought were right at the time," said Bloomberg, who succeeded Rudolph Giuliani as mayor months after the attacks.

Joe Lhota, Giuliani's former deputy mayor for operations, said in a statement Thursday, "The EPA publicly reported that the general air quality was safe, and the city repeatedly instructed workers on the pile to use their respirators."

The hearing began with testimony from Joseph Zadroga, whose NYPD officer son died in January of respiratory disease attributed to ground zero exposure.

Joseph Zadroga briefly lost his composure as he described the day he found James Zadroga dead on his bedroom floor. The father blasted the city for doing nothing while his son was sick, saying, "He was treated like a dog."

Public pressure has been growing for the government to deal with health problems blamed on toxic dust at the site. This week Mount Sinai Medical Center released a study showing that nearly seven out of every 10 ground zero responders suffered lung problems.

Dr. Robin Herbert, co-director of the New York hospital's program monitoring afflicted workers, told lawmakers that new patients are still arriving at Mount Sinai to be treated for 9/11-related illnesses — and thousands probably will need lifelong care.

The Bush administration said it will continue to help sick Sept. 11 workers but would not say what their long-term health needs might cost.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told New York lawmakers Thursday that $75 million would be delivered in the next two months to pay for treatment programs.

Veterans Of Sept. 11 (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

One of the worst things about listening to those who rushed to ground zero after the attacks on Sept. 11 is that you can barely hear their stories. For many, the lungs hardly work. The cough, the ragged breathing, the confusion and even the bitterness make it hard for some of those who labored in that toxic cloud to explain how they feel forgotten. Like Steven Centore, a former federal worker from Flanders, N.Y., who became so emotional at a Congressional hearing in Manhattan yesterday that he had to be gently reminded of his own condition.

DOJ_NMG_0061247

Sick from his time working at ground zero, Mr. Centore was forced to pay for his treatment, and the federal government offered only one thing, he said: a "screening" that determined he was indeed sick. "You mean I'm just a data point for you," he recalled saying to the nurse filling out his forms.

People like Mr. Centore and maybe 40,000 others from across the country must be treated for diseases that become more obvious every week. As Mount Sinai Medical Center reported Tuesday, as many as seven in 10 of those who worked at ground zero and Fresh Kills on Staten Island have felt their lungs deteriorate because of their heroism.

What the veterans of Sept. 11 need now is a national response, which is not a strong suit these days in Washington. There are a number of partial efforts to help by city, state, federal and private sources. But somebody has to make sure that those who are suffering don't fall through the many gaps. Recommendations worth considering include putting those without health care under Medicare. The federal government should also restore the Victims Compensation Fund, which originally focused on victims' families and was phased out in 2003. This time the fund should pay for health care of these emergency workers. If something drastic is not done soon, there are lawsuits involving as many as 8,000 people that could end up costing taxpayers a lot more in the long run.

For some politicians, the message seems to have gotten through — especially as the nation remembers the attack five years ago this Monday. Members of Congress from the New York area have been pressuring to get more federal money for these responders. And Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, has promised to create a task force to provide some organization and to figure out the best ways to proceed. Creating a task force sounds like a delay rather than an answer, but the politicians from the Northeast who have been trumpeting this cause should now keep pestering Mr. Leavitt to move quickly.

As we pay homage on Monday to those who died on Sept. 11, 2001, it is worth remembering what happened on May 28, 2002. That evening — a scant 37 weeks after the attack — workers took down the last column from that smoldering mound and officially cleared the site. As one worker said of the herculean task completed by so many selfless people, "You found out who you were, what it means to be an American, what it is to stand up."

They came when the nation was attacked. Taking care of them now is a national obligation.

Washington School Still Feels Pain Of 9/11 (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — Sinita Brown will always prefer "the garden," a small plot shaded by the weathered brick walls of Madeleine V. Leckie Elementary School, of all the memorials to those killed in the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

Leckie Elementary lost a student, a teacher and two parents when American Airlines Flight 77 crashed into the Pentagon, killing 184 people. The student was Ms. Brown's son.

As President Bush prepares to mark the fifth anniversary with high-profile remembrances at the three crash sites, the elementary school will mark the day with a low-key ceremony. And the families of the school's four victims will cling to the bonds between them.

"Leckie is home," Ms. Brown, who now lives in Florida, said in a telephone interview. "No matter where we go, we will always come back. We were all happy there. Every time I am there, I feel like my son is a legend."

The families may have scattered, but the school and its garden remain a center of gravity, a place to steal away to and remember the last times their families were whole.

Built with the help of the Washington Architectural Foundation and other donors, the stretch of green includes a walkway, edged with the handprints of hundreds of students. Wooden benches in three sections represent those who were lost.

"Every time you go here, it reminds you that they were nice people and they didn't do anything wrong," said Arika Muse, a fifth grader who was in kindergarten in 2001.

Arika and some of her friends hope to speak at the school's Sept. 11 assembly on Monday. Soon, there will be no more students at Leckie with a clear memory of the day, although the older children have been told the story enough to pass it down.

Hilda E. Taylor, the teacher killed in the attack, was from Sierra Leone and had often lamented that Americans cared little about history and geography. Active with the National Geographic Society, Ms. Taylor took students on field trips sponsored by the organization.

In 2001, Ms. Taylor selected Ms. Brown's son, Bernard Brown II, a sixth grader with a magnetic personality and a permanent grin. Bernard, 11, was a good student, and Ms. Taylor thought a trip to the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary off California would motivate him to work even harder. Along on the trip were students and teachers from two other Washington schools, who were among those who died in the crash.

DOJ_NMG_0061248

While many of those affected by the attacks have come to know one another through grief, those from Leckie had been close before that day.

Drawing many of its students from military housing and a nearby homeless shelter, the school is tucked away in a neighborhood east of the Anacostia River, where the problems of poverty and crime often fail to draw notice in the rest of Washington.

"The crime goes on and on, but we do all we can do to hold up our families and keep moving forward together," said Clementine D. Homesley, the principal.

In 2004, vandals stole benches from the memorial garden. Benefactors replaced them.

The Browns lived in a military housing complex near the home of Andrea and Johnnie Doctor Jr., whose daughter attended Leckie and was a friend of Bernard. Mr. Doctor, a Navy information systems specialist, was one of the two Leckie parents killed. Marsha D. Ratchford, the other parent who died, lived with her family in an adjacent compound.

Bernard Brown Sr., often called Big Bernard, and Mr. Doctor, known as Doc, were basketball coaches on the military base and best friends. They were active at Leckie and ever present at their children's games. The families took turns picking up each other's children from schools and barbecued together on weekends.

Ms. Taylor was as much a friend as teacher. She helped Ms. Doctor, who was working to advance her nursing degree, with her college papers. She left her car at the Browns' house the morning of the trip so she and Bernard could go to the airport together.

"We were all family before Sept. 11," Ms. Doctor said. "And we are family now, for life."

Ms. Brown and Ms. Doctor still talk nearly every week. Ms. Homesley, Leckie's principal, keeps them posted on happenings at the school.

In June, the friends gathered at a park in Hampton, Va., where Ms. Brown's parents live, to celebrate what would have been Bernard's 16th birthday. Over hot dogs, ribs, fried fish and a birthday cake big enough to feed the more-than-100 guests, they reminisced and imagined the boy as a young man, showing off the Jeep his father had promised him as soon as he was old enough to drive.

"Nobody was shedding any tears that day," said Betty Carter, Bernard's grandmother. "Everybody was rejoicing because they knew he was looking down on us and rejoicing, too."

Ms. Doctor, who moved to South Carolina after her husband's death, returned to Washington in June. On the daily commute from her new job at a hospital in Virginia, she drives past the school, though it is not the quickest way home.

"It's like a calm comes over me here," she said, sitting on the bench dedicated to her husband. "The Pentagon was where he worked, but this school was someplace he really enjoyed."

The Browns have decided not to return to Washington for the school's memorial assembly. They will go, instead, to watch their daughter, Courtney, 12, play in a basketball game. That is what Bernard would have wanted to do, Ms. Brown said.

They will visit the school in their own time, when attention on the anniversary of their son's death has subsided.

"There is nothing but love up in that school," Ms. Brown said. "Genuine love."

He Bears The Mark Of His Loss Sadly (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A JAB, and then another, and another and another, almost like the riveting of bolts at a construction site. When the jabbing stopped an hour later, the two towers were soaring again from the Manhattan bedrock, their windows forever tinted red by the evening sun, their majesty forever set against a sky's lavender sighs.

This is how the World Trade Center always looked, at least from the dusky vantage point of a Starrett City rooftop in Brooklyn, at least in Jason Audiffred's memory. He would leave his family's sixth-floor apartment, ascend to the top of the building, and gaze west. Nothing like it, nothing in the world.

Now, at least, this special place had been restored, bolted with ink to Mr. Audiffred's beefy left bicep by an artist called Coney Island Vinny. The large and arresting tattoo, of course, means that the central catastrophe of our time is a part of him, always, in ways he can never escape.

But, he says, "I want to be reminded."

At 5-foot-9 and 245 pounds, with a shaved head and a nose sporting a diamond, Mr. Audiffred could be considered imposing, and his trade center tattoo only magnifies that sense. But there is something soft and wounded in his hazel eyes. He is 24, yet often seems on the verge of tears.

"He hasn't come to terms with it yet," says his mother, Robin, sitting beside him.

Her son does not disagree.

DOJ_NMG_0061249

Early every weekday morning, James Audiffred — Robin's husband, Jason's father — would drive west to the trade center, where he joined many other people who quietly kept the colossus clean and functioning. He had many trade center keys on his ring and, after 18 years of service, was operating one of the elevators in the north tower.

"From the 78th floor's sky lobby to the 107th floor, the Windows on the World," Jason Audiffred says. He remembers that his father would wear a blue blazer, blue slacks and a white shirt.

This father and son had a typical father-and-son relationship, which is to say loving, complex, occasionally tense, extremely tight. Yes, the father would get on the son for dropping out of high school and hanging around with the wrong people. But the father also played basketball with the son, cut his hair, built a carrying case for his D.J. equipment.

The two also shared a love for the trade center. The father took his only child to work with him so often that the boy knew many employees by their first names. The father also arranged for him to spend a summer as a tour guide on the south tower's observation deck. "To this day I have the view in my head," the son says.

On that day nearly five years ago, Mr. Audiffred saw the breaking news on television, raced up his apartment building to that familiar rooftop, and watched the ominous smoke belching from his father's workplace. James Audiffred went up that morning and never came down. No trace of him was ever recovered. He was 38.

On a day nearly four years ago, Mr. Audiffred sat down in a folding chair at a tattoo studio in Sheepshead Bay. He presented the artist with snapshots of a painting he owned, one of the trade center towers, and said: recreate it.

"I just wanted to bring the pain to my outer body," he says.

Jab, jab, jab, the riveting began.

After his tattoo, his first, was finished, his mother sat down for her first and only: a portrait of her husband, with his date of birth and date of death above her left breast. It hurt, she says, oh God did it hurt.

But without his body recovered, this is where her Jimmy is buried, near her heart.

Mr. Audiffred, who has trouble holding a job because, his mother says again, he "hasn't come to terms," eventually decided to get another tattoo, and another and another.

Tattoos became his therapy, Coney Island Vinny his therapist. Several of his tattoos relate to his passions: hip-hop, money, the Yankees.

Others, though, reflect that day and those towers. His right bicep, for example, now provides what he calls Part 2: a scene, also set at evening time and against a lavender backdrop, that depicts the hole at ground zero.

And beneath that first tattoo on his left bicep, beneath those idealized towers reaching for his shoulder, there now appears a question: "Why?"

"I never got an honest answer to why it happened," he says, his soft eyes searching.

After 5 Years, His Voice Can Still Crack (NYT)

By Joe Nocera

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TIME passes. Time heals.

A few days before the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, I went to see James J. Dunne III, the managing partner of the small investment banking firm Sandler O'Neill & Partners. Sandler O'Neill, you may recall, was one of the hardest hit firms that day. Its primary offices were on the 104th floor of the south tower of the World Trade Center; of the 83 employees (out of a total of 171) who were in the office that awful morning, only 17 made it out alive. Among the 66 who died were two of the three men who ran the firm: Herman Sandler, the co-founder, and Christopher Quackenbush, who headed investment banking.

Jimmy Dunne was the junior member of the ruling troika. He had been spared because he was on a golf course in Westchester County that morning, trying to qualify for an amateur tournament. Truth to tell, before 9/11, he was more focused on golf than on work. At 45, he had one foot out the door.

But I learned that only later, and it came as a surprise. The Jimmy Dunne I met shortly after 9/11 was more committed to his work than anyone I'd ever known. Thrust into a role he had never expected and had never prepared for — not just to lead Sandler O'Neill, but to save it — he embraced his task with an unnerving intensity.

Back then, he was everywhere, doing everything: comforting grieving families, hiring equity traders (the equity desk lost 20 of its 24 traders), asking for help from competitors to get into deals, writing eulogies for dead partners, going on CNBC to refute a report that the firm was going out of business, figuring out how to rebuild the computer systems, and on and on.

There was something so raw about him then, so fierce, as if his life truly depended on rebuilding Sandler O'Neill. I remember especially how openly emotional he could be. He would start talking about Mr. Sandler, who had been his mentor, or Mr. Quackenbush, his best friend forever, a man who helped him quit drinking in his 20's — and his eyes would well up while his voice would start to crack. He always seemed on the verge of losing it. But he never did.

DOJ_NMG_0061250

Five years later, Jimmy Dunne met me in his paneled office on Third Avenue and shook my hand. His hair was whiter than it used to be, and he'd gained a little weight. What was most apparent, though, was that the overpowering intensity that had characterized him after 9/11 had lifted.

Once we sat down, he immediately launched into a recitation about how much stronger the firm has become in recent years, with 255 employees, vastly improved research and a better mergers and acquisitions department. Though, he quickly added, things were more difficult this year because the "flat yield curve" was making trading profits tougher to come by.

I had to smile. So did he.

No one will ever accuse Jimmy Dunne of being the perfect boss. "He's not always the most patient listener, and he can be brutally blunt," said the firm's co-chief operating officer, Michael Lacovara, who joined a few years ago. "And I think he believes he can do anybody's job as well as they can do it themselves." But, added Mr. Lacovara, "if on Sept. 12, 2001, he hadn't felt that way, we wouldn't be here today." Mr. Dunne turned out to be the exact right person to lead Sandler O'Neill out of the abyss.

"What he did was a little akin to Rudy Giuliani," said Marc Maltz, the managing partner of the Triad Consulting Group, which worked with the firm, providing both organizational and psychological assistance for two years after 9/11. "He made decisions that gave people confidence. Once Jimmy worked it through in the first 48 hours and concluded that the firm would rebuild, he gave it the kind of leadership that was necessary."

There were two instinctive decisions he made in particular that would prove enormously beneficial over the long haul. First, he and several other surviving partners — who were also thrust into new leadership roles — made the snap decision that despite its crippled state, the firm would do right by the families of its deceased employees. It extended full benefits for five years for all the families. It set up a foundation to pay for the education of the 71 children who lost a parent who had worked at Sandler O'Neill. It offered years of psychological counseling not just to surviving employees but to family members of the deceased.

And in 2001, it paid out salaries and bonuses as if the employees were still alive and working. It also paid out the deceased partners' capital to their families, even though that depleted the firm's own capital. Indeed, as it completed deals or did trades in the latter part of 2001, it shared the proceeds with the families of deceased partners who had been working on those deals before 9/11.

These acts of generosity created a tremendous amount of good will for the firm. It motivated employees and caused clients and competitors and just about everyone else to rally around it. But that's not why Mr. Dunne took that path. Lots of small firms like to say they're a family, but at Sandler O'Neill it was actually true. "It really was a firm founded by friends who hired friends," Mr. Maltz said. More than anything else, the culture of the place drove Mr. Dunne's decision.

Mr. Dunne's second decision, equally instinctive and heart-felt, was to cast the rebuilding of Sandler O'Neill in moral terms. Partly, Mr. Dunne used the "they can't do this to us'' rhetoric, and partly he made the case that rebuilding the firm was something the deceased would want the survivors to do. But just as important, it gave the living a way to connect with one another, to do something after 9/11 that felt purposeful and important. "The organization had such a deep sense of moral purpose," marveled Mr. Maltz, who has written several papers about the underpinnings of Sandler O'Neill's revival.

Karen Fishman, one of the 17 employees who got out of the south tower before it collapsed, said: "Work was a way to deal with what happened. You needed to be with people who experienced what you experienced. You didn't want the firm to go away, because you needed it."

As with many Sandler O'Neill survivors, Ms. Fishman was suddenly handed new responsibilities. She buried herself in her work, sometimes thinking, after a 12-hour day, that she hadn't worked hard enough. But as the firm got stronger, those feelings lifted, and she began to feel instead that she should spend more time with her children. So in 2003, she left the firm. Time was passing. Time was healing.

Mr. Dunne believes that the decisions he and the other new leaders of the firm made back then gave them a confidence they hadn't had before. And that also helped Sandler O'Neill become a bigger, stronger firm. "It was like we were in a cave, and we were making decisions without having any idea what other firms were doing," he said. "And then we saw others doing the same things we did. Usually when you are a small firm, you wait to see what the big firms are going to do. But we didn't wait for anyone's lead. And I think that has given us the confidence to believe that there isn't a piece of business in our niche that we shouldn't compete for — and get."

Today, of course, the number of employees hired since 9/11 vastly exceeds the number who were there that day. Still, I was astonished to discover that 74 of the 105 employees who worked for Sandler O'Neill on Sept. 12, 2001, are still there. But there's not much of a gap anymore between the new people and the old ones, as there inevitably was for the first year or so. And for the most part, even the old-timers now view 9/11 as an event that has slowly receded into the past.

"I don't need to go back there," said William Hickey, who now helps run the firm's M.& A. department. "I think about my friends all the time, but I don't think about the event itself."

DOJ_NMG_0061251

Indeed, the person who probably dwells the most on 9/11 is Mr. Dunne himself. Over time, the firm took down from the walls the many letters of support and grief it had put up after 9/11; Mr. Dunne's own collection came down last of all, and only at the urging of his sister, who told him that the time had come for him to do so.

But he hasn't taken them all down. In his office, he has several framed letters, including one from Mr. Quackenbush's brother, written shortly after the attack, urging him to rebuild the firm. Sandler O'Neill commissioned a sculpture with the names of the deceased employees, and placed it in the lobby of its office. But after a few years, some employees came to feel that it was too omnipresent a reminder of an event they were trying to move beyond. So Mr. Dunne had it moved to a small alcove just outside his own office, where he, at least, can see it every day.

Most of all, Mr. Dunne still feels a sense of moral purpose. It's just a little different now. Whereas rebuilding was once a way of honoring his deceased partners, now he feels something else. "What are our responsibilities to all the people who helped us or took an interest in seeing us do well?" he said. "We got letters from a farmer in Iowa and a teacher in South Korea. They took the time to say that they respected what we were doing. I feel a large responsibility to the world for helping us survive."

Not long ago, Mr. Dunne gathered his partners together and told them he wanted to extend the benefits to the families for another three years. Not a single one dissented.

Why did you do that? I asked him. "We did it because we feel fortunate," he replied, "more fortunate than when we first did it five years ago. It just felt like the right thing to do."

His voice suddenly cracked, just as it used to before the passage of time.

Declarations The Sounds That Still Echo From 9/11 (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Everyone remembers the pictures, but I think more and more about the sounds. I always ask people what they heard that day in New York. We've all seen the film and videotape, but the sound equipment of television crews didn't always catch what people have described as the deep metallic roar.

The other night on TV there was a documentary on the Ironworkers of New York's Local 40, whose members ran to the site when the towers fell. They pitched in on rescue, then stayed for eight months to deconstruct a skyscraper some of them had helped build 35 years before. An ironworker named Jim Gaffney said, "My partner kept telling me the buildings are coming down and I'm saying 'no way.' Then we heard that noise that I will never forget. It was like a creaking and then the next thing you felt the ground rumbling."

Rudy Giuliani said it was like an earthquake. The actor Jim Caviezel saw the second plane hit the towers on television and what he heard shook him: "A weird, guttural discordant sound," he called it, a sound exactly like lightning. He knew because earlier that year he'd been hit. My son, then a teenager in a high school across the river from the towers, heard the first plane go in at 8:45 a.m. It sounded, he said, like a heavy truck going hard over a big street grate. * * *

I think too about the sounds that came from within the buildings and within the planes -- the phone calls and messages left on answering machines, all the last things said to whoever was home and picked up the phone. They awe me, those messages.

Something terrible had happened. Life was reduced to its essentials. Time was short. People said what counted, what mattered. It has been noted that there is no record of anyone calling to say, "I never liked you," or, "You hurt my feelings." No one negotiated past grievances or said, "Vote for Smith." Amazingly -- or not -- there is no record of anyone damning the terrorists or saying "I hate them."

No one said anything unneeded, extraneous or small. Crisis is a great editor. When you read the transcripts that have been released over the years it's all so clear.

Flight 93 flight attendant Ceecee Lyles, 33 years old, in an answering-machine message to her husband: "Please tell my children that I love them very much. I'm sorry, baby. I wish I could see your face again."

Thirty-one-year-old Melissa Harrington, a California-based trade consultant at a meeting in the towers, called her father to say she loved him. Minutes later she left a message on the answering machine as her new husband slept in their San Francisco home. "Sean, it's me," she said. "I just wanted to let you know I love you."

Capt. Walter Hynes of the New York Fire Department's Ladder 13 dialed home that morning as his rig left the firehouse at 85th Street and Lexington Avenue. He was on his way downtown, he said in his message, and things were bad. "I don't know if we'll make it out. I want to tell you that I love you and I love the kids."

Firemen don't become firemen because they're pessimists. Imagine being a guy who feels in his gut he's going to his death, and he calls on the way to say goodbye and make things clear. His widow later told the Associated Press she'd played his message hundreds of times and made copies for their kids. "He was thinking about us in those final moments."

DOJ_NMG_0061252

Elizabeth Rivas saw it that way too. When her husband left for the World Trade Center that morning, she went to a laundry, where she heard the news. She couldn't reach him by cell and rushed home. He'd called at 9:02 and reached her daughter. The child reported, "He say, mommy, he say he love you no matter what happens, he loves you." He never called again. Mrs. Rivas later said, "He tried to call me. He called me."

There was the amazing acceptance. I spoke this week with a medical doctor who told me she'd seen many people die, and many "with grace and acceptance." The people on the planes didn't have time to accept, to reflect, to think through; and yet so many showed the kind of grace you see in a hospice.

Peter Hanson, a passenger on United Airlines Flight 175 called his father. "I think they intend to go to Chicago or someplace and fly into a building," he said. "Don't worry, Dad -- if it happens, it will be very fast." On the same flight, Brian Sweeney called his wife, got the answering machine, and told her they'd been hijacked. "Hopefully I'll talk to you again, but if not, have a good life. I know I'll see you again some day."

There was Tom Burnett's famous call from United Flight 93. "We're all going to die, but three of us are going to do something," he told his wife, Deena. "I love you, honey."

These were people saying, essentially, In spite of my imminent death, my thoughts are on you, and on love. I asked a psychiatrist the other day for his thoughts, and he said the people on the planes and in the towers were "accepting the inevitable" and taking care of "unfinished business." "At death's door people pass on a responsibility -- 'Tell Billy I never stopped loving him and forgave him long ago.' 'Take care of Mom.' 'Pray for me, Father. Pray for me, I haven't been very good.' " They address what needs doing.

This reminded me of that moment when Todd Beamer of United 93 wound up praying on the phone with a woman he'd never met before, a Verizon Airfone supervisor named Lisa Jefferson. She said later that his tone was calm. It seemed as if they were "old friends," she later wrote. They said the Lord's Prayer together. Then he said "Let's roll." * * *

This is what I get from the last messages. People are often stronger than they know, bigger, more gallant than they'd guess. And this: We're all lucky to be here today and able to say what deserves saying, and if you say it a lot, it won't make it common and so unheard, but known and absorbed.

I think the sound of the last messages, of what was said, will live as long in human history, and contain within it as much of human history, as any old metallic roar.

Ms. Noonan's column will appear weekly in Pursuits.

Twin Beams To Light Sky Again. But After 2008? (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

As twilight falls on Monday, the skies over Lower Manhattan will once again be pierced by the twin beams of the Tribute in Light.

Beginning in 2002 as a catch-as-catch-can improvisation, this one-night event has become something of a civic tradition. It is the celestial, silent taps that brings a day of remembrance to a close, a shared experience open simultaneously to almost anyone around the city.

Its future seems assured for the next two years. But after that?

“I’d say there’s a question mark,” said Kent L. Barwick, the president of the Municipal Art Society, the organizers of the Tribute in Light.

For one thing, the project may run out of money after 2008. For another, it may lose its current staging area atop the Battery Garage, six blocks south of ground zero; a rare expanse of secure open space downtown. A long-range redevelopment plan for the nearby area, known as Greenwich Street South, calls for demolishing the garage, though this is not on the immediate horizon.

And there is no guarantee that it will have a permanent home at the World Trade Center memorial, which is to open in 2009. “I haven’t heard anybody say, ‘Let’s forget about this,’ ” Mr. Barwick said yesterday. “At the same time, it has to be addressed.”

The Tribute in Light was first illuminated on March 11, 2002, six months after the terrorist attack. It was designed by John Bennett, Gustavo Bonevardi, Richard Nash Gould, Julian LaVerdiere and Paul Myoda, working with Paul Marantz, a lighting designer, and Michael Ahern, an event producer. It ran for a month.

Sept. 11, 2003, marked its next appearance. It has been illuminated for one night on each anniversary since.

In 2004, the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation authorized $3.5 million to run the tribute through 2008. That allowed the Municipal Art Society to purchase 88 Space Cannon searchlights, each four feet tall, with a 7,000-watt xenon bulb. They sit inside boxy steel frames, allowing them to be stacked for storage.

The fixtures, powered by temporary generators, are set out on the garage roof in two 50-by-50-foot squares, offset from each other as the twin towers were, though covering only 6 percent of the towers' area. The array is as ungainly to behold at close range as it is ethereal to see from afar.

"The art is in what they produce," said Frank E. Sanchis III, the senior vice president of the society. "It's never been about the light fixtures, it's been about the beacons. In a permanent installation, you'd have to worry about what it looks like." That is only one hurdle to placing the lights in the permanent memorial.

But its creators believe the Tribute in Light has an enduring value, in part because its silence and simplicity permit viewers to invest it with their own meaning or message. "One of the best things about this is that it is what it is," Mr. Ahern said. "There are no speeches attendant to it."

9/11 Memorial In N.J. Has 40 Extra Names (AP-Y)

By Janet Frankston

AP, September 9, 2006

A 100-foot-tall sculpture being unveiled on Monday's fifth anniversary of 9-11 honors thousands of terrorist attack victims, and then some: Carved into the granite base are the names of more than 40 people who weren't killed on Sept. 11 after all.

The majestic sculpture across the Hudson River from ground zero will feature 3,024 names of people once believed to have died in the 1993 and Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center. The problem is that the Russian artist who created the work used an outdated list of names of those missing at the trade center.

"We did the best that could have been done under the circumstances," said Emily Madoff, an attorney for artist Zurab Tsereteli.

Madoff said that she consulted several sources to try to determine the correct names before seeking confirmation from Kenneth Feinberg, the former special master of a federal Sept. 11 victim compensation fund, who referred her to a book published by The New York Times in 2003.

She said she never knew to contact the city, which has kept the official death toll for New York since the attacks.

She said she drew her list from the book, which identifies victims as of spring 2003. It includes 43 names that were removed by the medical examiner's office in October 2003 and January 2004 because the city couldn't confirm their deaths or, in some cases, their existence, according to Ellen Borakove, a spokeswoman for the medical examiner.

The names removed included illegal immigrants whose jobs were not well documented and missing people whose relatives say they were near the trade center on Sept. 11. Some claims were made up in attempts to rip off the government.

One name, Paul Herman Vanvelzer, was apparently a fabrication by a California woman who claimed she was a Sept. 11 victim's mother.

Some victims' family members said the erroneous names need to be removed.

"It kind of cheapens the whole thing," said Jack Lynch, whose firefighter son Michael Lynch was killed on Sept 11.

The memorial, called "To the Struggle Against World Terrorism," is not the only Sept. 11 tribute to run into such problems. In Jersey City, a memorial dedicated in 2002 to 40 victims was redone for $7,500.

The sculpture evokes the twin towers that once stood across the Hudson River. In the middle, a 40-foot steel teardrop hangs like a bell in the open center.

Its groundbreaking last September drew Russian President Vladimir Putin, and its dedication on Monday is expected to bring former President Clinton, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Gov. Jon S. Corzine.

The official Sept. 11 death toll stands at 2,973: 2,749 at the trade center, 184 at the Pentagon and 40 in Pennsylvania.

The planners of a memorial to open in 2009 at ground zero intend to list all those names, as well as the six people who died in the 1993 trade center bombing.

WAR NEWS:

Khatami: American "Conceit And Pride" Led To Iraq Mess (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, September 9, 2006

After Iran's hardline president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad challenged President Bush to a televised debate last week — and again warned the U.S. not to impose sanctions over Tehran's nuclear program — the White House approved his proposed September visit to attend the United Nations General Assembly in New York City. A few days before, over the objections of conservative Republicans and after a spirited administration debate, the U.S. approved a visit to several U.S. cities by Iran's former president, Mohammad Khatami — the highest ranking Iranian to tour since President Carter severed relations with Iran in 1979.

DOJ_NMG_0061254

Khatami, 62, served eight years as president before leaving office in 2005, and he remains close to Iran's powerful Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khameini. Khatami, whose trip is designed to foster a "dialogue between civilizations," spoke to TIME for more than an hour this week in a heavily guarded Washington hotel suite. As the most prominent of his nation's reformers, he repeatedly distanced himself from many of the hardline views of Iran's current leadership, but strongly critized the U.S. for what he suggested is "arrogance" in Iraq. He also cited human-rights violations at both Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib, and warned of the "costs" of a U.S. or Israeli military strike on his country. But he endorsed a "two-state solution" to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians, and called the Holocaust a "historical fact." Excerpts:

TIME: This is your first visit to Washington what do you think of the country that has been called the Great Satan?

Khatami: I never say "Great Satan." But I get really upset when Iran is called part of the "Axis of Evil." Even [Ayatollah] Khomeini [who coined the phrase] was referring only to U.S. policies — not to the American people or America itself, which is a great and big country.

TIME: Do you accept a two-state solution between Palestine and Israel? And does the government of Iran accept that?

Khatami: My opposition to Israel is moral. The peaceful solution to the problem of Palestine is to recognize Palestinian rights. This is the only way there could be sustained peace in the region.

TIME: And a Palestinian state to exist alongside Israel? Khatami: Yes.

TIME: Your successor [as president of Iran] has said that the Holocaust did not happen. How do you explain that?

Khatami: I personally believe that he really didn't deny the existence of Holocaust. I believe the Holocaust is the crime of Nazism. But it is possible that the Holocaust, which is an absolute fact, a historical fact, would be misused. The Holocaust should not be, in any way, an excuse for the suppression of Palestinian rights.

TIME: Bruce Laingen was the top American diplomat held hostage in Iran in 1979-80. And he has publicly raised a question in connection with your visit: What does the government of Iran owes the American hostages? And he's not talking about money. Morally?

Khatami: I regret the hostage crisis, hostage-taking. And I sympathize with the hostages and their families for their loss and their hurt. But this was [also] a revolutionary reaction to half a century of the U.S. taking Iran hostage. Maybe the other side [the U.S.] would be more indebted [to Iran].

TIME: Is there a civil war in Iraq?

Khatami: We are really concerned about this, but [there is no civil war], not yet.

TIME: Should Iraq be divided into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish zones?

Khatami: Definitely a bad idea. Iraq should remain unified. The solution is a democratic state. Numerically, the country is majority, Shiite, but the government is not yet sectarian. The president is a Kurd. The head of the government is a Shiite. The Sunnis have great, effective participation. So the breakup of Iraq is very dangerous. A democratic state can prevent from this from taking place.

TIME: President Bush's father did not occupy Iraq. What about the occupation of Iraq now?

Khatami: I don't know what President Bush, the father, would have done. But I know that eliminating Saddam [Hussein] has been to our benefit, to the benefit of Iran. I also predicted that getting into Iraq would be very easy [for America], but getting out of it would be extremely difficult. And today, Saddam is gone but Iraq has become the center stage of extremism and radicalism.

TIME: If you had any advice for the current President Bush, what would it be?

Khatami: The president should dispense peace and justice and reconciliation across the world. I believe that not only have U.S. policies not stopped terrorism, they have actually exacerbated and increased the problem.

TIME: Why?

Khatami: We could have resolved the Iraq issue without invasion and occupation without the cost in terms of human life, American lives, Iraqi lives and money. This could have been resolved. If the U.S. had not had such a sense of conceit and pride, or maybe even arrogance.

TIME: And the withdrawal of U.S. troops?

Khatami: The occupation should end as soon as possible [but] I believe we cannot just leave this newly born democratic government to the hands of terrorists, insurgents, and people who are seeking violence. The best way is to strengthen and to support the government, its security services, its police forces, and the best way to do that is also to get help from neighboring countries. The U.S. should know that it could get the help of Arab and Islamic countries to secure its interests,rather than without them.

DOJ_NMG_0061255

TIME: The U.S. has accused Iran of trying to build a nuclear weapon, and Iran has denied this. Is there a way out?

Khatami: Concern about proliferation is definitely justified. But in this region there are three states that possess nuclear weapons, with hundreds of warheads. The biggest [arsenal] is Israel. And then Pakistan and India. If there are serious concerns about nuclear weapons, we should start by eliminating those that already exist. And the U.S. does not display any sensitivity whatsoever to these issues, to these nuclear weapons. None of the three have signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, but Iran has. Iran has the right to have access to nuclear energy. And we are ready to give every guarantee that we would use this for peaceful purposes. Our leader [President Ahmadinejad] has issued a decree prohibiting the production and the stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction.

TIME: Do you believe that a military attack on Iran, either by Israel or the U.S., is a possibility that Iran should take seriously and guard against?

Khatami: Any aggression against Iran would have costs, serious costs for the U.S., more than for Iran. Public opinion in the world, and a great majority of the American public, would not support a military engagement.

TIME: Anything else?

Khatami: In Iran, whenever the issue is Iran's territorial integrity, no political faction, no political group would have any doubt as to defending Iran's actions. This unity and national consensus would be really costly for the invader and aggressor.

TIME: President Bush has promised that the U.S. will try to impose sanctions on Iran through the Security Council in the near future, if this matter is not resolved. What would be the result?

Khatami: Experience has shown that threats, pressure and coercion has never created a solution, has never made sanctions effective. Sanctions, and even more than that, possible military action and the use of force, would create more crisis in Iran, for the region, and for the world.

TIME: Do you believe Hezbollah won the war in Lebanon?

Khatami: I would say Israel lost the war. Israel has fought Arabs many times. It could even defeat, in six days, three or four Arab armies. But, you know, confronting Hezbollah, it couldn't achieve any of those objectives. Unfortunately, U.S. rushed into defending Israel, wholeheartedly.

TIME: How do you explain charges from the U.S. and other critics that there were human rights violations, terrorism, and a buildup of Iran's nuclear program when you were president?

Khatami: I don't claim that there have never been human rights violations in Iran but I [also] believe human rights are being violated everywhere, with different names. I believe the violation of rights of prisoners in Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib is not compatible — everybody should condemn the violation of human rights, everywhere. Double standards will not help.

TIME: When you were president of Iran, you used to complain, publicly, that you couldn't implement some of your reforms domestically and you couldn't take certain actions in foreign policy. Who stopped you? Was it hardliners who are now in control of Iran?

Khatami: I think democracy is a process. And this is especially [true] when there is external pressure, and dangers, the threat to the internal integrity of the nation. Definitely, there are people who have been theoretically against me, but when a major power explicitly says that it intends to overthrow a government...

TIME: Are you talking about the U.S.?

Khatami: Let me not [use] names. Those who officially put in their budgets money to overthrow the Iranian government — it's natural that the constraints on freedom and openness will increase as a result of a security environment [like that].

Senate: Saddam Saw Al-Qaida As Threat (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 9, 2006

Saddam Hussein regarded al-Qaida as a threat rather than a possible ally, a Senate report says, contradicting assertions President Bush has used to build support for the war in Iraq.

Released Friday, the report discloses for the first time an October 2005 CIA assessment that before the war, Saddam's government "did not have a relationship, harbor or turn a blind eye toward" al-Qaida operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi or his associates.

Saddam told U.S. officials after his capture that he had not cooperated with Osama bin Laden even though he acknowledged that officials in his government had met with the al-Qaida leader, according to FBI summaries cited in the Senate report.

"Saddam only expressed negative sentiments about bin Laden," Tariq Aziz, the Iraqi leader's top aide, told the FBI.

The report also faults intelligence gathering in the lead-up to the 2003 invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0061256

As recently as an Aug. 21 news conference, Bush said people should "imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein" with the capacity to make weapons of mass destruction and "who had relations with Zarqawi."

Democrats contended that the administration continues to use faulty intelligence, including assertions of a link between Saddam's government and the recently killed al-Zarqawi, to justify the war in Iraq.

They also said, in remarks attached to Friday's Senate Intelligence Committee document, that former CIA Director George Tenet had modified his position on the terrorist link at the request of administration policymakers.

Republicans said the document, which compares prewar intelligence with post-invasion findings on Iraq's weapons and on terrorist groups, broke little new ground. And they said Democrats were distorting it for political purposes.

A previous report in 2004 made clear the intelligence agencies' "massive failures," said Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., a member of the committee. "Yet to make a giant leap in logic to claim that the Bush administration intentionally misled the nation or manipulated intelligence is simply not warranted."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the report was "nothing new."

A second part of the report concluded that false information from the Iraqi National Congress, an anti-Saddam group led by then-exile Ahmed Chalabi, was used to support key U.S. intelligence assessments on Iraq.

It said U.S. intelligence agents put out numerous red flags about the reliability of INC sources but the intelligence community made a "serious error" and used one source who concocted a story that Iraq was building mobile biological weapons laboratories.

The report also said that in 2002 the National Security Council directed that funding for the INC should continue "despite warnings from both the CIA, which terminated its relationship with the INC in December 1996, and the DIA (Defense Intelligence Agency), that the INC was penetrated by hostile intelligence services, including the Iranians."

According to the report, postwar findings indicate that Saddam "was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime."

It said al-Zarqawi was in Baghdad from May until late November 2002. But "postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture al-Zarqawi and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi."

In June 2004, Bush defended Vice President Dick Cheney's assertion that Saddam had "long-established ties" with al-Qaida. "Zarqawi is the best evidence of connection to al-Qaida affiliates and al-Qaida," the president said.

The report concludes that postwar findings do not support a 2002 intelligence report that Iraq was reconstituting its nuclear program, possessed biological weapons or had ever developed mobile facilities for producing biological warfare agents.

"The report is a devastating indictment of the Bush-Cheney administration's unrelenting, misleading and deceptive attempts to convince the American people that Saddam Hussein was linked with al-Qaida," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., a member of the committee.

Levin and Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the top Democrat on the panel, said Tenet told the committee last July that in 2002 he had complied with an administration request "to say something about not being inconsistent with what the president had said" about the Saddam-terrorist link.

They said that on Oct. 7, 2002, the same day Bush gave a speech speaking of such a link, the CIA had sent a declassified letter to the committee saying it would be an "extreme step" for Saddam to assist Islamist terrorists in attacking the United States.

They said Tenet acknowledged to the committee that subsequently issuing a statement that there was no inconsistency between the president's speech and the CIA viewpoint was "the wrong thing to do."

Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said the mistakes of prewar intelligence have long been known and "the additional views of the committee's Democrats are little more than a rehashing of the same unfounded allegations they've used for over three years."

The panel report is Phase II of an analysis of prewar intelligence on Iraq. The first phase, issued in July 2004, focused on the CIA's failings in its estimates of Iraq's weapons program.

The second phase had been delayed as Republicans and Democrats fought over what information should be declassified and how far the committee should delve into the question of whether policymakers may have manipulated intelligence to make the case for war.

Committee member Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said he planned to ask for an investigation into the amount of information remaining classified. He said, "I am particularly concerned it appears that information may have been classified to shield individuals from accountability."

Report Details Errors Before War (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The long-awaited Senate Intelligence Committee report released yesterday sheds new light on why U.S. intelligence agencies provided inaccurate prewar information about Saddam Hussein and his weapons programs, including details on how Iraqi exiles who fabricated or exaggerated their stories were accepted as truthful because they passed Pentagon lie detector tests.

The two newly declassified chapters of the report fueled political accusations yesterday that the Bush administration lied to justify invading Iraq, but the documents' nearly 400 pages contain several examples of how bad information wound up accepted as truthful in intelligence assessments at the time.

A section includes the results of an evaluation by the CIA of its performance, which concludes that, despite repeated prewar assessments that the Iraqis were practicing deceit and deception to hide their weapons, there actually were no such efforts because there were no weapons.

The CIA concludes: "There comes a point where the absence of evidence does indeed become the evidence of absence." That statement is a play on a remark Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made frequently in the months before the war -- after U.N. inspectors in late 2002 and early 2003 could find no weapons -- that "the absence of evidence is not evidence of absence."

One 208-page chapter from the Senate committee report covers the use of intelligence provided by the Iraqi National Congress and its leader, Ahmed Chalabi. The panel wrote that three Iraqi exiles gave the Pentagon inaccurate information about Hussein's alleged training of al-Qaeda terrorists, as well as about the existence of mobile biological weapons factories and an alleged meeting between the Iraqi leader and Osama bin Laden. All three exiles passed lie detector tests given by the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), adding credibility to their stories.

In each case, the information proved to be questionable, if not inaccurate. But in the case of the mobile labs, the source's information was used to corroborate data in the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq even after the informant had been tagged as a fabricator.

The report notes that a DIA official who knew that the source was unreliable sat in on two meetings in which the mobile labs information was incorporated into the speech Secretary of State Colin L. Powell delivered in February 2003 to the U.N. Security Council, but that the official did not realize the information was based solely on the word of the untrustworthy source.

According to the Senate panel's report, another Iraqi National Congress source, recommended to the DIA by Chalabi through a high-ranking Defense Department official, passed two lie detector tests after "claiming to have seen Saddam meeting with a man, who Uday Hussein [Saddam's son] identified as bin Laden." The source said Uday Hussein told him that bin Laden was there "to discuss training of some of his people in Iraq."

The DIA subsequently distributed the information but pointed out that the source was connected with the Iraqi opposition and that the information "may have been intended to influence as well as inform decision makers." The CIA later noted in its assessment of the information that the meeting between Hussein and bin Laden had "not been corroborated" and that "other sensitive reporting . . . provides no indication that Saddam and bin Laden have met each other."

Although the Senate report raises questions about the reliability of the information provided by Iraqi exiles, it notes that the information had little direct impact on the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq produced in October 2002. Many of the Iraqi National Congress claims, however, were passed on to the White House and the office of Vice President Cheney through reports by a separate intelligence analysis group established by then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith.

The Senate committee's inquiry into the Feith group's activities, another part of the prewar intelligence study, has been delayed by committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), who is awaiting the completion of a Pentagon inspector general inquiry into the same matter.

One surprising conclusion from the CIA retrospective is that the agency now believes that aggressive U.N. inspections in Iraq in 1991 after the Persian Gulf War led Hussein to what it describes as a "fateful decision." He covertly dismantled and destroyed the undeclared nuclear, chemical and biological facilities, materials and actual weapons he had put together in the preceding decade -- along with "the records that could have verified that unilateral destruction."

As a result, there was no proof in 2002 and 2003 when the Iraqis claimed they had no weapons of mass destruction, and Hussein could not demonstrate he was in basic, if not complete, compliance with U.N. resolutions. Noncompliance with the Security Council's October resolution was the main U.S. public rationale for the invasion of Iraq.

Senate: Hussein Wasn't Allied With Al Qaeda (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061258

Iraq rebuffed Bin Laden and wanted to capture Zarqawi, the Intelligence Committee reports, contradicting Bush's argument for invasion.

WASHINGTON — The Senate Intelligence Committee on Friday said it had found no evidence that Saddam Hussein had ties to Al Qaeda or provided safe harbor to one of its most notorious operatives, Abu Musab Zarqawi — conclusions contradicting claims by the Bush administration before it invaded Iraq.

In a long-awaited report, the committee instead determined that the former Iraqi dictator was wary of Al Qaeda; repeatedly rebuffed requests from its leader, Osama bin Laden, for assistance; and sought to capture Zarqawi when the terrorist turned up in Baghdad.

The findings are the latest in a series of high-profile studies to dispute some of the Bush administration's key arguments for invading Iraq — mainly that the Hussein regime possessed stockpiles of banned weapons and had cultivated ties to terrorist networks. Presenting these since-discredited allegations as fact, President Bush and other high-ranking officials argued that Hussein's government posed an intolerable risk in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The 356-page report is certain to fuel the election-season debate over the administration's foreign policy at a time when Bush is seeking to shore up support for the war in Iraq through a series of speeches that cast the conflict as central to winning the larger war on terrorism.

Bush on Thursday again asserted that the battle in Iraq was inextricably linked to Al Qaeda, and disparaged those who considered it a "diversion" from the war on terrorism.

White House spokesman Tony Snow on Friday downplayed the significance of the report, describing it as "nothing new."

"It's … kind of relitigating things that happened three years ago," Snow said. "In 2002 and 2003, members of both parties got a good look at the intelligence we had, and they came to the very same conclusions about what was going on."

In one of its main conclusions, the report said that "postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of Al Qaeda and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from Al Qaeda to provide material or operational support."

According to the report, Hussein has told U.S. interrogators that "if he wanted to cooperate with the enemies of the U.S., he would have allied with North Korea or China." His former deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, told U.S. interrogators that "Saddam only expressed negative sentiments about Bin Laden."

The report's disclosures include a classified assessment by the CIA last year that Hussein's regime "did not have a relationship, harbor or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates."

The committee, made up of eight Republicans and seven Democrats, said U.S. intelligence agencies before Sept. 11 "accurately characterized" Bin Laden's intermittent interest in pursuing assistance from Iraq, but were largely wrong about Hussein's attitudes.

The Iraqi leader, according to the report, was so wary of the terrorist network that he "issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with Al Qaeda."

Democrats seized on the findings Friday to accuse the Bush administration of having distorted the threat Iraq posed.

In a speech on the Senate floor, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, accused the White House of pursuing "a deceptive strategy of using intelligence reporting that the intelligence community had already warned was uncorroborated, unreliable and, in critical instances, fabricated."

The report released Friday is based largely on documents recovered from Iraqi facilities in the aftermath of the U.S. invasion in March 2003, as well as interrogations of Hussein and other Iraqi officials captured by coalition forces.

As a result, it represents the most thorough comparison to date of prewar suspicions with evidence subsequently collected. Much of the information was unavailable to U.S. intelligence agencies and policymakers before the war.

The report's publication was marked by intense political wrangling within the Republican-controlled Intelligence Committee, with two GOP members — Sens. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska — breaking ranks to vote in favor of conclusions drafted by Democrats.

In a statement, Snowe cited the "obligation of our government to learn from these horrific mistakes" and complained that the intelligence panel, "once noted for its bipartisanship, has become marred by partisan feuding." Hagel was not available for comment.

The dispute put Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), the committee's chairman, in the awkward position of touting the work of his panel while urging the public to ignore some of its conclusions.

"Overall, I am disappointed that some of my colleagues have twisted the facts to reach conclusions that support other agendas," Roberts said. "It is my view that the public should not focus on the conclusions in this report, but rather on the underlying facts."

In particular, Roberts objected to findings that he said overstated the influence of the Iraqi National Congress — an exile group led by Ahmad Chalabi that had close ties to the Bush administration and has been accused of funneling prewar misinformation about Baghdad's weapons programs to U.S. intelligence agencies and news organizations.

The committee devoted 207 pages to an analysis of the INC, concluding that it had "attempted to influence U.S. policy on Iraq by providing false information through defectors."

Another section focused on the erroneous prewar estimates by the CIA and other agencies that Baghdad had stockpiles of chemical and biological munitions and was pursuing the development of nuclear arms.

But the most significant new information in the report focuses on Baghdad's alleged ties to Al Qaeda.

The CIA and other intelligence agencies were generally skeptical that Hussein had significant links to the terrorist group. But Vice President Dick Cheney and other senior administration officials have persistently highlighted isolated intelligence reports suggesting a relationship between Hussein and Bin Laden. The Senate report contradicts many of those assertions.

The report concludes, for instance, that it is true that Zarqawi was in Baghdad for about seven months in 2002. But Hussein was initially unaware of his presence in the country and later ordered his intelligence services to capture Zarqawi, according to the report.

The attempt was unsuccessful, and Zarqawi escaped to Iran. He also hid in areas of northern Iraq beyond Hussein's reach. After Hussein was overthrown, Zarqawi led the deadly insurgency against U.S. forces before he was killed by a U.S. airstrike in June.

Even as administration officials insisted on a Hussein-Al Qaeda link, they steered clear of alleging a direct role by the Iraqi strongman in the Sept. 11 attacks.

And at a news conference last month, Bush said flatly that Hussein had "nothing" to do with the assaults. Still, a CNN poll released this week found that 43% of U.S. residents said they believed Hussein was personally involved in the attacks; 52% said he was not.

The committee's report also dismisses a contention repeatedly cited by Cheney that an Iraqi intelligence agent met with Sept. 11 hijacker Mohamed Atta in Prague in April 2001. That claim has bolstered public perceptions that Iraq was somehow linked to the Sept. 11 attacks.

But postwar evidence indicates no such meeting ever occurred, the committee found, citing Atta's travel and cellphone records obtained by the FBI, as well as information from the Iraqi agent alleged to have attended the meeting.

The report casts similar doubt on assertions that Iraq had provided chemical and biological weapons training to Al Qaeda operatives, or allowed terrorist organizations to practice for attacks on aircraft at a facility south of Baghdad known as Salman Pak.

Despite reports of repeated contacts between Iraq and Al Qaeda, the committee said, U.S. intelligence has been able to assemble evidence of only a single meeting — a 1995 encounter in Sudan between Bin Laden and Iraqi intelligence officer Faruq Hijazi.

In postwar debriefings, Hijazi said that Hussein had instructed him to "only listen" and not negotiate or offer support to Bin Laden. He said that Bin Laden "requested an office in Iraq, military training for his followers, Chinese sea mines and the broadcast of speeches from an anti-Saudi cleric."

Hijazi said that he "immediately rejected" virtually all of the requests, offering only to consider broadcasting anti-Saudi speeches.

Overall, the document portrays Hussein and his underlings as alarmed by U.S. accusations linking him to Al Qaeda.

At one point, the report said, Hussein was warned by the director of Iraq's intelligence service "that U.S. intelligence was attempting to fabricate connections between the [Iraqi intelligence services] and Al Qaeda" to justify an invasion.

The Senate report also offers new theories as to why Hussein's regime was unable to convince U.N. inspectors before the U.S. invasion that it no longer had stocks of illegal weapons.

A recent CIA analysis concluded that Hussein was stunned by the aggressiveness of weapons inspections after the 1991 Gulf War, and ordered the covert destruction of undeclared weapons and documents.

In the process, Hussein destroyed the very records U.N. inspectors sought a decade later when putting pressure on Iraq to account for its illicit weapons.

"The result was that Iraq was unable to provide proof when it tried at a later time to establish compliance," the report said, citing the CIA study.

*

C.I.A. Said To Find No Hussein Link To Terror Chief (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — The Central Intelligence Agency last fall repudiated the claim that there were prewar ties between Saddam Hussein's government and an operative of Al Qaeda, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, according to a report issued Friday by the Senate Intelligence Committee.

The disclosure undercuts continuing assertions by the Bush administration that such ties existed, and that they provided evidence of links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. The Republican-controlled committee, in a second report, also sharply criticized the administration for its reliance on the Iraqi National Congress during the prelude to the war in Iraq.

The findings are part of a continuing inquiry by the committee into prewar intelligence about Iraq. The conclusions went beyond its earlier findings, issued in the summer of 2004, by including criticism not just of American intelligence agencies but also of the administration.

Several Republicans strongly dissented on the report with conclusions about the Iraqi National Congress, saying they overstated the role that the exile group had played in the prewar intelligence assessments about Iraq. But the committee overwhelmingly approved the other report, with only one Republican senator voting against it.

The reports did not address the politically divisive question of whether the Bush administration had exaggerated or misused intelligence as part of its effort to win support for the war. But one report did contradict the administration's assertions, made before the war and since, that ties between Mr. Zarqawi and Mr. Hussein's government provided evidence of a close relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

As recently as Aug. 21, President Bush said at a news conference that Mr. Hussein "had relations with Zarqawi.'' But a C.I.A. report completed in October 2005 concluded instead that Mr. Hussein's government "did not have a relationship, harbor or even turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates," according to the new Senate findings.

The C.I.A. report also contradicted claims made in February 2003 by Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, who mentioned Mr. Zarqawi no fewer than 20 times during a speech to the United Nations Security Council that made the administration's case for going to war. In that speech, Mr. Powell said that Iraq "today harbors a deadly terrorist network'' headed by Mr. Zarqawi, and dismissed as "not credible'' assertions by the Iraqi government that it had no knowledge of Mr. Zarqawi's whereabouts.

The panel concluded that Mr. Hussein regarded Al Qaeda as a threat rather than a potential ally, and that the Iraqi intelligence service "actively attempted to locate and capture al-Zarqawi without success.''

One of the reports by the committee criticized a decision by the National Security Council in 2002 to maintain a close relationship with the Iraqi National Congress, headed by the exile leader Ahmad Chalabi, even after the C.I.A. and the Defense Intelligence Agency had warned that "the I.N.C was penetrated by hostile intelligence services," notably Iran.

The report concluded that the organization had provided a large volume of flawed intelligence to the United States about Iraq, and concluded that the group "attempted to influence United States policy on Iraq by providing false information through defectors directed at convincing the United States that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and had links to terrorists."

The findings were released at an inopportune time for the Bush administration, which has spent the week trying to turn voters' attention away from the missteps on Iraq and toward the more comfortable political territory of the continued terrorist threat. On Friday, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, played down the reports, saying that they contained "nothing new" and were "re-litigating things that happened three years ago."

"The important thing to do is to figure out what you're doing tomorrow, and the day after, and the month after, and the year after to make sure that this war on terror is won," Mr. Snow said.

The two reports released Friday were expected to be the least controversial aspects of what remains of the Senate committee's investigation, which will eventually address whether the Bush administration's assertions about Iraq accurately reflected the available intelligence. But unanticipated delays caused them to be released in the heat of the fall political campaign.

The reports were approved by the committee in August, but went through a monthlong declassification process. It was Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the committee's Republican chairman, who set early September as the release date.

The committee's report in 2004, which lambasted intelligence agencies for vastly overestimating the state of Iraq's nuclear, biological and chemical weapons programs, was issued with unanimous approval. But the reports released Friday provided evidence of how much the relationship between Republicans and Democrats on the committee had degenerated over the past two years.

A set of conclusions that included criticism of the administration's ties with the Iraqi National Congress was opposed by several Republicans on the panel, including Mr. Roberts, but was approved with the support of two Republicans, Chuck Hagel, of Nebraska, and Olympia Snowe, of Maine, along with all seven Democrats. Senator Roberts even took the unusual step of disavowing the conclusions about the role played by the Iraqi National Congress, saying that they were "misleading and are not supported by the facts."

DOJ_NMG_0061261

The report about the group's role concluded that faulty intelligence from the group made its way into several prewar intelligence reports, including the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate that directly preceded the Senate vote on the Iraq war. It says that sources introduced to American intelligence by the group directly influenced two key judgments of that document: that Mr. Hussein possessed mobile biological weapons laboratories and that he was trying to reconstitute his nuclear program.

The report said there was insufficient evidence to determine whether one of the most notorious of the intelligence sources used by the United States before the Iraq war was tied to the Iraqi National Congress. The source, an Iraqi who was code-named Curveball, was a crucial source for the American view that Mr. Hussein had a mobile biological weapons program, but the information that he provided was later entirely discredited.

The report said other mistaken information about Iraq's biological program had been provided by a source linked to the Iraqi National Congress, and it said the intelligence agencies' use of the information had "constituted a serious error."

The dissenting opinion, signed by Mr. Roberts and four other Republican members of the committee, minimized the role played by Mr. Chalabi's group. "Information from the I.N.C. and I.N.C.-affiliated defectors was not widely used in intelligence community products and played little role in the intelligence community's judgments about Iraq's W.M.D. programs," the Republicans said.

Francis Brooke, a spokesman for the Iraqi National Congress, called the report "tendentious, partisan and misleading," and said that the group had not played a central role as the Bush administration built the case for war.

At the same time, Mr. Brooke said his organization was surprised at how little the American government knew about Mr. Hussein's government before the war, which may have forced the American officials to rely more heavily on the organization. "We did not realize the paucity of human intelligence that the administration had on Iraq," he said.

Iraq's Alleged Al-Qaeda Ties Were Disputed Before War (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

A declassified report released yesterday by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence revealed that U.S. intelligence analysts were strongly disputing the alleged links between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda while senior Bush administration officials were publicly asserting those links to justify invading Iraq.

Far from aligning himself with al-Qaeda and Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Hussein repeatedly rebuffed al-Qaeda's overtures and tried to capture Zarqawi, the report said. Tariq Aziz, the detained former deputy prime minister, has told the FBI that Hussein "only expressed negative sentiments about [Osama] bin Laden."

The report also said exiles from the Iraqi National Congress (INC) tried to influence U.S. policy by providing, through defectors, false information on Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons capabilities. After skeptical analysts warned that the group had been penetrated by hostile intelligence services, including Iran's, a 2002 White House directive ordered that U.S. funding for the INC be continued.

The newly declassified intelligence report provided administration critics with fresh ammunition, less than two months before midterm elections and in the middle of President Bush's campaign to refocus the public's attention away from Iraq and toward the threat of terrorism. Senior Senate Democrats immediately seized on the findings, using some of their strongest language yet to say the president continues to willfully and falsely connect Hussein to al-Qaeda.

As recently as Aug. 21, Bush suggested a link between Hussein and Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, who was killed by U.S. forces this summer. But a CIA assessment in October 2005 concluded that Hussein's government "did not have a relationship, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates," according to the report.

"The president is still distorting. He's still making statements which are false," said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), an intelligence committee member.

The partial release of the report came after nearly three years of partisan wrangling over what is to be a five-chapter analysis of the use of prewar intelligence in the run-up to the 2003 invasion of Iraq. The heart of the report -- a detailed comparison of administration statements with the intelligence then available -- is far from release. But the committee voted Thursday to release two chapters, one on the role that Iraqi exiles played in shaping prewar intelligence, the other on the accuracy of the prewar analyses of Hussein's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons capabilities and his suspected links to al-Qaeda and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the findings as old news. "If we have people who want to re-litigate that, that's fine," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0061262

But Republican attempts to paint the findings as a partisan rehash were undercut by intelligence committee members from the GOP. The committee report's conclusions are based on the Democrats' findings because two Republicans -- Sens. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.) -- supported those findings.

"After reviewing thousands of pages of evidence, I voted for the conclusions that most closely reflect the facts in the report," Snowe said in a written statement. "Policy-makers seemingly discounted or dismissed warnings about the veracity of critical intelligence reports that may have served as a basis for going to war."

Committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) was emphatic this week that Iraqi exiles did not fundamentally shape the critical assessment of the Iraqi threat in the 2002 National Intelligence Estimate.

But, as Snowe emphasized in her statement, the report concluded that information provided by an INC source was cited in that estimate and in Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's February 2003 speech to the United Nations as corroborating evidence about Iraq's mobile biological weapons program. Those citations came despite two April 2002 CIA assessments, a May 2002 Defense Intelligence Agency fabrication notice and a July 2002 National Intelligence Council warning -- all saying the INC source may have been coached by the exile group into fabricating the information.

Democrats and Republicans agree that analysts and politicians of all political stripes were wrong about the prewar assessments of Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. But the committee report indicates that intelligence analysts were substantially right about Hussein's lack of operational links to al-Qaeda. And Democrats compared the administration's public statements with newly declassified intelligence assessments to build their case that efforts to link Iraq to al-Qaeda were willfully misleading.

In a classified January 2003 report, for instance, the CIA concluded that Hussein "viewed Islamic extremists operating inside Iraq as a threat." But one day after that conclusion was published, Levin noted, Vice President Cheney said the Iraqi government "aids and protects terrorists, including members of al-Qaeda."

Intelligence reports in June, July and September 2002 all cast doubts on a reported meeting in Prague between Iraqi intelligence agents and Sept. 11 hijacker Mohamed Atta. Yet, in a Sept. 8, 2002, appearance on NBC's "Meet The Press," Cheney said the CIA considered the reports on the meeting credible, Levin said.

In February 2002, the Defense Intelligence Agency concluded that "Iraq is unlikely to have provided bin Laden any useful [chemical and biological weapons] knowledge or assistance." A year later, Bush said: "Iraq has also provided al-Qaeda with chemical and biological weapons training."

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), an intelligence committee member, said it was unfair for Democrats to compare the intelligence assessments in the report with the administration's statements. He said such comparisons go beyond the scope of the chapters released.

But Democrats were unequivocal in asserting that the chapters chronicle an indisputable pattern of deception.

"It is such a blatant misleading of the United States, its people, to prepare them, to position them, to, in fact, make them enthusiastic or feel that it's justified to go to war with Iraq," said Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the committee's vice chairman. "That kind of public manipulation I don't know has any precedent in American history."

Intelligence Didn't Back Bush Iraq Stand, Reports Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

By William Roberts and James Rowley

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Bush administration claims justifying the war against Iraq were based on fragmented, conflicting, and at times unreliable intelligence, according to two reports released today by the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Administration statements that Saddam Hussein was allied with Osama bin Laden and was helping al-Qaeda obtain chemical and biological weapons proved wrong and misleading and weren't based on solid intelligence in its possession, the declassified Senate reports said.

Contrary to assertions by Vice President Dick Cheney and other senior Bush administration officials, Hussein didn't have links to al-Qaeda and the Sept. 11 terrorist plot, the reports said.

``Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaeda and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime," one of the reports said. Hussein refused all requests from al-Qaeda to provide material or operational support, said the reports.

While Iraq Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Chalabi and his Iraqi National Congress told U.S. officials that Iraq possessed nuclear, chemical or biological weapons, that information later proved inaccurate, according to the committee reports.

U.S. intelligence agencies overestimated Saddam Hussein's ability and desire to obtain weapons material while United Nations sanctions were in place, the reports said. Further, the Senate committee determined that Hussein sought weapons of mass destruction as deterrents against Israel and Iran, not for use against the U.S.

Hussein and al-Qaeda

Allegations that Hussein provided chemical and biological weapons training to al-Qaeda operatives also turned out to be false, the reports said. The Defense Intelligence Agency said in 2002 that it was unlikely Iraq gave Bin Laden any useful weapons assistance.

The Senate reports cite inconsistencies and contradictions overlooked by intelligence agencies as they produced intelligence briefings for senior policy makers.

U.S. analysts had ``little specific intelligence reporting'' about Hussein's willingness to ally himself with al-Qaeda, the reports said. The committee quoted a 2002 Central Intelligence Agency report that said ``our assessment of al-Qaeda's ties to Iraq rests on a body of fragmented, conflicting reporting from sources of varying reliability.''

On two occasions, Hussein rebuffed al-Qaeda emissaries seeking to establish a relationship with his regime, information not reported to U.S. intelligence agencies before the war, the reports said.

While Bin Laden's al-Qaeda lieutenant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was in Iraq in 2002, he was traveling under cover and eluded efforts by Hussein to capture him, the reports said.

Threat to Hussein

Al-Qaeda operative Abu Hafs al-Mauritani went to Iraq twice -- in 1998 and 2002 -- to meet with Hussein but was rebuffed, according to the reports. Hussein said al-Mauritani should leave the country because he may ``cause a problem'' for the regime.

Further, Iraqi intelligence agents infiltrated Ansar al- Islam, a radical Kurdish group hosting al-Qaeda fighters, because Hussein saw them as a threat and thought the U.S. would use their presence to suggest a link between the Iraqis and the terrorists, the reports said.

Democrats said the reports show that statements by Bush administration officials before the Iraq war began in 2003 weren't supported by intelligence known at the time they spoke.

Republicans Counter

Republicans countered that Democrats were swayed by the same bad intelligence as President George W. Bush and supported the president's decision to go to war with Iraq. Still, seven of eight Republicans on the panel, including Chairman Pat Roberts, voted to approve the conclusions about pre-war intelligence.

Bush has consistently linked Iraq, where more than 2,600 U.S. military personnel have died and the U.S. is mired in a violent conflict between Shiites and Sunnis, to the larger war on terror and fundamentalist Islamic militants such as al-Qaeda.

Bush displayed ``gross negligence'' by citing faulty intelligence in speeches and statements to connect Saddam Hussein to al-Qaeda, said Senator Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the intelligence panel.

When George Tenet, then-director of the CIA, told Bush that the intelligence case showing Iraq had weapons of mass destruction was a ``slam dunk,'' it was ``a corruption of the intelligence process,'' said Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat.

Snow Comments

Tenet later complied with administration demands that the CIA gloss over inconsistencies between intelligence data and Bush's assertions and should be held accountable, Levin said. The report quoted committee testimony this year by Tenet, who acknowledged ``it was the wrong thing to do.''

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the White House hadn't seen the two Senate reports and wasn't briefed on it.

``Based on the characterizations we've seen, it's nothing new,'' he told reporters at the daily White House briefing. ``So, it's, again, kind of re-litigating things that happened three years ago.''

``It's worth noting,'' Snow added, ``that in 2002 and 2003 members of both parties got a good look at the intelligence we had, and they came to the very same conclusions.''

Committee chairman Roberts said Democrats were misusing the reports ``by careful cherry-picking through the intelligence and the facts in a political attempt to rewrite history.'' The information available before the war was used by the administration and Congress, Democrats included, to justify going into Iraq, he said.

Partisan Battles

The Senate reports, which were subject to partisan battles behind closed doors, are the result of two and half years of investigative review by the intelligence panel's staff. Democrats last year forced a closed session of the Senate to protest the committee's delays in releasing the reports.

Republican Senators Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine joined with intelligence committee Democrats in concluding that Chalabi actively sought to mislead the Bush administration to overthrow Saddam. Roberts said Chalabi's information played a minimal role.

To contact the reporters on this story: William Roberts in Washington wroberts@bloomberg.net

Report Finds No Saddam, Zarqawi Ties (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Post-Iraq invasion intelligence concluded there was no relationship between Saddam Hussein's regime and the al Qaeda terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi, casting doubt on President Bush's statements as recently as last month that there was a link.

A report released yesterday by the Senate intelligence committee said the CIA concluded last year that the Zarqawi-Saddam nexus did not exist.

"Postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture al-Zarqawi and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi," the bipartisan report concluded. It focused on comparing prewar intelligence on Iraq with post-invasion information from seized documents and interrogations of Saddam regime figures.

Democrats pounced on the conclusion as proof that Mr. Bush and his administration are misleading the American people about their justifications for going to war in March 2003 to oust Saddam.

Mr. Bush said at an Aug. 21 press conference, when asked to defend the invasion, "I square it because imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein, who had the capacity to make a weapon of mass destruction, who was paying suiciders to kill innocent life, who had relations with Zarqawi."

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and intelligence committee member, said yesterday: "To this day, these statements haven't stopped. Just two weeks ago, the president said in a press conference that Saddam Hussein had relations with Zarqawi. The intelligence committee's report demonstrates that statement to be false. ... The president's statement, made just two weeks ago, is flat out false."

White House spokesman Tony Snow told The Washington Times last night that Mr. Bush was referring to the fact that Zarqawi was in Iraq receiving medical care and lodging during Saddam's rule.

"The president knows there was no operational relationship and he did not assert there was an operational relationship," Mr. Snow said.

The Senate report also said there is no evidence that Saddam's regime participated in or aided the September 11 attacks. Mr. Snow said the president has never asserted otherwise.

"There have been repeated insinuations that the president had somehow said Saddam was involved in September 11," Mr. Snow said. "He has never said that. He has taken great pains from the very beginning to assure people that was not the case."

The Senate report did confirm prewar intelligence that the Jordanian-born Zarqawi, who had links to al Qaeda and fought in Afghanistan, did enter Iraq in the spring of 2002 and stayed in Baghdad until November of that year. Some Bush officials said publicly before the war that the Saddam regime would not have allowed the jihadist to remain in Baghdad if it did not condone his presence.

But post-invasion intelligence collection showed that Saddam considered Zarqawi an outlaw and sent his intelligence service to capture him. "The [Iraqi Intelligence Service] formed a special committee and actively attempted to locate and capture al-Zarqawi without success, contradicting prewar assessments that the IIS almost certainly possessed the capability to track him," the Senate report said.

Zarqawi returned to Iraq in 2003 and formed the deadly al Qaeda in Iraq terror group. A U.S. air strike killed him in June.

The report also said post-invasion intelligence can only confirm one meeting (in the Sudan) between a Saddam regime official and an al Qaeda operative. Saddam refused two other meeting requests from al Qaeda. An al Qaeda detainee recanted a statement to the CIA that Iraq helped train al Qaeda terrorists in explosives and chemical weapons.

The report reaffirmed an early committee report in 2004, and a presidential commission finding in 2004, that the 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on which the war decision was based was wrong in its major conclusions.

Republicans accused Democrats of rehashing the same findings and noted virtually all intelligence agencies worldwide estimated that Saddam still possessed stocks of chemical weapons. Mr. Bush has acknowledged the report was wrong. Neither the committee nor the bipartisan commission found that the Bush administration pressured the intelligence community on the 2002 NIE, which was generally in line with intelligence findings in the Clinton administration.

"The long-known fact is that the prewar intelligence was wrong," said committee Chairman Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican. "That flawed intelligence was used by policy-makers, both in the administration and in Congress, as one of numerous justifications to go to war in Iraq. The same intelligence was collectively believed and used, leading to the same assertive public statements regarding the threat posed by Saddam Hussein."

The Iraq Survey Group, which spent two years in Iraq hunting for weapons of mass destruction, found no stockpiles, but said Saddam planned to resume WMD programs after the United Nations lifted economic sanctions.

Senate Reports Say Saddam Rejected Cooperating With Terrorists (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein rejected pleas for assistance from Osama bin Laden and tried to capture terrorist Abu Musab al Zarqawi when he was in Iraq, a Senate Intelligence Committee report released Friday found, casting further doubt on the Bush administration's rationale for invading Iraq.

President Bush and other administration officials repeatedly cited Saddam's alleged ties to radical Islamic terrorists before the March 2003 invasion as one reason to take military action against Iraq.

The 150-page report said the administration's claims were untrue. "Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qaida to provide material or operational support," the report said.

The report was released along with a second one that said false information from the exile group Iraqi National Congress, led by Ahmad Chalabi, was widely distributed in prewar intelligence reports and used to support intelligence assessments about Iraq's weapons and links to terrorism. Intelligence officials repeatedly warned that the INC was unreliable, but White House and Pentagon officials ignored the warnings.

The reports are part of a five-report study that the Senate Intelligence Committee has undertaken into the Bush administration's use of intelligence before the invasion of Iraq.

The study has left the committee badly divided. Three reports remain classified, including one comparing prewar statements by Bush administration officials to intelligence available at the time. Democrats have accused Republicans of delaying the reports until after the November congressional elections.

On Friday, Democrats charged that the reports showed that the White House had manipulated intelligence to make the case for war to the American people.

"The administration ignored warnings prior to the war about the veracity of the intelligence it trumpeted publicly to support its case that Iraq was an imminent threat to the security of the United States," said panel Vice Chairman Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va.

Republicans rejected that allegation and said the reports added little to what was already known.

"The long-known fact is that the prewar intelligence was wrong. That flawed intelligence was used by policymakers, both in the administration and in Congress, as one of numerous justifications to go to war in Iraq," said committee chairman Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan.

In the run-up to the war, Bush and his advisers repeatedly sought to link Saddam and al-Qaida, stopping just short of accusing the Iraqi leader of a role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"You can't distinguish between al-Qaida and Saddam when you talk about the war on terror," Bush said on Sept. 25, 2002.

On the same day, Condoleezza Rice, then the White House national security adviser, said, "High-ranking detainees have said that Iraq provided some training to al-Qaida in chemical weapons development."

The detainee Rice referred to was al-Qaida operative Ibn al Shaykh al Libi, who was captured in Pakistan in November 2001 and, U.S. intelligence officials said, tortured by Egyptian authorities after his transfer to that country.

The Senate report says that in February 2002, months before Rice spoke, the Defense Intelligence Agency reported that al Libi "was likely intentionally misleading his briefers."

Postwar information on Saddam's relations with Islamic extremists came from numerous sources, the report suggests, including seized documents and interrogations of Saddam himself, former Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz and a senior Iraqi spy, Faruq Hijazi.

The report, quoting from an FBI debriefing of Hijazi, said that when an Iraqi operative met bin Laden in Sudan in 1995, bin Laden asked that Saddam allow him to open an office in Iraq, give him Chinese-made sea mines and military training, and broadcast his speeches.

"According to Hijazi, Saddam immediately refused," the FBI debriefing said.

Regarding Zarqawi, the Senate report cites information that's surfaced since the war indicating that Saddam "attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture" him and the Iraqi regime "did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi."

Zarqawi, who operated from a part of northern Iraq that Saddam didn't control, was a key part of Bush's case for war. After the invasion, he became the head of the group al Qaida in Iraq. U.S. bombs killed him in June.

The second report released Friday confirms that the INC had "an aggressive `publicity campaign' prior to the war to bring defectors to the attention of `anyone who would listen.'"

While many committee Republicans dismissed the INC report's conclusions as unsupported by the facts, two of them, Sens. Olympia Snowe of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, voted for harsher language that Democrats proposed.

DOJ_NMG_0061266

The report, which ran 211 pages, disclosed that three months after the White House approved continued funding for the INC's intelligence collection in July 2002, the Defense Intelligence Agency warned that the group "was penetrated by hostile intelligence services," including Iran's. It's unclear whether top White House officials were aware of the warning.

The report also confirms a report by McClatchy Newspapers that former CIA director R. James Woolsey helped get an INC defector attention from the U.S. government by referring him to Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Linton Wells.

The defector, Adnan Ihsan Saeed al Haideri, suggested that he had knowledge of dozens of sites related to weapons of mass destruction, but none of them were ever found, and Haideri, taken to Iraq in early 2004, couldn't identify the facilities that he claimed he knew about.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondents Matt Stearns and John Walcott contributed to this article.

Saddam Rejected Al-Qaida's Requests For Aid (SLPD)

By Bob Deans

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Toppled Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein distrusted the al-Qaida terrorist organization, rebuffed its requests for aid and tried unsuccessfully to capture one of its senior operatives, the Senate Intelligence Committee reported Friday.

The report, based on an extensive review of postwar intelligence that included interrogations of former Iraqi officials, appeared to undercut a key claim of President George W. Bush's administration: that Saddam's ties to terrorist groups posed a threat to the U.S. and its allies.

As long ago as October 2002, Bush said that "Iraq and al-Qaida have had high-level contacts that go back a decade," warning that "Iraq could decide on any given day" to give a dangerous weapon "to a terrorist group."

At that time, though, the U.S. intelligence community had no evidence of close links between Saddam and al-Qaida, and analysts had reported in top secret documents that Saddam viewed Islamic extremists operating inside Iraq as a threat, the Senate committee reported.

As recently as Thursday, Bush continued to highlight links between Iraq and al-Qaida and its leader, Osama bin Laden. There are al-Qaida operatives in Iraq now, including many who have come from abroad to join an insurgency Pentagon officials estimate at somewhere around 30,000 strong. Bush's critics point out, though, that it has been the U.S.-led war in Iraq that both generated the insurgency and attracted the foreign jihadists.

"Osama bin Laden has proclaimed the third world war is raging in Iraq," Bush said Thursday in an Atlanta speech. "Al-Qaida leaders have declared that Baghdad will be the capital of the new caliphate that they wish to establish across the Middle East."

While bin Laden has purportedly made such claims, the U.S. intelligence community has concluded that when Saddam was in power, he repeatedly rebuffed al-Qaida's requests for assistance and forbade Iraqis from dealing with the group.

"Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qaida to provide material or operational support," states the report of the committee, which is chaired by Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kansas.

"Debriefings also indicate that Saddam issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with al-Qaida," the report continued. "No postwar information suggests that the Iraqi regime attempted to facilitate a relationship with bin Laden."

Also on Thursday, Bush spotlighted the U.S. killing of al-Qaida operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi earlier this year in Iraq, calling him "al-Qaida's most visible and aggressive leader to emerge" after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Roberts' committee, however, reported that Saddam ordered his internal intelligence forces to try to capture al-Zarqawi after they received a tip in the fall of 2002 that he was in Baghdad under an alias for medical treatment. But al-Zarqawi eluded the Iraqi security forces, left Iraq that fall and returned in June 2003, after U.S. forces had invaded Iraq and toppled Saddam's regime.

Democrats pounced on the report - which drew chiefly from Central Intelligence Agency conclusions in a 2005 report that was previously classified - as evidence that Bush's administration mischaracterized and misused intelligence to help trump up the Iraqi threat in the lead-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond, R-Mo., criticized Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee for attempting to spin the report released Friday, calling their comments that the administration manipulated pre-war intelligence about Iraq deceptive.

"Democrats continue to make partisan attacks even though the facts do not support those conclusions," Bond said. "The committee has wasted an inordinate amount of time looking in the rearview mirror as some of its members desperately attempt to find something to pin on the Bush administration for political leverage."

DOJ_NMG_0061267

While acknowledging that the intelligence community "is responsible for massive failures prior to the Iraq war," Bond's statement denied that the administration "intentionally misled the nation or manipulated intelligence."

Bond, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said it had wasted its time "on a witch hunt" and should focus instead on fixing problems in the nation's intelligence agencies.

Bush based his case for war chiefly on his assertion that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons. No stockpiles of such weapons have been found, and a series of assessments have documented extensive flaws in the post-war intelligence concerning Iraq's weapons programs.

Make No Mistake: Presidents Wouldn't Admit It (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Being president apparently means never being able to say you're sorry. Or wrong.

President Bush said that the Central Intelligence Agency did secretly detain certain people suspected of working for al-Qaeda, and that CIA interrogators have used "an alternative set of procedures" designed to pry information from prisoners. Given the opportunity to say he was wrong or that he was sorry, he did what presidents do: neither.

It is a presidential maneuver that satisfies some Americans for whom the ends of the Bush administration's approach to combating terrorism justify the means, and that angers others who believe civil liberties have been casualties of that war. It is a tack that the president may take again in light of reports from the Senate Intelligence Committee that Saddam Hussein was not linked to Osama bin Laden at the time Bush was mounting a war against Iraq. In any case, it is an unapologetic apologia consistent with 230 years of U.S. history.

"Thomas Jefferson was wrong about a lot of stuff," says Peter Onuf, Thomas Jefferson Foundation professor of history at the University of Virginia. But when it came to admitting he was wrong or sorry, Jefferson "could be evasive."

For example, when it was suggested that Jefferson had a liaison with the slave Sally Hemings, "he never addressed the issue," Onuf says. "The charges were widely bruited about in the Federalist press and his response was not to confront it directly. It probably was prudent of him."

Partly "it was the code of an honorable gentleman that provided coverage," Onuf says. Jefferson wouldn't stoop to "answering claims by social inferiors. He didn't respond to things he didn't have to. He was a pretty smooth guy. He certainly believed he was already on the side of the angels."

Other presidents have sidestepped culpability. When the British sacked the city of Washington in 1814, says Gerard W. Gawalt, specialist in American history at the Library of Congress, "James Madison managed to blame everybody but himself for that fiasco."

The presidential posture: Take responsibility, not blame.

Self-certainty is built into the presidential software. Steve Rubenzer, a Houston psychologist and co-author of "Personality, Character, and Leadership in the White House: Psychologists Assess the Presidents," says: "People who become president tend to be dominant individuals. They tend to like to be one up on other people. Apologizing is being one down."

Being wrong or sorry "is seen as a disadvantage. That's a position they try to avoid."

Presidents present themselves as competent and moral. "To admit otherwise is to essentially impeach yourself," Rubenzer says, "and once you have admitted it, it's not contested anymore."

Allan J. Lichtman, a history professor at American University and a Democratic candidate in Maryland for the U.S. Senate says that presidents have always had a sense of their own righteousness.

When it was discovered that members of Ulysses S. Grant's Cabinet were selling favors to the highest bidders, "Grant never took responsibility," Lichtman says. "He tried to defend his Cabinet and staff." Other presidents backed into corners -- Richard Nixon and Bill Clinton, for instance -- have used parsed and parsimonious language to justify their actions. Franklin Roosevelt never apologized for interning Japanese Americans, Lichtman says.

It wasn't until years after Jimmy Carter had left office, says Richard Norton Smith, a scholar in residence at George Mason University, "that he was able to reply what he would have done differently during the Iranian hostage crisis."

During a presidential debate in 1976, Gerald Ford said, "There is no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe and there never will be under a Ford administration." Ford was given opportunities at the time to admit that he was wrong, but "Ford is a stubborn Dutchman. He dug in his heels. He could have backed off in the program. But that's not in the nature of these guys," Smith says.

Years later, as the Soviet Union crumbled, Ford wrote a piece in this newspaper saying "I told you so."

Making the best of a bad situation is part of the job description. Marjorie Cohn of the National Lawyers Guild, a group that has been highly critical of Bush, says that the president's announcement about secret prisons reminds her of the man who was being run out of town and got out in front of the crowd to make it look like he was leading the parade. "That," she says, "is what the president is doing."

DOJ_NMG_0061268

With All Deliberate Foot-Dragging (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

We were certainly relieved that the Senate Intelligence Committee finally made official yesterday what pretty much everyone but President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney had already acknowledged: There never was any connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda, not even between Mr. Hussein and the self-styled Qaeda leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Iraq also was not busily trying to build a nuclear weapon before the war, nor did it have a biological weapons program.

Those conclusions were contained in documents released by the committee as part of the second phase of its investigation into the prewar intelligence on Iraq. Releasing any documents was a change of pace for the panel's chairman, Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, who has consistently tried to stymie this phase of the investigation.

Unfortunately, the documents — only two of the five parts of the final report — are beside the big point of this inquiry: Did Mr. Bush and his aides knowingly hype the intelligence on Iraq and deliberately mislead Americans into war?

The first phase of the committee's investigation listed countless ways in which the intelligence agencies messed up before the war, but drew no conclusions about how Mr. Bush used the flawed intelligence. That question was put off until after the election of 2004, and Mr. Roberts did his best for another year to make sure it would never be answered.

When Democrats forced him to resume the investigation, Mr. Roberts re-engineered the inquiry into a five-part series and orchestrated the process so that the verdict on the actions of Mr. Bush and his team will now not be rendered until after yet another election season is over this fall.

Mr. Roberts has consistently defended his actions by saying he was trying to conduct a careful investigation. But yesterday, he denounced Democrats for "insisting that they were deliberately duped into supporting the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime."

"That is simply not true," Mr. Roberts said.

So much for not prejudging the outcome. If Mr. Roberts has an investigative report supporting that conclusion, we'd sure like to read it.

Army General Says Rumsfeld Refused To Plan For Post-war Iraq (DULNT/MCT)

By Stephanie Heinatz

The Duluth News Tribune/McClatchy, September 9, 2006

FORT EUSTIS, Va. - Long before the United States invaded Iraq in 2003, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld forbade military strategists to develop plans for securing a post-war Iraq, the retiring commander of the Army Transportation Corps said Thursday.

In fact, said Brig. Gen. Mark Scheid, Rumsfeld said "he would fire the next person" who talked about the need for a post-war plan.

Rumsfeld did replace Gen. Eric Shinseki, the Army chief of staff in 2003, after Shinseki told Congress that hundreds of thousands of troops would be needed to secure post-war Iraq.

Scheid, who is also the commander of Fort Eustis in Newport News, made his comments in an interview with the Daily Press. He retires in about three weeks.

Scheid's comments are further confirmation of the version of events reported in "Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq," the book by New York Times reporter Michael R. Gordon and retired Marine Corps Lt. Gen. Bernard E. Trainor.

In 2001, Scheid was a colonel with the Central Command, the unit that oversees U.S. military operations in the Mideast.

On Sept. 10, 2001, he was selected to be the chief of logistics war plans.

On Sept. 11, he said, "life just went to hell."

That day, Gen. Tommy Franks, the commander of Central Command, told his planners, including Scheid, to "get ready to go to war."

A day or two later, Rumsfeld was "telling us we were going to war in Afghanistan and to start building the war plan. We were going to go fast.

"Then, just as we were barely into Afghanistan Rumsfeld came and told us to get ready for Iraq."

Scheid said he remembers everyone thinking, "My gosh, we're in the middle of Afghanistan, how can we possibly be doing two at one time? How can we pull this off? It's just going to be too much."

DOJ_NMG_0061269

Planning was kept very hush-hush in those early days.

"There was only a handful of people, maybe five or six, that were involved with that plan because it had to be kept very, very quiet."

There was already an offensive plan in place for Iraq, Scheid said. And in the beginning, the planners were just expanding on it.

"Whether we were going to execute it, we had no idea," Scheid said.

Eventually other military agencies like the transportation and Army materiel commands had to get involved.

They couldn't just "keep planning this in the dark," Scheid said.

Planning continued to be a challenge.

"The secretary of defense continued to push on us that everything we write in our plan has to be the idea that we are going to go in, we're going to take out the regime, and then we're going to leave," Scheid said. "We won't stay."

Scheid said the planners continued to try "to write what was called Phase 4," or the piece of the plan that included post-invasion operations like security, stability and reconstruction.

Even if the troops didn't stay, "at least we have to plan for it," Scheid said.

"I remember the secretary of defense saying that he would fire the next person that said that," Scheid said. "We would not do planning for Phase 4 operations, which would require all those additional troops that people talk about today.

"He said we will not do that because the American public will not back us if they think we are going over there for a long war."

Why did Rumsfeld think that? Scheid doesn't know.

"But think back to those times. We had done Bosnia. We said we were going into Bosnia and stop the fighting and come right out. And we stayed."

Was Rumsfeld right or wrong?

Scheid said he doesn't know.

"In his own mind he thought we could go in and fight and take out the regime and come out. But a lot of us planners were having a real hard time with it because we were also thinking we can't do this. Once you tear up a country you have to stay and rebuild it. It was very challenging."

Scheid doesn't go so far as calling for Rumsfeld to resign. He's listened as other retired generals have done so.

"Everybody has a right to their opinion," he said. "But what good did it do?"

Even if the people who laid out the initial war plans had fleshed out post-invasion missions, the fighting and insurgent attacks going on today would have been hard to predict, Scheid said.

"We really thought that after the collapse of the regime we were going to do all these humanitarian type things," he said. "We thought this would go pretty fast and we'd be able to get out of there. We really didn't anticipate them to continue to fight the way they did or come back the way they are.

"Now we're going more toward a Civil War. We didn't see that coming."

While Scheid, a soldier since 1977, spoke candidly about the days leading up to the invasion of Iraq, he remains concerned about the American public's view of the troops. He's bothered by the nationwide divide over the war and fearful that patriotism among citizens will continue to decline.

"We're really hurting right now," he said.

Iranian Troops Arrest 5 From Iraqi Security Forces On Border (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 8 — Five members of the Iraqi security forces and their interpreter were arrested by Iranian troops as the Iraqis were patrolling the Iraq-Iran border this week, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Friday.

The Iraqis were on a joint patrol run by the Interior and Defense ministries, said the spokesman, Muhammad al-Askari, and were seized near the town of Mandali, in Diyala Province. The area has been rife with sectarian violence.

It was unclear which side of the border the Iraqis were on.

This is not the first time in recent years that Iran has arrested foreign troops for operating near its border. In June 2004, Iran seized three British naval boats and detained eight sailors as the boats were patrolling in the waters straddling the Iraq-Iran border in the south. The sailors were eventually released.

The arrests of the Iraqis come at a time of growing tension between the United States and Iran. The Bush administration is pushing for a United Nations resolution that would impose economic and political sanctions on Iran for going forward with its uranium enrichment program, which American officials say could result in a nuclear weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0061270

Here in Baghdad, the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, and military commanders have accused individuals or groups in Iran of supporting Shiite militias and urging them to step up attacks against the Americans.

Several prominent Iraqi Shiite leaders with strong ties to Iran have denied the American accusations.

Iran and Iraq fought a war from 1980 to 1988 in which up to one million people were killed. Though Iraqi Shiite political parties are close to some Iranian officials, many Iraqis distrust the Iranians, who have been the traditional rivals of Arabs for influence in the region. Iran's population is mostly Shiite Persian.

Violence rippled across parts of Iraq on Friday. In Baghdad, a homemade bomb exploded near a police convoy, killing three civilians and wounding three policemen.

The police found six bodies in four different parts of Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said.

In the insurgent stronghold of Hawija, near the oil city of Kirkuk, gunmen assassinated a prominent sheik, Khalaf Ibrahim, police officials said. A volley of mortars in the town of Musayyib killed three Shiite pilgrims and wounded 22 others. The pilgrims were going to Karbala to celebrate the birthday of a vanished Shiite imam.

The American military said a soldier was killed by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad. An Iraqi civilian was killed and a young child injured in an accident on Friday involving a military convoy, American officials said.

The British military said a British soldier died Thursday from wounds suffered earlier in the week when his patrol was attacked in the town of Qurna.

The latest round of violence came a day after a Baghdad morgue official told reporters that more than 1,500 Iraqi civilians died violently in the capital in August, about the same level as in June. If the August figure is accurate, it shows that the new Baghdad security plan rolled out by the American military in early August has made little difference so far in quelling violence.

On Thursday, the new leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, released an audio message urging every Sunni Arab to kill an American within the next 15 days, and beseeching those Sunnis whose family members have suffered under the Shiite-led government to kill a member of a Shiite party or militia, according to a translation by the SITE Institute, which tracks jihadist messages.

It was Mr. Muhajir's first audio message since he was named successor to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Qaeda leader who was killed by an American airstrike in June.

"What you saw in the past is a drop of what you are going to see and what is prepared for you," Mr. Muhajir said.

American military officials have said they believe that Abu Hamza al-Muhajir is the nom de guerre of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian explosives expert said to have trained in 1999 at a terrorist camp in Afghanistan run by Al Qaeda.

Five Iraqi Soldiers Seized In Border Clash With Iran (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 8 -- The Iranian military seized five Iraqi soldiers after a cross-border skirmish Thursday, Iraqi authorities said Friday.

The captured troops were part of a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol that trekked on Thursday afternoon to a border post near Mandali, a town of 13,000 located about 75 miles northeast of Baghdad, to investigate reports that a large number of Iranians were crossing into Iraq there, according to Brig. Gen. Subhi Bairam, commander of the Mandali police.

Iranian forces opened fire when the patrol moved within about 50 yards of the border, Bairam said. The patrol returned fire and then retreated from the scene. Back in Mandali, patrol members realized that five soldiers and the vehicle they were in had been captured by the Iranians.

The Iranian military said it arrested the troops for "infiltrating the Iranian soil," according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency. Iran also said it had arrested seven soldiers, not five.

The announcement of the capture came as sectarian violence continued to roil Iraq.

Three Shiite Muslim pilgrims were killed and two were wounded by mortar fire in Musayyib, south of Baghdad, as they marched to a major religious celebration in the holy city of Karbala, according to Capt. Muthanna Ahmed of the Babil provincial police. More than a million pilgrims are expected to gather in Karbala on Saturday for the Shabaniya holiday, which commemorates the birth of one of Shiite Islam's most revered religious figures.

In Baghdad, bombs killed four people and wounded five in separate attacks on police patrols in the eastern part of the city, according to Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Muhammad of the Interior Ministry. At least 11 other people were killed in other attacks across the country, police said.

The U.S. military also announced that an American soldier was killed early Friday when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb south of Baghdad. No other details were released.

Special correspondent Saad Sarhan in Karbala and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Forces Deploy In Karbala To Protect Shi'ite Pilgrims (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Washington Times/AP, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi police and army troops fanned out around Karbala yesterday to safeguard the Shi'ite holy city as a mortar attack killed three pilgrims heading there for a religious festival.

At least 22 other persons were wounded -- four critically -- when three mortar rounds exploded among pilgrims in Musayyib, about 40 miles south of Baghdad.

Officials said they expected as many as 3 million pilgrims at the religious festival today in Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad.

"Our forces have tightened their control on the ground and our only concern now is rockets launched from a far distance," said Iraqi army Maj. Gen. Samir Abdullah.

Millions attend the festival observing the birthday of Imam al-Mahdi al-Muntadhar, a 9th-century religious leader. Many walk to Karbala from across Iraq, and several attacks already have occurred on processions heading to the city.

On Monday, Iraqi soldiers clashed with gunmen near Karbala during an operation to secure the area, leaving 14 militants and one Iraqi soldier dead, the prime minister's office said. Last week, 13 Pakistani and Indian Shi'ite pilgrims and their Iraqi driver were ambushed and killed en route to the city.

Since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Karbala has seen a number of attacks -- mostly involving suicide bombers -- that have killed hundreds of people. The attacks are considered to have been the work of Sunni Arab extremist groups, including al Qaeda in Iraq.

Iraqi officials said police and army troops had deployed around Karbala ahead of today's festival to prevent the infiltration of suicide bombers and terrorists. Cars have been banned since Wednesday.

One of the army units that will defend Karbala, the army's 8th Division, was the first to come under full Iraqi control during a ceremony Thursday. U.S.-led forces turned over control of Iraq's military command to the Shi'ite-led government, a step considered key toward the eventual withdrawal of foreign troops.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government defended its decision to shut down the Baghdad operations of Al Arabiya, a Dubai-based satellite TV channel, for one month.

Spokesman Ali al-Dabagh said some of Al Arabiya's reporting staff promoted sectarian violence and that some of its reports supported terrorism.

The other pan-Arab satellite network, Al Jazeera, had its office in the capital closed two years ago.

Also yesterday, coalition authorities announced the deaths of two coalition soldiers -- an American and a Briton.

Security Tight For Karbala Pilgrims (LAT)

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD — Tens of thousands of Shiite Muslim pilgrims headed to a shrine city south of the capital Friday amid heavy security as the daily toll of casualties mounted in a sectarian war without respite.

No major attacks were reported against the multitudes destined for Karbala, where today they celebrate the birthday of a revered imam who disappeared a millennium ago.

But even on a relatively quiet day in the capital, authorities reported finding 14 unidentified bodies in various neighborhoods, all handcuffed, blindfolded and killed execution-style — most of them shot in the head — now a trademark of the internecine conflict.

In largely Shiite east Baghdad, a roadside bomb targeting police killed three civilians and wounded three officers. Mortar blasts killed two civilians in a Shiite district of south Baghdad, and gunmen killed at least three in other incidents, authorities reported.

The traditionally mixed capital — with its Shiites, Sunnis, Christians and others — has become the prime killing ground of the sectarian conflict, which authorities say leaves as many as 100 Iraqis dead each day. Tens of thousands reportedly have fled to neighborhoods where their sects predominate and militias provide some measure of safety.

Despite the presence in Iraq of about 145,000 U.S. troops, the highest figure in months, the Shiite-led government has struggled to maintain order amid daily carnage.

Thousands of Iraqi police officers, soldiers and volunteers sealed off Karbala, about 50 miles south of Baghdad, to try to prevent a repeat of previous attacks on masses of Shiite pilgrims, whose boisterous marches are often viewed as a provocation by the rival Sunni Arab community. Vehicles, cellphones and weapons were banned from the city, and everyone was subject to search.

DOJ_NMG_0061272

News agencies reported mortar rounds aimed at Karbala-bound pilgrims killed at least three of them in Musayyib, about 35 miles south of Baghdad. But provincial authorities said the dead were local residents hit by mortar blasts targeting a police station in a violent mixed-population area.

More than 1 million pilgrims are expected, honoring a messianic figure known as the Mahdi who, it is believed, will return someday to save the faithful.

Karbala, with its two magnificent gold-domed shrines, is one of the jewels of the Shiite world. It has been the site of numerous attacks on pilgrims, including suicide bombings in spring 2004 that killed 130 worshipers and injured hundreds.

On Friday, the Muslim holy day, Shiite preachers nationwide urged the faithful to endorse federalism, a combustible concept under which Shiite-dominated southern provinces would merge into an autonomous region.

"Such a federal system exists in many nations, but when the Shiite talk about federalism, they are accused of dividing Iraq," leading cleric Sadruddin Qubanchi told worshipers in the southern city of Najaf. "There is no such danger."

...

The autonomy debate has badly exacerbated sectarian tensions. Many Sunnis view the plan as a scheme to deprive their long-dominant sect of resources while the Shiite south and Kurdish north pocket petroleum revenue from vast deposits in their zones.

In parliament Thursday, a shouting match ensued as Sunni representatives accused the majority Shiites of trying to slice up the country into ethnic and sectarian fiefdoms. The debate is expected to resume next week.

U.S. Count Of Baghdad Deaths Excludes Car Bombs, Mortar Attacks (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick And Zaineb Obeid

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. officials, seeking a way to measure the results of a program aimed at decreasing violence in Baghdad, aren't counting scores of dead killed in car bombings and mortar attacks as victims of the country's sectarian violence.

In a distinction previously undisclosed, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said Friday that the United States is including in its tabulations of sectarian violence only deaths of individuals killed in drive-by shootings or by torture and execution.

That has allowed U.S. officials to boast that the number of deaths from sectarian violence in Baghdad declined by more than 52 percent in August over July.

But it eliminates from tabulation huge numbers of people whose deaths are certainly part of the ongoing conflict between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Not included, for example, are scores of people who died in a highly coordinated bombing that leveled an entire apartment building in eastern Baghdad, a stronghold of rebel Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Johnson declined to provide an actual number for the U.S. tally of August deaths or for July, when the Baghdad city morgue counted a record 1,855 violent deaths.

Violent deaths for August, a morgue official told McClatchy Newspapers on Friday, totaled 1,526, a 17.7 percent decline from July and about the same as died violently in June.

The dispute is an important one. With Baghdad violence reaching record levels in July, U.S. commanders warned that the country was tipping toward civil war. They then ordered 8,000 U.S. troops and 3,000 Iraqis to conduct house-by-house searches of Baghdad's neighborhoods in an effort to root out insurgent gunmen and militia death squads in Operation Together Forward.

The program, which began in earnest Aug. 7, included bringing in thousands of American troops from other parts of Iraq in what was seen by many as a last-ditch effort to head off a civil war that many Iraqis say has already begun.

Within weeks of the kickoff of the Baghdad security plan, the U.S. military's top spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, boasted that the murder rate in Baghdad had fallen by 46 percent and attributed most of the fall to the new security sweeps.

On Thursday, Caldwell revised the figures, posting a statement on the website of the Multi-National Force-Iraq that the murder rate had dropped even more - by 52 percent from July.

That claim was immediately contradicted by the morgue figures, which trickled out in accounts by various news organizations citing unnamed officials.

Johnson said he couldn't comment on morgue figures and declined to release the raw numbers on which Caldwell's claim was based. He said the numbers were classified and that releasing them might help "our enemy" adjust their tactics.

"We attempt to strike the right balance, being as open and transparent as possible without providing information that places our troops or Iraqi civilians at undo risk by the enemy adjusting their tactics for greater impact," he said, in explaining the decision not to release the figures.

DOJ_NMG_0061273

Johnson said the numbers more accurately reflect the impact of Operation Together Forward's mission: targeting operations of shadowy sectarian death squads, who often use drive-by shootings, torture and executions as tactics for terror, rather than suicide bombings or rocket or mortar attacks.

He said the figures quoted by Caldwell reflect a "cautious optimism" that the situation is improving in Iraq.

But whether the violence is truly improving is far from clear. The morgue numbers made public this week reflect only deaths in Baghdad and figures compiled by the Ministry of Health for August violent deaths throughout Iraq won't be released until later this month.

Car bombs daily claim tens of victims, and tit-for-tat exchanges of mortar fire are nightly occurrences. Every morning bodies are discovered, many with their hands and feet bound.

The distinction in the way those people die is lost on victims' relatives, some of whom suggest the true numbers are higher.

"If you want the truth, even when we hear or see the scenes of explosions, assassinations, or number of dead on TV, we don't really care anymore, our feelings are dead," said Dhiya Ahmed, whose 17-year-old nephew was killed on Aug. 11. The young man was walking with a friend near his house when gunmen approached and shot them both dead.

"The numbers are not quite true," said Ahmed. "I bet the actual number is much more."

The family's tragedy has been intense. Last year the victim's father was killed in a similar fashion.

Even while touting the successes, Caldwell on Thursday warned on the coalition Web site about possible increases in violence from insurgent and terrorist attacks that he said would be used to divert attention from the Baghdad security initiative.

"It should not be a surprise if we witness brief up ticks in violence in the near future," he wrote.

Government leaders seem to be bracing for more bodies. A meeting was held recently between officials in the Health Ministry to talk about importing refrigerators for the morgue. The idea was to set them up in an empty building nearby.

But the discussion quickly broke down over what kind of freezers they would use: ones with sliding doors or a single large freezing room. More talks are scheduled.

In Baghdad on Friday, three civilians were killed and three others wounded when a bomb targeting the convoy of the Karrada neighborhood police commander exploded. Three police officers also were wounded.

Police also discovered 14 bodies in a western portion of the city.

New Army Manual Recalls Abuse (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The chief architect of the new Army field manual on interrogations said yesterday that the document aims to preserve the memory of the detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere so future generations of U.S. soldiers do not repeat the same mistakes.

Thomas Gandy, a senior civilian Army intelligence official, told reporters at the Pentagon that the new manual's explicit guidelines on what U.S. military personnel can and cannot do when questioning detainees arose out of the alarming photographs from Abu Ghraib and the dozen military investigations that examined abuse reported in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay. He said it was important to "keep these things vivid" so soldiers understand their boundaries and the effects of crossing them.

The manual, which is an extensive volume covering U.S. human intelligence collection operations, reads far more like direct instructions to military interrogators than did the previous field manual. It even includes highlight boxes filled with vital points top leaders wanted to make crystal clear. One such section warns troops that acts of violence or torture could lead to criminal charges and information of questionable value.

"Use of torture by U.S. personnel would bring discredit upon the U.S. and its armed forces while undermining domestic and international support for the war effort," the manual says. "It also could place U.S. and allied personnel in enemy hands at a greater risk of abuse by their captors. Conversely, knowing the enemy has abused U.S. and allied POWs does not justify using methods of interrogation specifically prohibited by law, treaty, agreement, and policy."

None of the techniques in the manual is classified despite more than a year of discussions that nearly culminated in at least one tactic remaining cloaked, Gandy said. Officials opted against secrecy, he said, because they feared it could fuel suspicion that the Pentagon was hiding abusive tactics.

The list of things interrogators cannot do includes abuse alleged at various facilities and some that appear to come directly from Abu Ghraib photographs: forcing a detainee to be naked, perform sexual acts, or pose in a sexual manner; placing hoods or sacks over a detainee's head or putting duct tape over his eyes; beatings, electric shocks, burns or other painful tactics; "waterboarding"; using military working dogs; using extreme cold or hot temperatures; mock executions; and depriving a detainee of food, water or medical care.

The manual also specifies that military police are not to be involved in interrogations.

Gandy said the narrow definitions should not affect most U.S. military interrogators, who rely on direct questioning for 90 percent or more of their successful efforts. President Bush this week said an alternative set of standards for the CIA -- which is not public -- has been necessary for interrogating top terrorist suspects, but Gandy and other Army officials said aggressive tactics are not required.

"These tools, used effectively, are adequate to meet our needs," he said of the techniques in the new manual.

Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First, said she is concerned that the Army field manual and a new Pentagon directive on detainee treatment designate the CIA as the agency that will do the nation's dirty work under a set of secret guidelines.

"I'm afraid that they think they'll let the military stick to the law and they'll transfer all those great ideas over to civilian interrogators," Massimino said of the aggressive techniques. "It highlights the chasm between the military's rule-of-law standard and the lawlessness for civilian agencies."

U.S. Finds 'Torture Chambers' In Iraq (AP-Y)

AP, September 9, 2006

The senior commander of U.S. and Iraqi forces in northern Iraq said Friday that a small number of "torture chambers" apparently used for sectarian violence were discovered along the Diyala River.

Maj. Gen. Thomas R. Turner II, whose area of responsibility stretches from the Iranian border north to Turkey and west to the Syrian border, told reporters at the Pentagon that two or three small rooms were found in May or June. He mentioned them as examples of sectarian strife that has spread from Baghdad to other parts of Iraq.

"We do see that migration," he said when asked about a Pentagon report to Congress last week that expressed concern that sectarian violence was spreading beyond the Iraqi capital, where it is most intense and widespread.

Turner estimated that the torture chambers were about 6 feet wide and 6 feet long. He did not give their exact location. He said they were along the Diyala River, which runs northeast of Baghdad toward the Iranian border.

"What it included were places where shackles were attached to walls, batteries, and other evidence of torture," he said.

Diyala province is predominantly Sunni, with a sizable population of Shiites as well as Kurds.

Turner spoke by video teleconference from his headquarters at Tikrit.

Ex-Marine Warns Not To Rush To Judgment (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Ilario G. Pantano was cleared in two killings in Iraq and says others accused may be too.

SAN DIEGO — This is not the role Ilario G. Pantano had in mind when he reenlisted in the Marine Corps after Sept. 11. He wanted to join the fight against terrorism.

But now he's doing something different: pleading with Americans not to presume that a growing number of Marines and soldiers accused of atrocities in Iraq are actually guilty.

He is the voice of experience. The second lieutenant was charged with killing two unarmed Iraqi prisoners but was exonerated last year in a high-profile preliminary hearing at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

The case destroyed his Marine Corps career but gave him a new mission. Pantano resigned his commission in mid-2005.

"He is the perfect spokesman for the idea that you shouldn't prejudge," said Charles W. Gittins, his lawyer. "The case against him was supposedly solid but it fell apart quickly. It could happen again."

Gittins, in San Diego to defend a sergeant accused in a drowning at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot, wants Pantano to run for office. Pantano, 35, now living in North Carolina, says he's keeping his options open.

"What a great congressman or senator," Gittins said. "There are guys in those offices now who can't carry his briefcase."

Marine Sgt. Daniel Coburn, who accused Pantano of killing two defenseless Iraqis and of falsely claiming that the two were making threatening movements, has apparently not changed his mind.

The sergeant no longer talks to reporters, but his wife, Rae Anne, was scalding in expressing the family's opinion of Pantano: "He's a fake, and the media loves him because he's good-looking and articulate," she said.

On the articulate part, there is little doubt. Comfortable in front of cameras and unwavering in his opinions, Pantano has made the rounds of the political talk shows.

Even the acerbic and liberal-leaning Jon Stewart seemed impressed when Pantano appeared on "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" on Comedy Central. Pantano told the audience that no one could comprehend the brutality and moral confusion of war who had not seen it.

The war in Iraq, he said, boils down to deciding between a bad choice and a worse one.

DOJ_NMG_0061275

"One day you're interrogating a grandmother in front of her grandchildren because her son is a sniper and you've got to find this guy because he's killing your men," he said. "But she has lost children to Saddam — maybe four or five of them. You feel now this inner struggle: 'Am I becoming the beast?' "

Conservative bloggers championed Pantano's defense during the court case and are now praising his book "Warlord: No Better Friend, No Worse Enemy," which tells of his combat in Iraq and his courtroom experiences at Camp Lejeune.

Blogger Michelle Malkin, a regular on Bill O'Reilly's show on Fox television, has given her blog following a direct order: "Your mission: Make this book a best-seller. Spread the word."

Pantano has bantered with MSNBC "Hardball" host Chris Matthews, written a letter to the Washington Post blasting Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) for accusing Marines of "cold-blooded murder," and had a chapter of "Warlord" published in Soldier of Fortune magazine.

After growing up in New York's Hell's Kitchen neighborhood and attending a prep school on scholarship, he joined the Marine Corps and served on the front line as a sergeant in the Persian Gulf War.

After leaving the Corps, he graduated from New York University and became a commodities broker and then a multimedia entrepreneur.

Even before the dust from the World Trade Center settled in 2001, he said, he'd hurried to a barber for a "high-and-tight" haircut to begin feeling like a Marine again.

He reenlisted shortly after the attacks and was commissioned as a second lieutenant.

But just months into his first tour in Iraq in 2004 as commander of a rifle platoon, Pantano was pulled from combat and ordered back to the U.S. to answer the murder charges.

Although he did not testify at the hearing, he had insisted to investigators that he killed the two Iraqis after they made threatening moves at him. His accuser, Coburn, with whom Pantano had clashed, was judged by the hearing officer to lack credibility.

Pantano's legal strategy was aggressive and media-smart and has become a kind of standard for other military personnel facing similar charges, particularly the seven Marines and Navy corpsman at Camp Pendleton accused of kidnapping and murdering a 52-year-old Iraqi.

Like Pantano, each of the so-called Pendleton 8 has hired a civilian attorney not bound by military restrictions about talking to reporters and not reluctant to criticize military investigators. Each of the eight, also like Pantano, has a website devoted to his defense.

Pantano is worried that decisions about bringing criminal charges are often made by investigators and officers without direct combat experience. The line between acceptable and unacceptable violence in Iraq is hard to discern, he said.

"Sadly, we want the line to be a very rigid and moral one," he said. "Unfortunately, that line moves as the intensity of combat builds."

Marines and soldiers may become reluctant to fire their weapons for fear of being criticized or charged, he warned. "Our reluctance to apply the right amount of violence upfront has only allowed a festering wound of the insurgency to get worse."

Blast In Kabul Kills 14 Afghans, 2 U.S. Soldiers (WP)

By Pamela Constable And Javed Hamdard

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 8 -- A suicide bomber rammed a Toyota sedan into a U.S. military convoy Friday morning on a busy Kabul street, triggering a blast that killed 14 Afghan civilians and two U.S. soldiers, officials here said. At least 17 other people, including a U.S. soldier, were injured.

The attack, carried out on the same block as the heavily guarded U.S. Embassy, was the latest of half a dozen bombings that in recent months have brought what was an almost exclusively rural insurgency onto the streets of the Afghan capital.

Friday's bombing came as Taliban militiamen are battling NATO troops in southern Afghanistan with unexpected aggressiveness and occupying rural districts there.

NATO officers meeting Friday in Warsaw debated a call from the alliance commander, Gen. James L. Jones, for member states to send as many as 2,500 more troops and additional combat aircraft and transports to the southern provinces.

Suicide bombings were all but unknown in Afghanistan until the past year. Afghan officials have charged that the attackers infiltrated from Pakistan, where they allegedly received training and weapons from Islamic groups or intelligence services.

Friday's explosion tore one U.S. military vehicle in half and scattered chunks of charred metal and human limbs across the pavement, witnesses said. It shattered hundreds of windows in the nearby Makroyan apartment complex.

DOJ_NMG_0061276

The blast occurred on the eve of two tense anniversaries for the country: the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, which triggered the U.S. military campaign that drove the Taliban from power the following November, and the assassination of the anti-Taliban guerrilla leader Ahmed Shah Massoud two days before.

The bomber struck just a few yards from a traffic circle containing a monument to Massoud. A massive public ceremony commemorating Massoud's death is planned for Saturday.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called the crime "a heinous act of terrorism," and he said U.S. authorities here would work closely with Afghan security agencies to investigate it.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai condemned the attack as a "shocking and despicable" act that went "against the values of Islam and humanity." In a statement released by his office, he said that "enemies of Afghanistan are trying to hinder the country's progress towards peace and democracy by disrupting the peaceful life of our people."

In recent months there have been half a dozen suicide bombings in the capital, most of them aimed at U.S. or NATO convoys and facilities.

Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, a spokesman for U.S. military forces here, said 94 civilians and 28 foreign and Afghan troops have been killed by roadside bombs this year.

"We will continue to work together with the Afghan government and Afghan security forces to defeat Taliban extremists and protect the people of Afghanistan from this brutal common enemy," Fitzpatrick said.

Witnesses to the midmorning bombing said they heard a tremendous explosion and saw bodies, including those of several women, thrown into the air. They said the dead included an elderly man who was selling used clothing from a pushcart and several brothers who were hanging up used jeans and shirts to display on a fence.

"I was just setting out my melons when I heard a sound such as I had never heard in my life," said Hamid Wafa, 20, whose left hand was injured by shattered glass from storefronts near his fruit stand. He said he had seen a white Toyota Corolla smash into the passing convoy. "If I knew who had done this I would kill him."

A man of 50 who gave his name as Qayoum said all the glass in his apartment windows had been shattered. He speculated that the attack was "the work of al-Qaeda and terrorists," pointing out that it had taken place near both the U.S. Embassy and the presidential palace.

Afghan, U.S. and NATO troops quickly cordoned off the blast site and stationed four tanks nearby. A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy said that no one there had been injured but that the facility was closed for the rest of the day as a security measure.

Pakistan has denied the accusations that it is tolerating or helping the Taliban. Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, acknowledged on a goodwill visit to Kabul earlier this week that there had been cross-border infiltration by Afghan insurgents hiding in the border areas, but he disputed suggestions that Pakistani agencies were aiding in those movements.

Friday's explosion was the deadliest attack in the capital since September 2002, when a pair of bombs hidden in a taxi and on a bicycle killed 26 people, injured dozens more and destroyed much of a downtown block of shops and hotels. Recent bombings in Kabul have included remote-control and suicide blasts. Last week, a NATO military convoy was bombed on a highway outside Kabul, killing three Afghans. Earlier this summer, remote-control blasts targeted public buses carrying Afghan civilian and security workers to their jobs.

Suicide Bomber Kills 16 In Kabul Near Embassy (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 8 — A suicide bomber smashed his car into an American military vehicle just yards from the United States Embassy in downtown Kabul on Friday morning, killing as many as 16 people and wounding 29, Afghan and American officials said.

The bombing was one of the most powerful to shake the capital since American forces drove the Taliban from power in 2001. The United States military issued a statement confirming the deaths of two American soldiers and said two others were wounded.

The Afghan police at the scene put the death toll at 11 civilians and 5 American soldiers. Witnesses said they saw three American soldiers lying in the street. Other soldiers might also have been killed, they said, as the blast ripped apart the armored Humvee, making it hard to believe that anyone inside could have survived.

Soldiers later pulled shredded American uniforms off the trees and picked up body parts. A seat from the Humvee was left hanging in a tree.

DOJ_NMG_0061277

Kabul residents said they were bracing for still more violence as they prepared to observe the fifth anniversary on Saturday of the death of the warlord Ahmed Shah Masood, who was killed by two suicide bombers from Al Qaeda in an assassination linked to the 9/11 attacks.

The Kabul bombing came amid a sharp escalation of violence in Afghanistan, where NATO and American military commanders are waging an offensive to crush a Taliban insurgency that has revived with unexpected strength this year.

Suicide bombers have struck more than 50 times in the last year, killing more than 100 civilians. Most often the attacks have been in the south, where the insurgency thrives.

That fighting against the insurgents continued Friday. A NATO soldier was killed and three others were wounded in a roadside attack in southwestern Afghanistan, where American troops are deployed, and another suicide bomber threw himself at a NATO convoy in Kandahar Province but killed only himself.

Heavy fighting also raged in a strategic area west of the city of Kandahar, where Canadian troops are locked in fierce battles with Taliban insurgents.

NATO defense chiefs, meeting in Warsaw on Friday, discussed raising still more troops for Afghanistan, which has become the largest and most serious combat mission in the alliance's 57-year history.

On Thursday, the Atlantic alliance's top commander of operations, Gen. James L. Jones of the United States, said that he had asked for 2,000 to 2,500 people on top of the roughly 18,500 soldiers NATO has already deployed in Afghanistan, and that he had called for more helicopters and transport aircraft.

But he said in an interview that alliance members had so far failed to provide equipment and troops pledged months ago, adding that he had asked them to "make good" on the promises and that he could not understand why NATO countries were delaying when their forces were facing sustained combat.

"I am asking for the forces we asked for 18 months ago," General Jones said. "It is not that we are making new demands. We have generated about 85 percent of the force that is required. In view of the hostilities that are going on, especially in the southern region, the commander on the ground said if he had the full kit he would be in very, very good shape."

The commander he referred to was the senior alliance officer, Lt. Gen. David Richards of Britain, who said Wednesday that after just six weeks in charge of the NATO force in the south, he felt the tide was turning against the Taliban, despite having lost 28 soldiers since Aug. 1.

"People are dying," General Jones added. "Soldiers are fighting, and so 85 percent in a peaceful situation may be O.K., but in a situation involving combat, that is another matter."

Asked which of the 26 countries in the alliance were dragging their feet, General Jones hesitated and then replied, "All of them."

During the weeks leading to NATO's deployment in the south, General Jones had repeatedly warned that the alliance would face strong resistance from insurgents and drug lords. "For the first time, their power is being challenged, and they will do everything possible to intimidate the NATO forces," he said.

In the capital, the soldiers killed in the blast were part of a provincial team whose work is to provide reconstruction and assistance to local communities, building roads and schools and supplying electricity, a United States military statement said.

The blast strewed blackened wreckage and shrapnel across the tree-lined central divide of the avenue and blew out windows in surrounding apartment buildings. The police were gathering pieces of flesh in buckets as firefighters hosed down the road and a burning vehicle.

An elderly woman sitting outside her home was hit by shrapnel in the chest and died instantly, witnesses said. A boy selling baseball caps on the street and another boy with a secondhand clothing stall were killed, said Abdul Zarif, 18, a shopkeeper. "Another stall owner was wounded and was screaming as his younger brother was also dead," he said.

A baker, Ghulam Hazrat, 40, was thrown across to the back of the bakery by the blast. "We were lost for minutes under the dust and smoke and finally we climbed out of the bakery, and I saw the smoke and flames from an American car burning, and a lot of bodies on the other side of the road," he said.

A number of those killed were city workers sweeping the streets. Many people in nearby apartments were wounded by flying glass, hospital officials said.

At the nearby hospital, Sakhi Muhammad, 35, was in tears as he found the body of his nephew, a municipal worker, and cursed the government of President Hamid Karzai. "God destroy you with your government," he shouted.

Another man, Turialai, collected the body of his newly married brother Hayatullah, 35, who had been a passer-by. Turialai telephoned someone to start preparing the funeral.

Suicide bombing was very rare in Afghanistan until last fall, when attacks suddenly escalated and spokesmen for the Taliban claimed to have trained hundreds of bombers to send in against the government of Afghanistan and its foreign allies.

DOJ_NMG_0061278

As of Aug. 12, suicide bombers had killed 124 people in Afghanistan this year. Of those, 105 — 84 percent — were civilians, according to United States military figures released in a statement in Kabul last month.

Car Bomb Kills 16 Near U.S. Embassy (WT/AP)

By Paul Garwood, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- In the most brazen attack yet on Kabul's heavily guarded center, a car bomber rammed into an American Humvee outside the U.S. Embassy yesterday, killing 16 persons, including two U.S. soldiers. It was the Afghan capital's deadliest suicide attack since the 2001 toppling of the Taliban.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, took responsibility for the attack, according to the privately run Pajhwok Afghan News Agency.

The attack shattered what had been a typically peaceful Muslim day of prayer in the war-ravaged capital and revealed the lingering vulnerability of foreign troops, local forces and Afghan civilians to terrorist attacks almost five years after a pro-American government was installed. Attacks in central Kabul have been rare in comparison with areas on the edge of the city and in the country's south.

Some 20,000 NATO soldiers and a similar number of U.S. forces are trying to crush the emboldened Taliban insurgency, mainly in southern Afghanistan. Taliban holdouts have been turning to Iraqi-style tactics -- including increasing numbers of suicide bombings -- to derail the government of President Hamid Karzai.

"Today's heinous act of terrorism is against the values of Islam and humanity," Mr. Karzai said.

The attack occurred as many Afghans were commemorating the assassination of anti-Taliban commander Ahmed Shah Masood, who was killed in an al Qaeda suicide bombing two days before the September 11 attacks in the United States.

Yesterday's explosion went off at 10:20 a.m. just 150 feet from the landmark Masood Square, which leads to the main gate of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy compound. It tore a 6-foot-wide crater in the road.

A witness, Najibullah Faizi, 25, said he saw a blue Toyota Corolla driven by a young, heavyset man speed past another car in the inside lane before slamming into one of two U.S. Humvees in a convoy.

"I fell to the ground after the blast. American soldiers started shooting at another car nearby. There was smoke and flames everywhere," Mr. Faizi said.

The blast sent a plume of brown smoke spiraling hundreds of feet into the sky and tore apart one of the Humvees, blowing it onto what had been its roof and turning it into a twisted, flaming hulk of metal.

All that remained of the bomb-packed car was its front end, which was engulfed in flames some 60 feet away from the explosion.

The blast's force shattered every window in a five-story, Soviet-era apartment block facing the scene, spraying shards of glass over children eating their breakfasts and women cleaning their cramped homes. Restaurants and businesses on the other side of the road also had windows and doors blown in.

The U.S. military initially said two other soldiers were wounded, but later revised it to one.

American and NATO troops are fighting the Taliban primarily across vast desert plains in southern Helmand and Kandahar provinces, center of the country's massive opium trade.

"The fighting is extraordinarily intense. The intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis," Brig. Gen. Ed Butler, the commander of British forces in Afghanistan, told British ITV news.

He echoed NATO commander Gen. James L. Jones' call Thursday for at least 2,000 more troops. Gen. Jones, who said the next few weeks would be decisive in the fight against militants, is in Poland pressing officials from the 26 NATO member states for more soldiers and air support.

Yesterday in Warsaw, NATO defense chiefs held their first meeting on Afghanistan since taking over military command of the south of the country, with the violence in the Muslim nation escalating rapidly.

High on the agenda at the talks in the Polish capital was the call by Gen. Jones and other NATO leaders for more troops and equipment for Afghanistan, Canadian Col. Brett Boudreau said.

"But the issue of force levels and contributions will not be an exclusive part of the discussions," he added.

New Urgency To Nato Troop Call (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee and Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Kabul on Friday suffered its worst bomb blast in recent years, as Nato continued a push for more troops for the battle against the Taliban in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0061279

The two events highlighted the challenges facing the military alliance, which has to contend with both a renewed insurgency and inbuilt difficulties in the way it provides troops for its missions.

A suicide bomber rammed into a US military convoy near the US embassy in the Afghan capital, killing two US soldiers and at least 14 civilians. Another 29 people were injured.

The blast was the second deadly bombing in Kabul in the space of a week and an indication that Taliban insurgents are becoming bold enough to strike outside their traditional southern strongholds.

A British soldier was killed in a suicide bomb along with four Afghan civilians on Monday, while fighting in Ghazni province just two hours south of the capital has been fierce this month.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai condemned Friday's blast as "despicable and shocking", in words echoed by Afghan residents injured in the explosion.

The attack came as the military chiefs of Nato's 26 member states met in Warsaw to discuss an urgent request for reinforcements from Gen James Jones, Nato's top commander.

In comments made to US-based journalists on Thursday night, Gen Jones made clear that he was looking for a reserve battalion of 800-1000 soldiers, plus air support that could involve additional personnel of up to 1,500 people.

Although Gen Jones formally requested such resources before Nato began its operation against the Taliban in southern Afghanistan on July 31, he now believes they are more important than ever.

"Normally in most operations we get by with about 80 per cent, 85 per cent of what we asked for, because most of our operations are somewhat benign," he said. "But since this one has turned, in the south at any rate, for a moment, pretty hot… getting that remaining 10, 15 per cent seems like more necessary now than it was maybe a month ago."

Gen Jones' request represents one of Nato's toughest challenges yet, since the alliance has long-standing difficulties in providing speedy troop deployments, air support and forces that can be moved around with ease.

Although Nato commanders are keen to use extra soldiers to help against the Taliban before the winter months set in, Nato usually takes considerable time to win troop commitments – and faces particular problems at a time when contributors are stretched in theatres ranging from Lebanon to Iraq.

At present, operations in the most important theatre against the Taliban – around the city of Kandahar - have been bolstered by short-term reinforcements from the Dutch and the US.

Gen Jones also called for a squadron of attack helicopters and "two or three" C-130 aircraft, the latest in a series of requests for more air support in Afghanistan. For years, alliance commanders have been hamstrung by the lack of available aircraft and at present the US is providing air support for many of the operations in the south.

Gen Jones' call for a flexible reserve battalion could also be difficult to meet. At the moment, national caveats restrict many Nato troops from moving around at will and taking on a fully fledged combat role.

Lethal Blast Near Embassy Stokes Afghan Security Fears (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — A suicide bomb attack Friday on a convoy of American Humvees near the fortified U.S. Embassy, which took about 16 lives, including two soldiers', has raised fears here about a growing ability of anti-government extremists to strike with apparent impunity, even in the capital.

Among those killed in the deadliest suicide bombing in Kabul since the Taliban fell in 2001 were six municipal street sweepers, who were finishing their morning cleaning of the neighborhood, and two young boys who sold water. As many as 20 children were hit by shattered glass as they played on narrow swaths of grass in front of an apartment complex or ate breakfast, said a doctor who treated them on the scene.

Local police said 14 civilians were killed, but hospitals registered fewer.

The bombing attack was one of four Friday in South Asia that killed civilians and underscored the continuing devastation caused by political unrest. The other blasts killed at least 29 people in India, five in Pakistan and two in Sri Lanka.

Kabul's suicide bombing came a day before the fifth anniversary of the assassination of anti-Taliban leader Ahmed Shah Massoud, and it came just after Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf had visited Kabul and promised to try to stem the flow of militant fighters from his country into Afghanistan.

For Afghans, the bombing signaled an encroaching threat from extremists, who had been largely confined to Afghanistan's border with Pakistan.

People in the neighborhood and across the capital blamed the incident on the Musharraf government, which they said had allowed the Taliban to take refuge, train and rearm in Pakistan. But they said the United States was responsible too because it has influence with Musharraf yet has failed to compel him to halt support for Taliban guerrillas or prevent their crossing into Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0061280

"We really are not happy about our neighbors, and Americans can put more pressure on Pakistan," said former Afghan army Col. Habeeb Chopan, 43, who lives in the nearby apartment complex. "America has chosen the wrong politics in Afghanistan."

For Abdul Majid, 35, who wept silently Friday evening in his hospital bed, the attack was a horror of loss. The municipal supervisor for the area, he is paid $66 a month and was checking on his workers when the bomber hit.

"This place was always safe. There were many soldiers nearby, but now six of my staff were killed; three were injured," he said, struggling to sip some water without moving his shrapnel-lacerated legs and left arm.

"They were such poor people; they had so little, and I don't know now what will happen to their families — how will they survive?" he said.

Sher Mohammed Karimi, a deputy chief of staff for the Afghan Ministry of Defense, said the bomb was exceptionally large and a kind seen more often in the south. A suicide bombing Aug. 28 in the southern city of Lashkar Gah killed 17 and injured more than 40.

U.S. officials portrayed Friday's blast as an expected outcome of weeks of hard fighting in the south between the Taliban and NATO forces.

"I think we have a war going on. I wouldn't make too much of one attack or another in Kabul," U.S. Ambassador Ronald E. Neumann said in comments broadcast on National Public Radio. "There is an attempt to give the appearance of more violence.

"I don't detect a strong groundswell of support for the Taliban," Neumann said. "It's a tough fight. We need more money. We're going to have to stay at it for a while. We are either going to abandon it to chaos or we're going to go forward and win, but you don't have any nice third choice."

North Atlantic Treaty Organization defense chiefs appeared to agree that more forces were needed to fight the Taliban. As a three-day meeting began in Warsaw, a spokesman for NATO's military committee, Canadian Col. Brett Boudreau, said the alliance was looking for about 2,000 more troops as well as equipment to help the alliance fight an increasingly fierce insurgency.

Before Friday's bombing, the military "had information about the possibility of an attack," acknowledged a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, U.S. Army Maj. Luke Knittig. "And this kind of information has helped us stop attacks in the past.

"But today we didn't have enough."

He said the Taliban were "showing a willingness to lash out" because of "the pressure we're putting them under."

"Today they targeted the international military — in some respects it's not unexpected. As long as we have them under pressure in the south … it would be likely the insurgents would try to test us in the capital," he said.

Still, Knittig said, "obviously today was pretty strong stuff."

The suicide bomber rammed his car into one of two Humvees traveling together about 600 feet from an entrance to the U.S. Embassy, close to a roundabout known as Massoud Circle.

The blast was so strong that it left only the burning metal skeleton of the vehicle and a crater 6 feet wide. Twisted metal hung in nearby trees; tatters of U.S. military uniforms and a charred pakol, a traditional Afghan hat, were among bits of clothing scattered around the bomb site.

Shrapnel shot out in all directions, killing a woman outside a Soviet-era apartment complex where all of the windows were blown out by the blast. The sidewalk was covered with broken glass.

Some of the bodies were so damaged that relatives had difficulty identifying them, said Moussa Zayer, 28, nursing director of Wazir Akbar Khan Hospital, which has a partnership with Loma Linda University Medical Center and gives free medicine to patients.

Zayer, who was on duty when the victims began to pour in, said most of the injured had shrapnel-shattered bones and severe cuts from flying glass.

"There were two boys, their faces were cut off; they were unrecognizable," he said. "Another boy, maybe 12 years old, was hurt in the spine. I think he will not walk again."

Local residents said the bomb would have been far more deadly if it had come on a weekday — Friday is Islam's holy day, and far fewer people are on the street.

The Ministry of Health is almost next door to the U.S. Embassy, and on a weekday, hundreds of workers would have been coming and going.

Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 16 People Near U.S. Embassy In Kabul (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan - A suicide bomber detonated an explosives-packed car Friday next to a U.S. military convoy, killing at least 16 people, including two American soldiers, just yards from the fortified entrance of the U.S. Embassy in central Kabul.

The attack, the bloodiest in the Afghan capital since American troops and their Afghan allies toppled the hard-line Taliban regime in 2001, came as more than 40,000 U.S. and NATO-led forces struggle to contain a resurgence of the Taliban and their al Qaida allies in Afghanistan's southern and eastern provinces.

At least 76 American and 73 NATO troops have died so far this year in Afghanistan. NATO officials, who took over command of the Afghanistan campaign from the United States last month, have admitted surprise at the intensity of the fighting. On Thursday, NATO'S commander, Gen. James L. Jones, called for another 2,000 to 2,500 NATO troops.

Intelligence officials told McClatchy Newspapers earlier this year that much of the violence in Afghanistan has come from tactics - such as car bombings, suicide attacks and homemade bombs - that were brought to Afghanistan by militants trained in their use in Iraq. Many of those militants had volunteered to remain in Iraq, but their trainers told them to return to Afghanistan and Pakistan to train others, the officials said.

Friday's bombing occurred three days before the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States. But several Western and American officials said it wasn't certain that the bombing was timed to coincide with it.

"I don't think it is linked," said Col. Tom Collins, a U.S. military spokesman. "The timing is what it is."

The bombing may have been staged to coincide with the fifth anniversary Saturday of the assassination of a fabled guerrilla leader and Taliban opponent, Ahmad Shah Massoud, who was killed by suspected al-Qaida operatives posing as television journalists. The day is commemorated as a national holiday.

The traffic circle near where Friday's bombing occurred is named for Massoud, whose northern alliance swept the Taliban from power with the aid of American special forces and air power.

"Today's heinous act of terrorism is against the values of Islam and humanity," President Hamid Karzai declared.

The car bomber detonated his explosives around 10:30 a.m. next to a Humvee in a convoy of three U.S. military vehicles that was driving on one of several broad boulevards that lead from the circle.

"There was a huge blast and there was fire and smoke," said Nasir Nasrat, 13, who was flying a kite from the roof of an apartment building that overlooks the site. "I ran downstairs and I saw the upper half of a boy's body hanging from a tree. There was a woman missing an arm and a leg."

Police said that at least 16 people were killed, including two U.S. soldiers in the Humvee. Two other American soldiers were injured, Collins said. News reports said dozens of Afghans were injured.

The blast was about 200 yards from the heavily protected entrance to the U.S. Embassy in the city's upscale Wazir Akbar Khan area.

The circle, which features a monument bearing Massoud's portrait and a column topped by a pair of hands nestling the globe, sits on the main road linking Kabul airport and the massive U.S. Embassy compound.

"It's a very popular route with the U.S. military," said an official of the 20,000-strong NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, who requested anonymity because the issue is politically sensitive.

A roadside bomb wounded four Italian ISAF soldiers Friday in western Farah province, the ISAF announced.

The worst of the fighting has been in the southern provinces of Kandahar and Helmand. The ISAF launched an offensive launched Saturday to drive the Taliban from the main highway in the Panjwayi district, west of the city of Kandahar.

It was unclear Friday whether NATO's 26 member countries would commit more troops to Afghanistan. Military officials from those countries met in Poland to discuss the fighting but no agreement on sending reinforcements was announced. The meeting is to conclude Saturday.

Commander Has Hard Sell On Afghan Troops (AP-Y)

By Monika Scislowska

AP, September 9, 2006

Calls by NATO's top commander for 2,000 more troops in Afghanistan could be running up against donor fatigue from key members of the alliance.

The NATO campaign has been draining: In one of the world's harshest environments, it has failed to ensnare top al-Qaida leaders and the insurgency is at its fiercest since the fall of the Taliban — raising the specter of an Iraq-style quagmire.

Many NATO nations have already committed thousands of troops to Lebanon, making sending more soldiers into harm's way a hard sell in countries large and small.

DOJ_NMG_0061282

"There is a general lack of combat-able, high-quality troops that can be dispatched at relatively short notice, and a lot of countries are under pressure," said Kristian Soeby Kristensen, an analyst at the Danish Institute for International Studies in Copenhagen.

"In Denmark, we are giving it all we've got now," he said. "We have no more troops ... and I would suppose that the same is true for other allied countries."

NATO military chiefs met in Poland on Friday for their first face-to-face discussions of the deadly fighting in southern Afghanistan, where NATO relieved U.S.-led troops a month ago.

On Thursday, alliance commander Gen. James L. Jones called for between 2,000 and 2,500 more troops as well as extra aircraft to confront the resurgent Taliban guerrillas.

NATO spokesman Col. Brett Boudreau said after the first day of the closed-door meeting in Warsaw that there was "broad agreement" on the need for reinforcements.

"I am not at liberty to say what has been agreed or brought back to capitals, but certainly there is broad agreement that this form of requirement needs to be filled," he said. The meeting ends Saturday.

Jones said the extra troops are part of military planning already agreed on within the alliance.

However, there is no indication which of NATO's 26 nations will step deeper into a military situation with grim parallels to Iraq.

Some 20,000 NATO soldiers and a similar number of U.S. forces now face an emboldened Taliban insurgency.

Jones is seeking reinforcements for the 8,000 mainly British, Canadian and Dutch troops, who took over southern Afghanistan in August. Since then, at least 35 NATO troops have died as well as hundreds of militants.

Jones said the extra military muscle would allow allied forces to destroy the insurgents.

He also dismissed comparisons with Iraq as "a cheap shot."

"We are talking about something which is very manageable militarily. I'm optimistic that Afghanistan is and will be a success story," he said.

However, U.S. and NATO commanders have repeatedly underestimated the ability of the Taliban to regroup after heavy losses, and there are signs that militants in Afghanistan are adopting tactics used in Iraq.

On Friday, the Afghan capital suffered its worst suicide attack since U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban regime in late 2001. Sixteen people died, including two U.S. soldiers, when the driver of a car packed with explosives rammed an American Humvee near the U.S. Embassy in Kabul.

Suicide attacks have become increasingly common in Afghanistan, and a Taliban commander claimed last week to have lined up hundreds of volunteers for such missions.

U.S. officials have confirmed that militants are using more and more sophisticated roadside bombs to target Afghan and foreign troops.

"The fighting is extraordinarily intense. The intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis," the commander of British forces in Afghanistan, Brig. Ed Butler, told British ITV news.

Against that background, some nations are reluctant to send more troops into the firing line.

Boudreau said NATO generals with troops in Afghanistan agreed Friday to "reduce to a minimum" the restrictions on how their forces are used.

Germany, for instance, is loath to reallocate any of its 2,800 troops deployed mostly in the relatively peaceful north of Afghanistan, to the south.

Also Friday, Turkey's top military commander said his country would not be contributing any combat troops to Afghanistan. Turkey, which has taken its turn at commanding the NATO force, currently has some 900 military personnel there helping with reconstruction.

Karzai On The Bombing: "The Enemy Is Not Eliminated" (TIME)

By Aryn Baker

Time, September 9, 2006

The ferocity of the battle for control of Afghanistan, which has raged across the south of the country for weeks, was felt Friday in the capital. A massive suicide car-bombing in Kabul killed two Americans and at least 16 Afghans, and rocked the floor of the presidential palace a mile away, where President Karzai was sitting down for an interview with TIME.

Windows rattled across the city Friday morning as a suicide car-bomber rammed a U.S. convoy patrolling near the U.S. embassy in the city center. It was the second suicide attack in a week, following on Monday's bombing near the airport that killed five people. And it came at the end of a week of fierce clashes in the south; the strength of Taliban resistance has surprised

DOJ_NMG_0061283

NATO commanders, who on Thursday called on member-states to send a further 2,000 troops to reinforce its counterinsurgency mission in the Taliban's heartland.

President Karzai, struggling to maintain his composure in the minutes following the blast, condemned the attack and lamented the loss of life, but adamantly rejected any suggestion that the security situation in Afghanistan was deteriorating.

"Look, we have enemies," Karzai said. "The same enemies that blew up themselves in London, the same enemies that blew up the train in Madrid or the train in Bombay or the twin towers in America are still around. Before September 11 they were the government in Afghanistan. Today they are on the run and hiding and they come out from their hiding and try to hurt us when they can manage it."

Hurt Afghans they certainly did. Witnesses at the blast site described a mangled Humvee, a bomb crater about four feet deep, scattered body parts, and most chillingly, a bra tangled in tree branches above the vehicle, where it was hurled by the strength of the explosion. Although coalition forces were the immediate target, the size and range of the blast at a busy intersection suggests that the civilian casualties were intentional. Massoud Circle, where the attack occurred, is located near an apartment complex housing thousands of families, where many windows were shattered.

If Karzai's enemies are, indeed, on the run, events over the past week suggest they are far from being defeated. Besides the two suicide attacks in the capital and insurgent attacks scattered throughout the south and west, Taliban forces have mounted a surprisingly strong resistance to an ongoing NATO operation near Kandahar in which both sides have suffered substantial casualties. The bombings in the capital "looks to be the insurgents lashing out against us for the pressure we are putting on them in the south," says Luke Knittig, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force. "Conventional warfare is taking its toll down there, and they know the importance of the capital."

With NATO still finding its feet just a month after taking control of the south from U.S. forces, the Taliban appears determined to do its utmost to test the appetite of the Western alliance for a sustained and messy counterinsurgency campaign. But Knittig insists that the alliance will not be swayed. "NATO has signed on the line for a long-term commitment to Afghanistan."

The Alliance will need to sustain that outlook if plans for rebuilding a viable Afghan society free of the Taliban are to be realized. "We will have [attacks of this kind] for a long time," warns Karzai. "The enemy is defeated, but it is not eliminated. The elimination part is what we should continue to work on. And that needs patience. That needs perseverance and that needs hard work."

Source: Mullah Omar In Pakistan (CNN)

By Peter Bergen, Anderson Cooper

CNN, September 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) -- The one-eyed Taliban leader Mullah Omar, who heads the religious militia fighting U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan, is living in Pakistan, though not in the same area where al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden is thought to be, according to a U.S. intelligence source.

The elusive Taliban leader is believed to be in Quetta or its environs, a city of one million that is the capital of Baluchistan province in southwestern Pakistan.

The intelligence source said of Mullah Omar's location: "At one point we had it down to a particular section of Quetta."

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf did not address specifically the question on his visit to Kabul Thursday, but said "Please do understand the Pakistan government (is not) behind anything that is happening in Afghanistan."

The last known location for Mullah Omar was in the southern Afghan city of Kandahar, which he fled in December 2001 as U.S. forces closed in on the city. The U.S. government is now offering a reward of up to $10 million for information leading to his capture.

The intelligence source says that Mullah Omar continues to supply "high level guidance" to his movement of religious warriors, although he is not involved in the day-to-day operations of the movement, a role that is largely played by military commander Mullah Dadullah.Specific location

U.S. officials have been saying for some time that another of the world's most wanted men -- Mullah Omar's close friend and advisor, bin Laden -- is believed to be in the Pakistan-Afghanistan border area, and the intelligence source who spoke of Mullah Omar offered a specific location for bin Laden, as well.

The source said that bin Laden is likely in Bajuar, a sparsely populated remote tribal region on the northern Afghan-Pakistan border, bordering Chitral. That is a region that a U.S. military intelligence official has identified to CNN in the past as a strong possibility for the location of al Qaeda's leader.

Meanwhile, NATO's top military commander, U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, has called on the 26 member nations to provide more troops for Afghanistan, which is facing its deadliest spate of violence since the Taliban regime was ousted in late 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0061284

A huge suicide car bomb struck a convoy of U.S. military vehicles Friday in the Afghan capital, killing at least 18 people, officials and witnesses said. (Full story)

Major Reported She Had Been Kidnapped (AP)

By Leila Saralayeva, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

A U.S. Air Force officer who disappeared earlier this week in Kyrgyzstan was found alive late Friday, reportedly telling people who helped her that she had been kidnapped, officials said.

Maj. Jill Metzger, 33, was located by Kyrgyz law enforcement agents who informed authorities at the U.S. air base at the airport in Bishkek, the Central Asian nation's capital, base spokeswoman Capt. Anna Carpenter said.

Kyrgyz Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev said Metzger, 33, knocked on the door of a house on the outskirts of the capital shortly before midnight and told its residents that she had been kidnapped.

Metzger said she had been abducted by three young men and a woman in a minibus and held in a rural area 30 miles from Bishkek, Suvanaliyev told The Associated Press Saturday. He cited local police in Kant, where he said she approached the first house she came to. He said she looked exhausted and her hair was dyed.

That account differed somewhat from one given by Metzger's father-in-law, Kelly Mayo, who said in a telephone interview with the AP from Colorado Springs, Colo., that Metzger was found on the side of the road with her head shaved.

"I know she's coherent, and whoever had her let her go," he said, adding that she had been beaten. "We've got her back. Praise the Lord."

Suvanaliyev said the people who took Metzger in when she knocked on their door called the police.

Mayo said the Air Force's Office of Special Investigations notified the family Friday afternoon but were given few details. He said his son, Air Force Capt. Joshua Mayo, was elated after being told about his wife.

"I can't even describe it. He's just beside himself, just unbelievable joy," Mayo said, adding the family was waiting for her to call.

There was no immediately U.S. comment on the kidnapping report. Carpenter declined to discuss Metzger's condition, which a U.S. military statement said will be determined by a medical team.

"We are elated to have Jill back with us," a U.S. military statement quoted the base commander, Col. Scott Reese, as saying.

Kyrgyz authorities notified base officials at 1:15 a.m. local time Saturday of the news, the statement said.

Metzger, a former resident of Henderson, N.C., was serving a four-month stint at the base with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing. Her normal duty station is Moody Air Force Base in Georgia as a member of the 347th Mission Support Squadron. She had been scheduled to land back at her U.S. base Friday.

The U.S. military has maintained an air base at Kyrgyzstan's main civilian airport since 2001, backing operations in nearby Afghanistan.

Military officials said the newlywed Metzger, dressed in blue jeans and a sweater, vanished during a shopping trip to a tourist hotspot in Bishkek, where she was searching for souvenirs to bring home to her family. The so-called "cultural tours" are common for off-duty personnel.

Her disappearance had baffled investigators. The military had 22 special agents looking for Metzger.

The shopping center where Metzger disappeared, located about 35 miles from the base, is not a particularly dangerous area, said Col. Kevin Jacobson of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations.

Still, the military had instituted a new policy barring all off-duty personnel from leaving the base until Metzger was found. It was unclear late Friday whether that policy had changed.

Interior Ministry spokesman Nurdin Jangarayev told the AP on Thursday that Metzger and another U.S. servicewoman were recorded on a security camera Tuesday afternoon as they entered TsUM, Bishkek's main department store.

She separated from her companion three minutes later, Jangarayev said. Over the next three hours, two calls were placed to her cellular phone but neither was answered, he said.

Before her disappearance, Metzger had been scheduled to head to Dayton, Ohio, for the annual United States Air Force Marathon. She has twice won the women's division of the event.

A week later, she was to travel with her husband to Jamaica for a belated 10-day honeymoon.

"Jill is a consummate happy-go-lucky person," her father-in-law said. "She doesn't see any kind of evil in the world. She's a wonderful, innocent person, and she would never think anyone would try and harm her."

Associated Press Writers Mike Baker in Raleigh, North Carolina, and Steve Gutterman in Moscow contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0061285

Air Force Officer Who Vanished In Kyrgyzstan Is Found Alive (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan, Saturday, Sept. 9 — A United States Air Force officer who disappeared earlier this week in Kyrgyzstan said she had been kidnapped, a senior Kyrgyz security official said Saturday.

Maj. Jill Metzger, 33, who vanished on Tuesday, knocked on the door of a house in a town outside Bishkek, the capital, early Saturday morning and told residents she had been abducted, Deputy Interior Minister Omurbek Suvanaliyev said.

Major Metzger said that she had been seized by three young men and a woman in a minibus and held in a rural area 30 miles from the capital, Mr. Suvanaliyev said.

A spokeswoman for the United States base at Bishkek's airport, Capt. Anna Carpenter, said earlier Saturday that Major Metzger, who had vanished during a shopping excursion, had been located but declined to comment on her condition, which an American military statement said would be determined by a medical team.

"We are elated to have Jill back with us," the statement quoted the base commander, Col. Scott Reese, as saying.

Her father-in-law, Kelly Mayo, said in a telephone interview from Colorado Springs, Colo., that the Air Force's Office of Special Investigations had notified the family, but few details were available. He said his son, Air Force Capt. Joshua Mayo, was overjoyed at the news.

"He's just beside himself, just unbelievable joy," Mr. Mayo said.

Major Metzger, a former resident of Henderson, N.C., was serving a four-month stint at the base with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing. Her normal duty station is Moody Air Force Base in Georgia as a member of the 347th Mission Support Squadron. She had been scheduled to land back at her base on Friday.

Military officials said Major Metzger, who recently married and was dressed in jeans and a sweater, vanished during a shopping trip in Bishkek, where she was searching for souvenirs for her family.

Such outings are common for off-duty personnel. Her disappearance had baffled investigators.

The military had 20 special agents looking for Major Metzger.

The American military has maintained an air base at Kyrgyzstan's main civilian airport since 2001, to support operations in nearby Afghanistan. The shopping center where Major Metzger disappeared, about 35 miles from the base, is not a particularly dangerous area, said Col. Kevin Jacobson of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations.

Still, the military had instituted a new policy barring all off-duty personnel from leaving the base until Major Metzger was found. It was unclear late on Friday whether that policy had changed.

Before her disappearance, Major Metzger had been scheduled to head to Dayton, Ohio, for the annual United States Air Force Marathon. She has twice won the women's division of the event.

A week later, she was to travel with her husband to Jamaica for a belated 10-day honeymoon.

Army On Pace To Meet Year's Recruiting Goal (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The Army will meet its goal of recruiting 80,000 new active-duty soldiers this fiscal year but will fall short in the percentage of high school graduates as the education level of enlistees dips below the norm of the past decade, according to senior Pentagon officials.

The Army's apparent success in meeting the U.S. military's biggest recruiting mission marks a significant rebound from last year, when the Iraq war, low unemployment and a shortage of recruiters contributed to the service's failure to make its active-duty target for the first time since 1999.

Pentagon officials attributed the gains primarily to a beefed-up active-duty recruiting force, which grew from 5,100 at the beginning of 2005 to 6,600 this year. "The most fundamental reason for success was the increase in recruiters in the field," said Curtis L. Gilroy, director of accession policy at the Pentagon.

In addition, Congress authorized a doubling of the maximum enlistment bonus from $20,000 to $40,000. It also instituted special recruiting incentives, such as extra pay of up to $500 a month for recruiters who exceed their goals and a $1,000 bonus for soldiers for each person they refer to recruiters who completes boot camp.

The influx of new soldiers bodes well for the all-volunteer military engaged in its first sustained combat, boosting the Army's active-duty manpower by roughly 10,000 troops at a time when the nation's main ground force is bearing the brunt of the fighting and casualties in Iraq.

"We all know if we don't get recruiting right, the rest doesn't matter too much," Gilroy said.

DOJ_NMG_0061286

By the end of August, the Army had recruited nearly 73,000 soldiers -- or 104 percent of the fiscal year-to-date goal for active duty -- chalking up an unusually high summer target of more than 10,000 recruits a month.

"I fully expect we will make our 80,000 mission for the fiscal year," Maj. Gen. Sean J. Byrne, director of Army personnel, told reporters. "I am more than satisfied with the quality of the soldiers," he added.

But though the number of Army recruits has grown this year, the number of those meeting key Pentagon standards has declined compared with the past several years.

For example, the proportion of recruits holding a high school diploma was 81.2 percent as of August, falling below the Pentagon benchmark of 90 percent for the second year in a row. The last time the Army fell to such a low level of high school graduates was in 1981, when it dropped to 80 percent.

As of August, about 61 percent of the Army recruits scored above the 50th percentile on the Armed Forces Qualification Test -- the lowest percentage since 1985 but still above the Pentagon's benchmark of 60 percent. About 3.7 percent of enlistees had the lowest acceptable scores, slightly below last year's figure of 4 percent but well above the average for the past decade.

In addition, the number of soldiers granted waivers for medical conditions, drug or alcohol problems, or misdemeanors has gradually increased, from 10 percent in 2001 to 15 percent last year, with this year's figure expected to be slightly higher, according to Byrne and Army data. "The Army understands that some people make mistakes in their lives" and should be afforded an opportunity to serve their country, Byrne said.

Still, Pentagon officials said they were not overly concerned about the measures, in part because they do not reflect the newly implemented tests of motivation and fitness designed to glean from the pool of less qualified soldiers those who are likely to perform well.

This year, for example, the Pentagon implemented military-wide a program designed at Walter Reed Army Medical Center to test the fitness of potential recruits who are in good condition but are heavier than average, such as football players. About 1,000 Army recruits this year were granted waivers after they passed the test of 15 minutes of step climbing and 15 push-ups, Gilroy said.

An additional 5,000 Army recruits who lacked high school diplomas but had GEDs received waivers this year after they passed a new screening test for motivation and dependability, which research has shown to correlate with staying in the Army.

Overall, only about 25 percent of American 17-to-24-year-olds -- 4.6 million -- are qualified to join the military. The rest have crime, drug and medical problems that exclude them, such as the 25 percent who are obese, Gilroy said.

Meeting next year's active-duty recruiting target of 80,000 will remain a major challenge for the Army, which will start the year with a pool of only about 14 percent of recruits who have signed contracts but not entered boot camp -- compared with the goal of 25 to 35 percent.

"The recruiting environment is very tough, very difficult," Byrne said, because of the economy, low unemployment and "the obvious fact that we're a nation at war."

Army Touts Recruiting Turnaround (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 9, 2006

The Army says its success in enlisting new soldiers this year, after a dismal 2005, is innovative salesmanship by a bigger team of recruiters and financial incentives like bonuses of up to $40,000.

The Pentagon announced Friday that the Army met its recruiting goal for August, which a senior Army official said makes it virtually certain that the service will achieve its aim of signing up 80,000 new soldiers for the full recruiting year, which ends Sept. 30. Last year the Army fell short for the first time since 1999.

"We're reaching out a lot better," said the official, Maj. Gen. Sean Byrne, director of military personnel management. The Army is making better use of the Internet, for example, to reach more young people, he said.

The Army also has put about one-third more recruiters on the street, and Congress approved new financial incentives for enlistees, including signing bonuses for some slots of as much as $40,000. The Army also began allowing people as old as 42 to enter the service; the maximum age previously was 35.

Through August, the active-duty Army had signed up 72,997 new soldiers, nearly 3,000 above its year-to-date target. The Army National Guard was about 200 below its target of 63,240, while the Army Reserve, which had a particularly weak performance in August, was almost 2,000 below its year-to-date target of 33,124.

For August alone, the active Army topped the 10,000 mark for the second month in a row. It was the 15th consecutive month the active Army has met or exceeded its monthly goal. It missed four months in a row in early 2005, and some questioned whether the Army had developed a chronic and debilitating problem.

DOJ_NMG_0061287

The Marine Corps, Air Force and Navy all achieved their August goals and are on target to meet their full-year targets, the Pentagon said.

Summer is typically the strongest recruiting season.

The Army's ability to recruit is particularly important now because it is trying to grow in size, as part of a plan to build a larger number of combat brigades for use in Iraq, Afghanistan and potentially elsewhere. Without that growth, existing brigades would be rotating so often on overseas combat tours that the Army would risk alienating soldiers and their families, thus eroding their willingness to re-enlist.

Even now, after increasing the active-duty Army by about 10,000 soldiers this year, to about 501,000, soldiers generally get less than two years at home between one-year tours in Iraq.

Byrne said the Iraq war continues to be a drag on recruiting, and he said unpublished Army research surveys show people of enlistment age are increasingly disinclined to join. Similarly, adults who influence the choices of potential recruits — like parents, teachers and coaches — are less inclined to recommend military service.

But the Army has managed to overcome those negative factors by using more innovative techniques to reach young people, Byrne said. Recruiters, for example, are available at all hours on an Army Web site chat room. Those who indicate a strong interest are then offered a chance to meet face-to-face with a recruiter. That has proven more productive, Byrne said, than traditional tactics like waiting for people to walk into a recruiting station.

The Army also has accepted a larger number of recruits whose score on a standardized aptitude test is at the lower end of the acceptable range, and it has granted waivers to permit the enlistment of people with criminal records that otherwise would disqualify them. The Army says it does not grant waivers if there is a pattern of criminal misconduct or for convictions of drug trafficking or any sexually violent crimes.

Ex-Congress Aide Accused In Spy Case Is Free On Bail (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A former journalist and Congressional aide accused of working with Iraqi intelligence before the war was released from prison yesterday after a federal judge ruled that she could not be forced to take antipsychotic medication in an effort to make her competent to stand trial.

The judge, Michael Mukasey of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was not convinced that even if she took the medication, the defendant, Susan P. Lindauer, 43, would improve enough to be capable of standing trial.

Judge Mukasey also criticized the strength of the government's case, saying that the legal standard for forcibly administering medication requires a strong government interest in prosecution, and that the government has not been able to establish that standard in this case. The ruling was a setback for the government's case against Ms. Lindauer, who was arrested in March 2004 at her home in Takoma Park, Md. An indictment charged that Ms. Lindauer, also known as Symbol Susan, conspired to act as an unregistered agent of the government of Iraq from October 1999 until February 2004, and engaged in illegal financial transactions.

Although he was reluctant to analyze the government's case before trial, the judge said, "There is no indication that Lindauer ever came close to influencing anyone, or could have." The indictment, he said, describes an attempt to influence an unnamed government official as unsuccessful.

Investigators said she had tried to influence American policy by presenting herself as an agent of Saddam Hussein's government in early 2003 to Andrew H. Card Jr., then the White House chief of staff, who was described as a distant relative.

Judge Mukasey said that for Ms. Lindauer to succeed as an agent of the Iraqi government, she would have had to influence other people. But her mental condition makes that highly unlikely, he said.

"The record shows that even lay people recognize that she is seriously disturbed," Judge Mukasey said in a 35-page ruling issued on Wednesday. He said that a neighbor had suspected her of being mildly schizophrenic.

Prosecutors said she met with Iraqi intelligence officers at places in Baghdad, including Al Rashid Hotel, in 2002, where she accepted $5,000 in cash.

Ms. Lindauer told a television reporter after her arrest that she was innocent, and that she was an antiwar activist.

Ms. Lindauer worked as a journalist in Washington and in the press offices of several liberal Democrats in the House and Senate, although her last such job was in 2002.

At least a half dozen doctors for both the defense and the prosecution have found that Ms. Lindauer suffers from delusions of grandeur and paranoia, which makes her incompetent to stand trial, the judge said. But she refuses to accept the diagnosis or to take medication, he said. One doctor found that Ms. Lindauer had a history of psychotic episodes going back to her childhood, possibly at the age of 7, the judge said. These include her contention that she had gifts of prophecy that allowed her to report 11 bombings before they happened, that she spoke with divine inspiration and that she was an angel.

DOJ_NMG_0061288

Among her paranoid delusions, doctors said, were the notion that she was being watched by hidden cameras in her apartment, that the Egyptian government had tried to assassinate her and that men next door had videotaped her under instructions from President Bill Clinton.

At a hearing before Judge Mukasey yesterday, prosecutors offered a backup plan, asking the judge to order Ms. Lindauer to either voluntarily take antipsychotic drugs for 30 days or be held in contempt. Contempt charges could be punished with jail time.

Judge Mukasey declined to rule on the prosecutor's suggestion, saying that the case was being assigned to another judge and that he would leave that decision to her.

Meanwhile, he ordered Ms. Lindauer to be released under previously determined terms, including on bail of $500,000, on the condition that she receive psychological counseling and that her travel be restricted.

Her lawyer, Sanford Talkin, said she was released from the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan, where she has been held for the last few weeks.

Before that, she was in a federal prison hospital in Carswell, Tex. He said she would now return to her home in Maryland.

"She can't go to trial until she's competent," Mr. Talkin said. "I think it was a difficult decision, but I think it was the right decision, and I think it was a just decision."

Ms. Lindauer is a 1985 graduate of Smith College, where she majored in economics, and she received a master's degree from the London School of Economics.

Her father, John Lindauer, was the Republican nominee for governor of Alaska in 1998.

Judge Mukasey also expressed humanitarian concerns about forcing Ms. Lindauer to take medication, which, he said, "necessarily involves physically restraining defendant so that she can be injected with mind-altering drugs."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Stock Options Probe Expands (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - As shareholders are finding out how costly the stock-options backdating scandal might be, a widening cast of characters is being targeted.

In the latest development Friday, Broadcom Corp., a supplier of chips used in communications devices, said it may need to boost a charge it takes to $1.5 billion or more for stock-option accounting flaws -- double what it estimated in July.

Government officials said this week they want to know what roles corporate directors as well as outside attorneys, auditors and compensation consultants might have played in helping executives manipulate the timing of option grants to enrich themselves and their colleagues.

More than 100 public companies, many of them in the technology sector, are under scrutiny by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible rigging of stock-option grants to boost their value to the recipients. The Justice Department is investigating scores of companies for possible criminal violations.

California-based Broadcom, for example, uncovered grants awarded between June 2000 and 2002 in which the measurement dates differed from grant dates.

And the Internal Revenue Service is looking at possible tax-law violations in option grants by some companies.

Congress weighed in this week with hearings on the issue by two Senate panels. The chairman of one of them, the Senate Finance Committee, wants to learn more about the supporting players and is digging deep.

"It's hard to believe ... that the executives did this all by themselves," Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said at a hearing Wednesday. "And to be honest, the idea that all executives at different companies came up with this idea at the same time stretches the imagination."

Grassley said he planned to write to "several major corporations" that have engaged in backdating of stock options, asking them to provide the minutes of board meetings in which directors discussed the matter as well as documents from attorneys, accountants and consultants who assisted.

In backdating, options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, a practice that can fatten profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices. Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed to investors and properly approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can run afoul of federal accounting and tax laws.

DOJ_NMG_0061289

"We need to understand and bring enforcement action against all the actors who were involved with this abusive scandal," Grassley said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who testified at the same hearing, said the Justice Department "would have no difficulty bringing cases against accountants and attorneys" if the prosecutors can meet the relatively high burden of proof of criminal intent.

At the same time, though, he said he views the role of outside actors as "less significant" than in other financial scandals of recent years -- which he termed far more complex than options dating and involving a multitude of players both inside and outside companies.

As a government law-enforcement official, McNulty was being "appropriately cautious" in his public comments, said Michael Koenig, a former federal prosecutor who now is in private law practice at Dewey Ballantine in Washington. If outside players are found to have actively participated in illegal options timing schemes, Koenig said, "They will get charged; they will get prosecuted."

For attorney Darren Robbins, complicity by directors and outside parties is a given: His firm is targeting a number of them in its lawsuits against dozens of companies over the timing of options grants to executives, brought on behalf of big pension funds in the United States, Europe and Australia.

His mission is to ensure "that the net is cast wide enough to include all of those who formulated or perpetrated the wrongdoing," said Robbins, a partner in San Diego-based Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, a high-profile law firm specializing in class-action suits against public companies.

He said he doesn't expect companies to voluntarily provide the relevant documents to Grassley, so the finance panel chairman may have to threaten issuing subpoenas.

In related developments this week:

· Comverse Technology Inc., a maker of voicemail software whose option awards are under investigation, said Tuesday that it has requested more time from the Nasdaq Stock Market to file its restated finance statements to avoid having its stock stripped from trading. Federal authorities charged last month that three former top executives of Comverse hatched a scheme to secretly manipulate options for profit.

· The Home Depot Inc. disclosed Wednesday that federal prosecutors in Manhattan have asked for information from the nation's largest home-improvement store chain in connection with an inquiry into stock options. Atlanta-based Home Depot said in June that the SEC had begun an examination after the company disclosed it had found $10 million in unrecorded stock-option expenses.

· Sharper Image Corp. said Thursday that it needed more time to finalize its second-quarter results so its recently reorganized board can determine if past employee options were properly recorded, creating a potential distraction as the specialty merchant struggles to snap out of a deep sales funk.

· Casual clothier Gap Inc. reported Thursday that an internal review of its stock-option practices found errors related to the dating of certain grants, resulting in unrecorded expenses of around $5 million.

Broadcom Problem Grows (MERCN)

By Mark Schwanhausser

The San Jose Mercury News, September 9, 2006

Broadcom warned investors Friday that its internal review of misdated stock options had uncovered deeper problems that will force it to recognize at least $1.5 billion in expenses -- double the Irvine company's original estimate in July.

Meanwhile, a Silicon Valley company said its internal investigation had come to the opposite conclusion: Linear Technology found ``no evidence of fraud or misconduct of any kind.'' Still, the Milpitas chip maker apparently became the first valley company to disclose that the Internal Revenue Service is looking into possible option abuses.

So far, about 120 U.S. companies face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews, with about one-fourth of them based in Silicon Valley. Many of those have warned they will need to restate past financial reports because option abuses led them to overstate their profits.

Broadcom stands apart, however, because the size and breadth of its errors have grown dramatically. The semiconductor maker said in July that it had understated its option expenses by an estimated $750 million and would restate records dating to 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0061290

Now it says it will restate financial reports back to 1998 -- covering its entire history as a public company. The accounting charge ``will be at least twice the amount previously estimated and could be substantially more'' if investigators find more tainted options, Broadcom said.

The $1.5 billion expense is more than double the $727.5 million in net income that Broadcom reported in its four profitable years, according to Bloomberg News. The company suffered $6.6 billion in net losses in the other four years. Its stock fell 34 cents to $26.09 Friday, but it has dropped 46 percent since peaking in March.

`Destabilizing scandal'

The revelation forces investors to grapple with a troubling question, said Damon Silvers, associate general counsel for the AFL-CIO, which manages union pensions with $5 trillion in assets.

``Is the company a successful business or not?'' Silvers said. ``That's why we've been saying over and over again that this is a profoundly destabilizing scandal.''

In contrast, Linear Technology's internal review concluded that it ``did not employ backdating'' from 1995 to 2006 and would not need to restate financial records. Backdating involves doctoring the paperwork on options to dates with lower stock prices to give recipients immediate paper profits.

Linear came under suspicion because of a number of fortuitously timed option grants. In 1998, for example, Chairman and Chief Executive Robert H. Swanson Jr. and at least four other top executives received options priced at the lowest price of the company's fiscal year.

In its annual report issued Friday, the company said it granted stock options on a quarterly basis near board meetings that were scheduled far in advance to coincide with the release of quarterly earnings.

Linear previously disclosed that it is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department -- and the annual report noted that the IRS had joined that list Tuesday. Linear's stock fell 23 cents to close at $32.59 Friday.

A local IRS spokesman declined to comment on the agency's request for documents, citing privacy issues. It can't say whether its request was minor or a full-fledged audit. Unlike the SEC, which can escalate from an informal investigation to a formal investigation, the IRS doesn't have a way to signal if an audit is escalating.

IRS joins task force

The news of the IRS's involvement in Linear came a day after the U.S. attorney in San Francisco announced that four IRS criminal investigation agents had joined a task force examining whether companies and executives committed fraud when options were misdated. The task force now has 15 members from the SEC, Justice Department and IRS.

Some experts are hesitant to read too much into the IRS's request for documents from Linear, however. Because the options scandal has unfolded rapidly -- and could reflect problems at hundreds more companies -- the IRS might still be gathering data from companies nationwide to assess the scope of the problem and how to develop an eventual settlement program.

``They're in the very early stages here,'' said Pete Klinger, director of compensation and benefits at BDO Seidman in San Francisco. ``From what we've seen so far, it is not very widespread.''

Broadcom's Stock Option Costs Soar (LAT)

By James S. Granelli, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Unreported expenses may surpass $1.5 billion, leading to the largest restatement among firms under scrutiny for alleged manipulation.

As an optimistic symbol of the technology industry's future, Broadcom Corp. in the late 1990s was hard to beat.

Stock options turned average workers into millionaires, and the founders established themselves at the top of Orange County's corporate and philanthropic elite as the Irvine chip maker's share price soared.

But eight years after its frothy debut on the public markets, Broadcom is fast epitomizing the industry's cavalier past — and more sober prospects.

On Friday, the company said unreported expenses related to those stock options that peppered the employee parking lot with Ferraris and Lamborghinis are likely to swell to more than $1.5 billion and ultimately could be "substantially more."

The revision is double an estimate of two months ago and would increase Broadcom's accumulated losses since going public in 1998 to more than $7 billion. It's also the largest restatement among any of the more than 100 public companies under scrutiny over alleged manipulation of the timing of stock option grants.

DOJ_NMG_0061291

Although technology companies were more likely than other firms to grant stock options as incentives for rank-and-file workers as well as executives, questions about the practice are being raised at a number of companies — including Home Depot, Cheesecake Factory, Cablevision and UnitedHealth.

In many cases, experts believe, nothing illegal was done, although the Justice Department is examining more than 45 companies and the Securities and Exchange Commission is reviewing more than 100. Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. in San Jose have been charged with securities fraud.

No one at Broadcom, which makes communications chips designed into cellphones and digital entertainment systems, has been accused of wrongdoing, and the company said it was cooperating with an informal investigation by the SEC.

"Broadcom seems to be one of the more aggressive companies in advancing its internal investigation," said Michael D. Cohen, research director for Pacific American Securities in San Diego. "It's concerned about not wanting to be the poster child in the industrywide scandal."

Broadcom said its internal investigation, which uncovered $750 million in unreported compensation expenses two months ago, identified additional options linked to dates other than when they were actually awarded. So-called backdating involves timing options to dips in the stock, creating a greater likelihood of a lucrative upside.

As a result of the investigation, Broadcom is restating all of its financial reports back to its initial public offering in 1998. It said all changes involved alterations to bookkeeping accounts that did not affect the company's cash position or financial stability. The company has more than $2 billion in cash and short-term securities and has been profitable since 2004.

All together, Broadcom granted options for 238 million shares of common stock to employees over more than five years — with 95% going to employees other than executive officers. The company said no board member received options — including co-founders Henry T. Nicholas III and Henry Samueli, who became billionaires from their stakes in the company.

Spokesman William Blanning said Broadcom would not comment beyond a news release issued early Friday before financial markets opened. Broadcom shares fell 34 cents, or just over 1%, to $26.09 — about half their 52-week high of $50 and far from their split-adjusted all-time high of $182.41.

"This is almost old news," said Marc A. Siegel, research director at the Center for Financial Research and Analysis. "People investing today are looking forward."

It was Siegel's report last spring that identified Broadcom and others as granting options with questionable timing.

"These kind of things in and of themselves do not affect cash. There's no economic damage," said analyst David Wu at Global Crown Capital in San Francisco. "But it does show how fast and loose they were playing, giving out options on a very liberal basis."

Broadcom was a typical young high-tech company caught up in the exuberance of the 1990s. Founded in 1991, it used stock options to attract engineering talent and supplement the relatively low salaries common at emerging companies.

When tech was the darling of Wall Street, Broadcom was one of the stellar stocks. During those giddy days when investors chased anything that ended in .com, Broadcom had something unusual: real products and a solid business plan selling chips that ran TV set-top boxes and wireless devices.

And it had Nicholas.

Brash, bright and seemingly always awake, Nicholas pushed the company into a range of new niches, negotiating late-night deals and using the company's high-priced stock to buy 18 companies in two years.

By 2000, Nicholas and Samueli, the chairman, had amassed a net worth that Forbes magazine estimated at $10 billion each, most of it in Broadcom stock. But the next year, as the tech economy burst, Broadcom shares plummeted 92%, taking most of the co-founders' assets with it. Their net worth in 2001 was pegged at $2 billion each.

By 2003, Nicholas, known for extravagant parties at his sprawling Laguna Hills mansion, found himself nearly burned out and almost divorced. He quit the company to reconcile with his wife.

Samueli, who remains chairman, has donated more than $160 million, mostly to educational and healthcare institutions. Two engineering schools are named after him, one at UCLA and one at UC Irvine, and a center for alternative medicine at UC Irvine is named for his wife, Susan.

Broadcom plugged away, hiring Scott A. McGregor as chief executive from Royal Philips Electronics in 2004. McGregor shed stagnant businesses and pushed into more promising markets. Today, Broadcom's chips are found not only in cable TV set-top boxes and cellphones but a host of mobile and broadband products.

"The promise of Broadcom in the late 1990s is still there today," said Cohen, who has followed the company since its early days.

He noted, though, that the corporate culture had changed since the aggressively competitive Nicholas quit as chief executive.

DOJ_NMG_0061292

"It's still highly competitive," Cohen said. "But the nature of those go-go years and the high-flying stock affected things differently. You had to be the first charger into the market then. Now it's a little more business-as-usual atmosphere."

*

james.granelli@latimes.com

Broadcom's Backdating Charge Doubles To $1.5 Billion (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Rebecca Barr

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a maker of computer chips for consumer devices, said it discovered more instances of stock-option backdating that will require the company to at least double its charge for the practice to $1.5 billion.

The company's 1998 and 1999 earnings must be restated, Broadcom said today in a statement. Most of the non-cash charge will be expensed in the periods through the end of 2003.

The restatement is the biggest yet among at least 120 companies facing federal probes or conducting internal reviews into whether they manipulated dates to inflate the value of options. In July, Broadcom said it would take a $750 million charge after an audit committee found options backdating from 2000 to 2002. That review continues.

``More serious than effect on share price is what it says for the culture of the company," said Michael Cohen, an analyst for San Diego-based Pacific American Securities. ``In addition to straightening out the accounting, these companies should find the wrongdoers and get some recovery for shareholders."

Shares of Irvine, California-based Broadcom slipped 76 cents, or 2.9 percent, to $25.67 at 10:45 a.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Before today, they had fallen 46 percent from this year's March 2 peak.

Broadcom, which is also under an informal probe by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, said the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Central District of California asked for some documents already requested by the SEC.

Profit, Loss

The $1.5 billion would be more than twice as much as the $727.5 million in total net income Broadcom reported for its four profitable years since going public in 1998, according to data compiled by Bloomberg. The company had $6.63 billion in net losses for the other four years.

``Stockholders are hit twice," said Cohen who rates Broadcom's stock ``buy" and said he doesn't own it. ``First you're stolen from, then the stock goes down when the theft is uncovered."

The company said it has found no instances of option backdating after May 2003 and neither founders Henry Samueli and Henry Nicholas nor any board members board past or present have profited from the disputed options.

``I suspect investors will now look at what they expect from Broadcom management in the future, and with the current management team in place," said Marc Siegel, director of research at the Center for Financial Research & Analysis in Rockville, Maryland.

Restatements

More than 40 companies have said they will restate earnings or might have to do so when internal probes are completed. The restatements total at least $2.27 billion so far, according to Bloomberg data. Broadcom's is the biggest announced to date.

Federal investigators are scrutinizing stock-option grants that may have been backdated or carefully timed to coincide with days when the stock price was low to enrich the recipients. Such grants can hide costs, distort taxes, and obscure a company's true financial condition, and could be criminal acts if not properly disclosed.

Stock options allow recipients to buy shares at a future date, usually at the price on the day they were granted. They are given to managers as an incentive to find ways to boost the stock price. Broadcom in July said as much as 95 percent of its options are awarded to employees below executive officer level.

Subverts Purpose

Prosecutors and members of Congress have said backdating grants, or awarding them shortly before good news is announced, subverts their purpose and could involve criminal fraud.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox told Congress this week that more than 100 companies are being investigated. Executives at Comverse Technology Inc. and Brocade Communications Systems Inc. face criminal charges, and Cox said more enforcement actions will follow.

Broadcom's extra charges announced today concern options awarded between June 1998 and May 2003, a period that hadn't been assessed by the audit committee when the preliminary expense was announced in July.

Linear Technology Corp. today said the U.S. Internal Revenue Service requested information about its options-granting practices. The company, which makes computer chips for cell phones and satellite systems, already had disclosed that the SEC and the Justice Department are conducting informal inquiries into the options.

DOJ_NMG_0061293

To contact the reporter on this story: Rebecca Barr in New York at rbarr1@bloomberg.net .

Ebbers Ordered To Report To Prison Sept. 26 In WorldCom Fraud (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers was ordered to report to prison Sept. 26 to begin serving a 25-year sentence for an $11 billion (â,¬8.64 billion) accounting fraud.

U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones, in a ruling made public Thursday, ordered Ebbers to surrender to an institution designated by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons to begin serving a sentence that was delayed for the last year while an appeals court considered it.

Ebbers was sentenced in July of last year after he was convicted of fraud and conspiracy in the massive fraud that drove WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month upheld his conviction and sentence, finding he was motivated primarily by personal financial circumstances.

Ebbers once was known as one of America's most successful chief executive officers as his telecommunications company and its stock soared during the technology driven excesses of the late 1990s.

At trial, prosecutors successfully argued that Ebbers helped lead a plan to prop up the company's stock price by hiding its failing finances. The scheme was described as one of the largest accounting frauds in history.

WorldCom collapsed into bankruptcy in 2002, and investigators eventually uncovered $11 billion (â,¬8.64 billion) in fraud, much of it because accountants were classifying regular expenses as long-term capital expenditures. The company re-emerged under the name MCI. Verizon later bought MCI.

A lawyer for Ebbers, Reid Weingarten, did not immediately return a telephone call for comment Thursday.

Ebbers at sentencing could have faced as much as 85 years in prison on nine criminal counts including securities fraud, conspiracy and making false filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

He was convicted more than two years after an internal auditor began asking questions about curious accounting at WorldCom, touching off a scandal that eventually unearthed $11 billion (â,¬8.64 billion) in cooked books.

The company struck a $750 million (â,¬589 million) settlement with federal regulators to repay aggrieved investors, a small sum compared to the tens of billions of dollars of market capitalization that evaporated in the scandal.

Former Enron Executive David Delainey Asks Judge For Probation (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Former Enron Corp. executive David Delainey, who pleaded guilty to insider trading, asked a judge to sentence him to probation or house arrest because he cooperated with prosecutors in their investigation.

Delainey, a Canadian citizen and former head of Enron's energy trading and retail energy services divisions, said he deserves less than the 10-year term he agreed to serve, according to court papers filed Aug. 28. He asked to serve any sentence in Canada, near his job and family in Calgary.

``Mr. Delainey has provided the government with extraordinary insight and education, and has given powerful, credible testimony," John Dowd, his lawyer, wrote in court papers filed with U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt in Houston. ``His testimony at the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay was critical to achieving the convictions."

Skilling, 52, and Lay, who died in July at age 64, were convicted in May of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the world's largest energy trader. More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions vanished when Enron plunged into bankruptcy in December 2001.

Delainey, 40, pleaded guilty to selling more than $4.26 million in Enron stock between January 2000 and October 2001 based on non-public knowledge of numerous management schemes that were artificially boosting Enron's bottom line. These included realigning business units to hide losses and improperly using reserves to make up shortfalls in earnings expectations.

Forfeiture

As part of his plea agreement, Delainey also agreed to forfeit almost $8 million in illicit profits and cooperate with prosecutors when he pleaded guilty to a single count of insider trading in October 2003. In a Sept. 5 response to his sentencing request, prosecutors told Hoyt they will seek an unspecified reduction in Delainey's sentence.

Delainey's court filing described $7 million he forfeited to the Justice Department and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, as well as a $10,000 unsolicited donation he made in March 2002 to the Enron Ex-Employee Relief Fund, which benefits laid-off Enron workers.

DOJ_NMG_0061294

Dowd told Hoyt that Delainey also deserves credit for waiving extradition and voluntarily coming to the U.S. to face charges. He said it might have been difficult to extradite the Enron executive because Canada doesn't consider insider trading a crime.

``Although Mr. Delainey could easily have sought to hide behind the extradition treaty and embroil the government in long and costly extradition proceedings, he decided instead to take responsibility for his actions and help clean up this mess," Dowd wrote.

Jaclyn Lesch, spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, didn't return a call seeking comment.

The case is U.S. v. Delainey, H-03-420, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

To contact the reporter on this story: Laurel Brubaker Calkins in Houston at laurel@calkins.us.com .

HP Chairwoman Tries To Diffuse Uproar (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

Embattled HP Chairwoman Battles to Save Her Job Amid Furor Over Spy Tactics

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Battling to keep her job, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn tried Friday to defuse the uproar over a company-ordered investigation that relied on a potentially illegal ruse to obtain the personal phone records of her fellow directors and at least nine reporters.

In an interview, Dunn described the tactics as "absolutely appalling" and "embarrassing" while defending the need to pursue the investigation to plug a leak on HP's board.

"I serve at the pleasure of the board," Dunn said. "I totally trust their judgment. If they think it would be better for me to step aside, I would do that. But a number of directors have urged me to hang in there." She declined to say how many of HP's other nine directors support her.

The board plans to hold an emergency meeting by phone during the weekend to discuss the concerns about the company's investigation as well as Dunn's job status.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer already has concluded the HP investigation broke state law by obtaining people's private phone records under false pretenses -- a charade known as "pretexting."

HP's investigators masqueraded as the directors and reporters targeted in the probe, using their Social Security numbers in some instances to dupe phone companies into turning over lists of personal phone calls.

Lockyer is still gathering evidence to determine the breadth of the violations and the culprits behind them, a process that he hopes to wrap up soon, his spokesman, Tom Dresslar, said Friday.

In a letter sent late Friday, U.S. Senator Richard Durbin, D-Illinois, asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review whether HP's investigation broke any federal laws. "I am deeply troubled by these allegations," wrote Durbin, who wants to pass a federal law that would outlaw obtaining private phone records without an accountholder's consent.

The Federal Communications Commission also has taken the first step toward opening an investigation by sending a letter of inquiry to AT&T Inc., the source of the personal phone records obtained by HP.

The invasion of privacy so infuriated one HP director, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, that he resigned from the board in May and triggered a chain of events that finally forced the company to publicly disclose its role in the pretexting.

Incensed by several media stories that quoted unnamed people about information shared during HP board meetings, Dunn authorized the investigation earlier this year to find out if any of the company's directors were talking out of turn.

The inquiry convinced HP that George Keyworth II had been providing reporters with confidential company information. The company is punishing him by preventing him from running for re-election to the board.

In Friday's interview, Dunn branded the leaks as an "egregious breach" of HP's standards and emphasized the investigation was conducted with the full backing of the board. "This was not my spy campaign on our board." She also said "all this nonsense" could have been avoided had Keyworth admitted he was leaking information before the investigation began.

Now Dunn, 52, is scrambling to hold on to her $300,000-per-year job at HP amid an intensifying backlash against one of Silicon Valley's oldest and proudest companies.

The pretexting imbroglio already is threatening to become a huge distraction for the Palo Alto-based HP as it tries to build on its recent momentum in the personal computer and other high-target markets.

Dunn will have to resign if HP hopes to minimize the damage that already has been caused to its reputation, said Gary Lutin, a New York investment banker who advises shareholders on corporate control issues.

DOJ_NMG_0061295

"Whether you consider the questions about (Dunn's) judgment to be resolved or unresolved, she is no longer in a position to be a viable chairman," Lutin said. "If the directors don't understand that, then they are not qualified to serve as fiduciaries for shareholders."

Dunn could still hold on to her job if she can convince other directors that she never authorized investigators to resort to pretexting, said Kirk Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics.

Even if that is true, Dunn still might have difficulty explaining why she didn't confront investigators about how they obtained the phone records once they turned over to her, Hanson said. "Once they had the telephone logs, you would think someone would raise the question, 'How did we get these?'"

Dunn said she had no clue investigators would resort to pretexting, saying she didn't even know what the word meant until June or July -- a few months after she authorized the investigation. She said she still doesn't know the identity of the firm behind the pretexting.

Viet Dinh, an attorney representing Perkins, said it's difficult to believe Dunn didn't know about pretexting before June. "To my knowledge, there are only two ways to get these kinds of records: with a government subpoena or with people's consent," Dinh said, asserting that HP's investigators didn't have that kind of privileged access.

So far, all but one of the nine reporters targeted in HP's pretexting have been identified by their news organizations. They are: Peter Burrows, Ben Elgin and Roger Crockett of Business Week; Pui-Wing Tam and George Anders of The Wall Street Journal; Dawn Kawamoto and Tom Krazit of CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com; and John Markoff of The New York Times.

The involvement of the reporters "takes the improprieties to a whole new level," said Dresslar, Lockyer's spokesman.

The pretexting backlash hasn't hurt HP's stock too badly yet. The company's shares rose 75 cents Friday to close at $36.17 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Unless drastic action is taken, it's only a matter before the brewing scandal begins to hurt HP, Lutin predicted.

"As long as this confusion and disorder continues, no self-respecting professional is going to want to work for Hewlett-Packard and the company will gradually be drained of talent," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Washington: Executive Is Sentenced In Bribery Case (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A federal judge in Alexandria, Va., sentenced Vernon L. Jackson, the chief executive of a Kentucky technology company, to 7 years 3 months in jail for paying more than $400,000 to Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana. In May, Mr. Jackson pleaded guilty to charges that he made the payments to a consulting firm run by Mr. Jefferson's wife in return for the congressman's help on business deals in Africa. Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged. Prosecutors said Mr. Jackson had been cooperating with a federal investigation of the congressman. They also told the judge, T.S. Ellis III of Federal District Court, that they would be likely to ask him to reduce the sentence if Mr. Jackson continued to help.

Businessman Gets 7 Years For Bribing Legislator (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Louisville businessman Vernon L. Jackson was sentenced yesterday to seven years and three months in federal prison for bribing Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) with more than $400,000 and company stock to promote his Kentucky firm's high-tech business ventures.

During sentencing, U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria told Jackson, 54, owner of iGate Inc., that he made a "very bad decision" that corrupted the political process.

Jackson said nothing during the proceeding. His attorney, Michael S. Nachmanoff, said he was pleased the judge gave a sentence that was at the low end of the federal guideline.

Jackson is the second person to be sentenced in the 18-month public corruption probe that has targeted Jefferson and cast a dark cloud over the eight-term congressman's political future. Jefferson, 59, has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing, but sources have said an indictment appears assured.

Jackson pleaded guilty in May to bribing Jefferson to promote iGate's broadband technology for Internet and cable television in Nigeria, Ghana and Cameroon. In January, Brett M. Pfeffer, a former Jefferson aide, pleaded guilty to bribing the congressman and was sentenced to eight years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0061296

Both men, under their plea agreements, could get their sentences reduced for their cooperation with the FBI.

Jefferson attorney Robert Trout, who attended yesterday's sentencing, issued a statement afterward saying: "Congressman Jefferson knows well the pressure that the Department of Justice can apply once it targets someone for criminal prosecution. As Jackson's plea bargain makes clear, the government has offered powerful inducements to cause Jackson to plead guilty."

Jefferson, the statement added, has repeatedly said he never took payment in any form to perform "any act or duty."

Jefferson is running for reelection in his Hurricane Katrina-damaged district against 12 opponents.

The corruption probe has been slowed by the political uproar and legal battle over the FBI's raid in May on Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. Jefferson has argued that the raid violated the Constitution, and investigators have been prevented from looking at the seized materials while the matter works its way through court.

Exec. Gets 7 Years For Congressman Bribe (AP-Y)

By Matthew Barakat

AP, September 9, 2006

A Kentucky businessman who admitted paying more than $400,000 in bribes to a Louisiana congressman was sentenced Friday to more than seven years in prison.

Vernon Jackson, 54, of Louisville, is a key figure in the federal investigation of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La. The chief executive of the telecommunications firm iGate Inc. said he paid the bribes to gain the congressman's help in obtaining business deals in Africa.

The bribes paid by Jackson, including stocks and cash paid to a company controlled by Jefferson's family, had a value of $400,000 to $1 million, according to court records.

The congressman has not been charged but court records allege the FBI caught Jefferson on videotape taking a $100,000 cash bribe from an FBI informant who agreed to have her conversations with the congressman taped. Most of that money later turned up in a freezer in Jefferson's home.

The bribes paid by Jackson are separate from the $100,000 found in the freezer.

Jackson did not speak during the hearing and declined to comment afterward. He has previously expressed remorse for his conduct.

The seven-year, three-month sentence imposed by U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III was at the low end of federal sentencing guidelines. Prosecutor Mark Lytle said Jackson was continuing to cooperate in the investigation, and his sentence could later be reduced. He will not begin serving his sentence until January.

Jefferson was never mentioned by name in Friday's hearing, but prosecutors have made it clear in court papers that he is the congressman to whom Jackson paid bribes.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing. His lawyer, Robert Trout, suggested Jackson is lying to garner leniency from prosecutors.

"Congressman Jefferson knows well the pressure that the Department of Justice can apply once it targets someone for criminal prosecution. As Jackson's plea bargain makes clear, the government has offered powerful inducements to cause Jackson to plead guilty. He has every reason to expect that his sentence will be substantially reduced depending on his testimony against the congressman," Trout said.

The government's investigation of Jefferson has been delayed by the furor that resulted from the Justice Department's decision to raid Jefferson's congressional office earlier this year.

Jefferson claims that his status as a congressman grants him immunity from executive branch search warrants. The Justice Department has not yet reviewed the documents it seized from the office while the issue is being litigated.

A former congressional aide of Jefferson was sentenced to eight years in prison after admitting that he helped broker some of the bribes paid to Jefferson.

IGate's Jackson Gets 87 Months (LEXHL)

By John Cheves, HERALD-LEADER STAFF WRITER

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), September 9, 2006

BUSINESSMAN PLEADED GUILTY TO BRIBING CONGRESSMAN TO PROMOTE TECH COMPANY

WASHINGTON - A Louisville businessman who says he bribed a congressman to promote his small technology company was sentenced yesterday to more than seven years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0061297

Federal prosecutors said Vernon Jackson, 54, founder of iGate, deserved credit for pleading guilty in May to two bribery counts, and they said he is cooperating with the Justice Department in its political corruption investigation. Jackson could have received up to nine years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

Although Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., has not been charged with a crime, he is the friend and partner of Jackson who promoted iGate in the United States and overseas. FBI agents have searched Jefferson's homes and offices in Washington and New Orleans, finding $90,000 in alleged bribe money stashed in his freezer.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria, Va., noted that Jackson is a self-made entrepreneur with strong ties to his community and church. But Ellis said the punishment must reflect the damage that bribery inflicts on the credibility of government.

"The rule of law ... only makes sense if our public officials are not corrupt," Ellis said, ordering Jackson to serve 87 months in prison. Jackson, a tall, stocky man with a shaved head and a trim mustache, stood without reaction. "Public corruption is the worst kind of a virulent and malignant cancer," the judge said.

Ellis ruled that Jackson won't have to report to prison until at least January, as prosecutors said they want to continue to consult him in their investigation.

According to court records, Jefferson took more than $400,000 in bribes from Jackson -- and slowly tried to seize control of his company -- in exchange for helping iGate win U.S. and foreign government contracts, using his position in Congress. Founded in 1998, iGate sells what it calls innovative technology for broadband Internet access.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Lytle said after the sentencing that he could not discuss the status of the Justice Department's investigation.

A spokeswoman for Jefferson later declined to comment. First elected to Congress in 1991, Jefferson faces a crowd of re-election challengers this fall in Louisiana's Democratic primary.

Yesterday, Jackson -- an engineer who moved to Louisville nearly 20 years ago -- declined to comment outside the courtroom or address the judge. His public defender said Jackson is ashamed and remorseful for what he did.

"Mr. Jackson is a good man who has risen from modest beginnings," said his lawyer, Michael Nachmanoff. "His desire to see his business succeed is what led him to where he is today. ... If he could go back in time, he would. But he cannot."

IGate's future is uncertain. Jackson has drawn no salary from his small company for more than a year and has accumulated considerable personal debt, Nachmanoff said.

However, David Harper, a Louisville lawyer for iGate, said it can continue without its founder and chairman, who previously had been expected to leave for the ministry in the near future.

"The company's fine," said Harper, who declined to offer details such as how many employees remain. "There are several projects in the pipeline right now that I'm not at liberty to discuss. But we're going to continue, just as Mr. Jackson wants us to."

Roller-coaster Career Ends In Prison (NOTP)

By Bill Walsh, And Bruce Alpert%%par%%washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 9, 2006

Telecom exec linked to Jefferson gets 7 years

WASHINGTON -- Kentucky businessman Vernon Jackson, the son of a school custodian who had built himself into a high-tech multimillionaire only to lose it all, was trying to claw his way back into the game six years ago when he met Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

Jackson, whose fortune was once estimated at $32 million, saw the congressman as his ticket back to financial success and respectability. Jefferson's connections in Washington and West Africa held the promise of finally finding a market for Jackson's patented telecommunications invention that could make both of them rich.

Instead, according to FBI wiretap transcripts and court pleadings, Jefferson hit up Jackson for nearly $400,000 in bribes and eventually sought to seize control of his fledgling telecommunications company, iGate Inc.

Jefferson has not been charged and has maintained his innocence.

Jackson pleaded guilty in May to bribery of a public official and conspiracy to commit bribery. He was sentenced Friday to seven years and three months in prison. Jackson has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors in the case the federal Justice Department has been building against Jefferson for a year and a half. He is scheduled to begin serving his sentence in January.

At first glance, the two men would seem an odd pairing. Jefferson, who received a law degree from Harvard University, is wry and urbane, a slim stick of a figure who speaks in low, clipped cadences. Jackson is a bear of a man who talks with a booming voice and attended technical school on his way to starting his career toiling in the telecom labs at AT&T.

DOJ_NMG_0061298

But they also are remarkably similar in ways that would draw them together in an audacious business venture that has turned into a nightmare.

Jefferson, 59, and Jackson, 54, are African-American sons of the segregated South who were born into large families with little money but an abiding devotion to religion. Each was one of nine children, Jefferson growing up in rural north Louisiana and Jackson in Charlotte, N.C. They also shared an unflagging personal energy and a burning ambition to rise above their humble origins.

By the mid-1990s, both had made it. Jefferson parlayed his Harvard law degree and a canny political instinct into a successful career as the first African-American congressman from Louisiana since Reconstruction.

Jackson, a technology whiz kid, was recruited out of high school by AT&T, where he spent the next two decades. Deciding to strike out on his own, he formed his own firm in 1990 on the strength of a patent he received for what he believed to be breakthrough technology. The invention would allow voice, data and video images to be transmitted across existing copper lines without the need to install expensive fiber optics. He eventually packaged the invention as a service that would allow workers to conduct video conferences from their desktop computers.

It "was literally a product which could save the U.S. military and the U.S. government hundreds of millions, if not billions," of dollars, said William Warner, who marketed the technology for Jackson.

With his brother, Richard, Jackson launched VideoLan Technologies Inc. in 1994, and a year later took the company public. Almost overnight, VideoLan's stock soared from $4 a share to nearly $50.

Suddenly rich beyond his wildest dreams, Jackson bought his wife, Sandra, a Mercedes-Benz, and the couple plunked down $1.5 million to build a mansion alongside a golf course designed by Arnold Palmer in one of the toniest neighborhoods of Louisville, Ky.

But VideoLan struggled. Friends said telecom giants in the industry smothered Jackson's plans after he rebuffed their buyout offers. Within three years, Jackson had been ousted from VideoLan, which was headed for bankruptcy. His $250,000 annual salary was shut off, and his stock holdings plummeted in value.

By 1997, unable to make payments to the builder, his dream home became an abandoned wooden shell of two-by-fours that neighbors complained was an eyesore.

"He always had two problems," said Kiran Chudgar, a Louisville businessman who helped develop prototypes for Jackson's technology. "One was that he had a lot of big corporations who weren't anxious for his technology to succeed for competitive reasons. The other was that he never seemed to have enough funding to make his ideas happen."

Jackson may have lacked business acumen, but he believed in his product and he had ambition to spare. He successfully sued his old company to get the patent rights and started over with a new firm he called iGate Inc.

Jackson's attorney said his client wasn't motivated by money alone. Michael Nachmanoff said Jackson also wanted to use his invention to bridge the "digital divide" in telecommunications between the haves and the have-nots. Jackson believed his technology could bring broadband communications to people and places that otherwise couldn't afford it.

"It was in this context that he met and developed a relationship with" Jefferson, Nachmanoff wrote in court filings.

By the time they met in 2000, Jefferson had carved out an influential niche for himself in Congress as a brainy, business-friendly Democrat with a keen interest in West Africa. Jefferson saw promise in Jackson's technology and, according to court documents, got busy making it happen.

To verify the effectiveness of Jackson's creation, Jefferson got it tested by the Army's Technology Integration Center, which gave it the thumbs up. Jefferson then helped get iGate's product listed on a prominent federal government contractor database. It was scooped up by Fort Sam Houston in Texas and Fort Stewart in Georgia. But few other contracts followed.

Nonetheless, things seemed promising to Jackson, who told those in his inner circle that he had a "friend in Washington" who was going to put him back on top. Jackson called the congressman "Jeff," and their families grew close. Jackson recommended Jefferson's daughter Jamila for a seat on the board of a Texas telecom firm, Gridline. According to a story in the Lexington (Ky.) Herald-Leader, Jackson and his wife accompanied Jefferson and his wife, Andrea, to New York for a weekend getaway in September 2004 that included seats at the U.S. Open tennis tournament, tickets to "The Lion King" on Broadway and some shopping.

The friendliness, however, masked a secret pact the two men had forged, according to the FBI. In 2001, court records say, Jefferson demanded that Jackson give him a cut of the business. He urged him to sign a professional services agreement with the ANJ Group, a company led by Andrea Jefferson. The deal called for 1 million shares of iGate stock, $7,500 per month and a 5 percent share of the company. Eventually, the FBI says, Jefferson demanded 35 percent.

The FBI says that over five years, Jackson paid the ANJ Group $367,500 disguised as consulting fees and paid for travel costing nearly $88,000.

DOJ_NMG_0061299

IGate was hoping to find a lucrative market in Nigeria, a poor country whose telecommunications system is antiquated. Largely through Jefferson's influence, the FBI says, the Nigerian firm NetLink agreed to put $45 million into the deal and fronted $6.5 million to iGate.

NetLink eventually backed out, and Jefferson lined up a new investor, Lori Mody, a Northern Virginia millionaire. In conversations taped by the FBI, Jefferson can be heard telling Mody that he planned to move Jackson aside and take over the company himself.

Things began to unravel when Mody suspected she was being stiffed. She had paid $3.5 million for the rights to iGate's technology, but Jackson refused to sign them over. She went to the FBI to complain about fraud, a tip that hatched a bribery probe targeting Jackson and Jefferson.

Writing to U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III, Jackson's wife acknowledged Jackson's complicity in the bribery scheme. But she also said her husband was taken advantage of.

"I feel that he had to be blindsided by individuals who have no regard for people," Sandra Jackson said.

Jackson's dream of a quick trip back to the good life has taken a detour through a federal penitentiary. When Jackson pleaded guilty, he asked for a court-appointed attorney, saying that he was destitute. His financial forms listed debts totaling more than $360,000, almost as much as the FBI says he paid in bribes to Jefferson.

. . . . . .

Bill Walsh can be reached at bill.walsh@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7817.

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

More Firms Linked To Probe (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 9, 2006

Investigators seeking records from Nigeria

WASHINGTON -- Documents released this week by Nigerian investigators indicate that the ongoing U.S. probe of Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, includes an examination of his links to some previously unreported companies.

Nigeria's Economic and Financial Crimes Commission said it had been asked by the U.S. Justice Department to examine the congressman's role not only in promoting a Nigerian project proposed by the Kentucky firm iGate Inc., but also his links to:

-- Life Technology Holdings, now known as Global Environmental Energy Corp., which at one time had offices in New Orleans and filed for bankruptcy protection after its efforts to build garbage incinerators failed to catch on. Along with iGate, it helped finance Jefferson's trip to Western Africa, including Nigeria, in 2004.

-- TDC Overseas of Baton Rouge, which was looking to build a sugar refinery in Nigeria. George Knost, the company's chief executive officer, said TDC is "cooperating fully" with the Justice Department probe of Jefferson. The company has "had no improper dealings with Jefferson or anyone else," Knost said.

-- Jefferson Interest Inc., which matches the name of a company registered with the Louisiana secretary of state's office in 1983 that lists Jefferson as president and his brothers Bennie and Mose as vice president and secretary-treasurer, respectively.

The Justice Department probe of Jefferson centers on allegations that Vernon Jackson, chief executive officer of iGate Inc., funneled more than $360,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help in getting contracts in Nigeria and Ghana for iGate's copper wire broadband technology. Jackson has pleaded guilty and was sentenced Friday to seven years and three months in jail.

Jefferson has not been charged and has said he did nothing wrong. He declined to comment Friday through a spokesman for the Washington, D.C., communications firm he hired to deal with the questions about the investigation.

"Due to the pending investigation by the Department of Justice, we are unable to comment at this time," said Christopher Garrett of Impact Strategies. "We look forward to a more appropriate time, when all of the facts surrounding this matter can be disclosed."

The commission's report said the Justice Department also asked for bank records held by Atonte Diete-Spiff, a former Jefferson congressional staffer, and a company by the name of Providence International. It also asks for records of calls made from a phone number registered to Diete-Spiff.

Diete-Spiff, who traveled twice to Nigeria in 2000 as a representative of Jefferson, couldn't be reached for comment Friday. The Louisiana secretary of state lists a Providence International Construction Co. in New Orleans, formed in 2002, and managed by a Jefferson congressional staffer, Stephanie Butler.

The Economic and Financial Crimes Commission also said the Justice Department wanted help with information about not only Jefferson's activities in Nigeria, but also those of his wife, Andrea; the couple's five daughters, Jamila, Jalilah, Nailah, Jelani and Akilah; Jefferson's son-in-laws Tony Bullock and Philip Jones; and Jefferson's brothers, Mose, Bennie and Archie Jefferson.

Officials with Global Environmental Energy, previously known as Life Technology Holdings, or LETH Energy, could not be reached for comment. But in an interview last year, Noreen Wilson, then listed as president of Global Environmental Energy, said Jefferson "has always been willing" to help U.S. firms establish contacts with African leaders. She said Jefferson had never asked for anything in return.

A Global news release in 2004 pointed to deals to build 500 energy plants worldwide, but it appears that few were actually built. Two unbuilt incinerators were proposed for the New Orleans area -- one in Slidell and another in New Orleans, which had won approval from the Port of New Orleans.

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

Obvious Question In Plame Case Had Early Answer (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Richard T. Cooper

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Almost three years ago, as Patrick J. Fitzgerald settled in as the newly appointed special counsel in charge of the Valerie Plame leak investigation, he learned a startling secret.

Washington was ablaze with speculation about who had revealed Plame's identity as a covert CIA officer to syndicated columnist Robert Novak; senior White House officials were considered the likely culprits. But Fitzgerald, reading FBI reports just after taking charge, learned that federal investigators already knew Novak's primary source — a gossipy State Department official who seemed to have strained relations with the White House.

So if the mystery was already solved, why did Fitzgerald's investigation continue for almost 36 more months? Why does I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, still face criminal charges in connection with the Plame leak? And why were other senior officials left twisting in the wind, facing possible indictment?

Did the special counsel, operating behind the veil of secrecy of all such inquiries, abuse his authority in a witch hunt?

Such questions are at the heart of a furor that erupted late last month after the revelation that several months after Novak's column naming Plame appeared in July 2003, Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage had informed his superiors — and then the Justice Department, which was investigating the leak — that he had been Novak's primary source. Armitage's reasons for talking to Novak remain unclear. He was known for his skepticism on some aspects of President Bush's Iraq war strategy, but also for his penchant to gossip.

This week, breaking a silence he said Fitzgerald imposed, Armitage told "CBS Evening News," "I feel terrible, every day. I think I let down the president, I let down the secretary of State, I let down my department, my family, and I also let down Mr. and Mrs. Wilson."

The discovery of Armitage's role — and the fact that it had been known to investigators so early — is stirring administration defenders to fury.

After all, they say, the inquiry left the White House under a cloud of suspicion for months and created a costly distraction for senior officials, including political strategist Karl Rove and even Cheney.

"It's as if a giant hoax were perpetrated on the country — by the media, by partisan opponents of the Bush administration, even by several Bush subordinates who betrayed the president and their White House colleagues," conservative commentator Fred Barnes wrote this week in a Weekly Standard Magazine column that listed Fitzgerald, the news media and others as the culprits.

Is such criticism of Fitzgerald's inquiry appropriate?

The special counsel declined to comment. And the argument has become intensely partisan.

Yet the information on Armitage — first revealed in a new book — along with court filings and interviews with former White House staffers and others familiar with the inquiry, suggest Fitzgerald pressed ahead because he learned quickly that Armitage was not alone in discussing Plame with reporters. Top White House officials had talked about her as well.

Fitzgerald, who had been the U.S. attorney in Chicago, was appointed special counsel Dec. 30, 2003, taking over a probe initiated by the Justice Department three months earlier at the request of the CIA.

According to the book "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal and the Selling of the Iraq War," by Michael Isikoff and David Corn, Fitzgerald had barely arrived in Washington when he received a thick binder filled with FBI reports. They summarized interviews that agents had conducted with Armitage, Rove, Libby and others.

And the reports made clear that senior White House officials had been discussing Plame's status not just with Novak but with other Washington journalists — including Judith Miller of the New York Times and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine.

Early on, the prosecutor learned that Rove may have been a corroborating source for the information Armitage provided to Novak. That fact alone would have compelled the special counsel to push on with the investigation, in the view of some experts.

"We now know that almost from the beginning of the case the prosecutor was confronted with two different investigative tracks," said Dan French, who served as a U.S. attorney during the Clinton administration. One track was Armitage, the other Rove and his top-level colleagues at the White House, he said.

"Objectively, this represents two separate lines of inquiry and a prosecutor in this situation would feel compelled to pursue both," said French, who represented a witness in the case.

Former White House staffers have told The Times that in 2003, Rove and Libby seemed intent on undermining the credibility of Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had been assigned by the CIA to look into reports that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein tried to buy enriched uranium from the African nation Niger.

Bush cited the claim — attributed to British intelligence — in his 2003 State of the Union address as evidence that Hussein was seeking nuclear weapons, even though Wilson's earlier report to the CIA indicated he had found little evidence to support the likelihood that any sale to Iraq had occurred.

Wilson, who became an advisor to Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), later accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

In leaking the role of Wilson's wife at the CIA, administration officials suggested to journalists that she had promoted his mission as a boondoggle — not a serious inquiry.

As Fitzgerald examined the evidence, he seems to have concluded that some White House officials might not have been forthcoming to investigators about their conversations with reporters. That raised the possibility of a cover-up.

Intentionally leaking classified information or the name of an undercover intelligence agent is a federal crime, though the legal definition of "intent" remains murky. Making false or misleading statements to FBI or other federal investigators, or to a grand jury, can also be a crime.

In early February 2004, barely a month into his tenure, Fitzgerald sought and received a letter from his Justice Department boss stating that — in addition to probing the leaks — he was authorized to pursue possible obstruction of justice and related crimes.

Still, an impression remained in the public's mind that the key question was who provided information on Plame to Novak, the first journalist to write about her. While the public focused on Novak, investigators were asking about Matt Cooper's sources for a story he and others at Time had published on Time's website soon after Novak's column.

Cooper has since acknowledged that his primary source was Rove, with Libby also talking to him. Libby, the only person charged in the case, has pleaded not guilty to perjury and obstruction of justice.

According to Cooper, neither Rove nor Libby mentioned Plame by name. Nor did they mention her covert status, though Rove indicated she worked on WMD at "the Agency" and was responsible for her husband's trip. Spokesmen for both Libby and Rove pointed out that neither official initiated the conversations with Cooper.

Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, said his client did not initiate conversations with reporters about Plame, was unaware of her covert status, and did not encourage reporters to write about her.

Nonetheless, with the evidence he had, and with indications that these officials might have been less than candid with investigators, Fitzgerald decided to press on with his investigation even though he knew the answer to what the public considered the main question — who leaked to Bob Novak?

Armitage Leak Poses More Questions (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, September 9, 2006

For three years, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald knew the answer to one of the biggest questions in Washington: Who leaked the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame?

Now that former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage acknowledged this week that he was the leaker, the new question is what Fitzgerald has been looking for during a quest that rattled the White House and sent a reporter to jail.

"What was the rationale for seeking an answer to a question he already knew the answer to?" asked Wayne Berman, a former assistant secretary of commerce and a supporter of the only person indicted in the leak case, former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Fitzgerald's office had no response to that question Friday.

Armitage said he inadvertently revealed Plame's job to syndicated columnist Robert Novak in July 2003. That revelation came as Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Novak's column touched off claims that the White House was behind a smear campaign, which led to a federal investigation into the leak and whether it was part of a partisan effort to undermine Wilson's credibility.

DOJ_NMG_0061302

Early in the inquiry, Armitage told authorities he was Novak's source. Armitage said Fitzgerald asked him to not to say that publicly. Fitzgerald then pressed on with the investigation, questioning White House aides. Among them was top Bush adviser Karl Rove, who appeared five times before a grand jury before being cleared of wrongdoing this summer.

When Libby was indicted in October 2005 on charges of obstruction of justice, perjury and lying to investigators, Fitzgerald said Libby was the first official to discuss Plame in a conversation with New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

That's where this week's admission by Armitage muddles the case.

After Fitzgerald's comment about Libby at a news conference, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward reminded Armitage that he had made a passing comment to him days before Libby's conversation with Miller. That meant that Armitage, not Libby, had been the first to mention it to a reporter, and he quickly informed the prosecutor of that recollection.

Former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson, who has criticized Libby's prosecution, said Fitzgerald had a duty to set the record straight yet continued to urge Armitage's silence. Thompson said the case shows the worst side effects of appointing a special prosecutor.

"The whole world was watching Mr. Fitzgerald," Thompson said. "He had an extremely narrow focus and a lot of pressure to come up with something or somebody. He came up with a pea and tried to hold a press conference and hold it up as an elephant."

Armitage wasn't the only one asserting that his memory had failed. Both Libby and Rove have said they forgot details about their conversations with reporters. At least one of Rove's trips to the grand jury was so he could freshen his testimony with something he said he had forgotten in an earlier appearance.

Although Libby was the only one indicted, two reporters were threatened with jail for not disclosing sources. One of them — Miller — served 85 days.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said Friday she believes Fitzgerald knew that no crime had been committed with the leak of Plame's identity, yet he forced reporters to disclose their confidential sources and even sent Miller to jail.

"After a while, he didn't care who the source was," Dalglish said. "They just wanted to get somebody on obstruction."

Attorney Melanie Sloan, who represents the Wilsons in a civil lawsuit claiming Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney and others conspired to leak Plame's identity, said the investigation was necessary.

Fitzgerald knew Armitage's leak started the scandal, Sloan said, but he didn't know who else leaked information to the media. That's what the three-year investigation has been about, she said.

Berman, the Libby supporter, sees things differently. He said Armitage's admission contradicts the conspiracy theory and raises questions about why Libby was ever charged.

"Scooter was singled out, for whatever reason, by a prosecutor who appears to have made different decisions about people who had similar circumstances," Berman said.

Feds Interview Harris' Ex-campaign Manager (SPT)

By Anita Kumar, Times Staff Writer

St. Petersburg Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Federal investigators interviewed U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' former campaign manager as part of an ongoing federal inquiry into her relationship with a convicted defense contractor.

Jim Dornan, who left Harris' Senate campaign in November, spoke to investigators from the FBI and the Defense Department in Washington for about 90 minutes Thursday.

The Justice and Defense departments are examining Harris' dealings with Mitchell Wade, who made illegal campaign contributions to Harris and later asked her to help secure $10-million in federal money for a company project.

They have subpoenaed records from Harris' campaign office and have interviewed at least three former staffers: senior campaign consultant Ed Rollins, congressional chief of staff Fred Asbell and Mona Tate Yost, a congressional aide who later went to work for Wade.

A fourth employee, Kara Borie, Harris' former congressional spokeswoman, was contacted by investigators last month but it is unclear whether she was interviewed.

Dornan declined to comment. The Justice Department has refused to acknowledge an investigation.

Harris maintains she is not a target of the investigation.

Wade, who pleaded guilty to bribing another member of Congress, and Harris shared at least two dinners - each costing about $3,000 - at a tony Georgetown restaurant.

Dornan was not working for Harris when she received the donations or requested the money for the project.

DOJ_NMG_0061303

Harris of Longboat Key defeated three political newcomers Tuesday to cinch the Republican nomination for the Senate. She faces Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson in November.

Harris' campaign has faced a host of problems in recent months including enormous staff turnover.

Anita Kumar can be reached at 202 463-0576 or akumar@sptimes.com. [Last modified September 9, 2006, 01:20:33]

Pressure Mounts On Internet Gaming (AP-YBIZ)

By Jeff Douglas, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

Latest Arrest Turns Up Heat on Internet Gambling Operations

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- Gambling industry experts agree: If you operate an offshore gaming Web site, stay out of the U.S.

Moments after setting foot in the U.S. Thursday, Sportingbet PLC chairman Peter Dicks became the second U.K. offshore sports betting executive arrested in recent months for running an online gambling operation. Former BetOnSports PLC chief executive David Carruthers was arrested on federal charges in July.

It's still unclear if the arrest is a coincidence or part of a government crackdown, but some experts suspect the latter.

And as millions of dollars in bets for the NFL's opening weekend roll into thousands of Web sites, the pressure on the Internet gaming industry has intensified.

"You don't need legal expertise to know if you are running an offshore gambling site, don't come to America right now. You stand a good chance of being arrested," Internet gambling expert and lawyer Nelson Rose said.

Dicks, 64, was arrested at Kennedy International Airport in New York after flying from London, where his Web sites operate legally and are traded on the London Stock Exchange. More than $1.5 billion shares in the company were suspended by the LSE at Sportingbet's request Thursday.

Dicks was detained on a Louisiana state warrant from May for gambling by computer, a felony punishable by up to five years year in prison and a $25,000 fine. Similar warrants have been issued for other Sportingbet associates, but authorities would not release information on who or how many of them are wanted.

Seven states have laws prohibiting Internet gambling. The arrest of Dicks marked the first time one of those states has taken action against one of thousands of big-time online gambling operations. Million of American players bet an estimated $6 billion per year online, according to industry figures.

While the Justice Department has said it is being more vigilant in prosecuting illegal offshore betting, the department said Thursday's arrest was not a coordinated effort with state authorities.

The warrant was issued in May and Dicks' name was flagged during a routine customs check at JFK airport.

Sportingbet Web sites continued to operate Friday and company officials said they expected to continue unless told otherwise by authorities.

BetOnSports closed its U.S. Web sites on a judge's order and fired Carruthers, who remains under house arrest on $1 million bond in the St. Louis area, awaiting trial. He faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges.

Lawmakers on both sides of the issue are pushing for change, including a proposed law to prohibit U.S. bank and credit transactions with online gambling operations.

Death Penalty Sought For Killing At Wheeler (HONADV)

By Curtis Lum, Advertiser Staff Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, September 9, 2006

The U.S. attorney's office in Hawai'i will seek the death penalty in the case of a Schofield Barracks soldier accused of beating to death his 5-year-old daughter last year.

It is only the second time the U.S. Justice Department has approved capital punishment in a Hawai'i case since the federal death penalty law was enacted in 1994.

Army Spc. Naeem Williams was indicted by a federal grand jury in February 2006 on one count of first-degree murder. He is accused of the beating death of his daughter, Talia Williams, at the Williams' Wheeler Army Airfield apartment on July 16, 2005.

Last night, Tarshia Williams, Talia's mother, said from her South Carolina home that it was a "blessing" that the death penalty was approved for her former husband. Naeem Williams was granted custody of Talia in December 2004.

"I just wanted justice for my daughter. I've been praying for this for a year," Williams said. "I just want him to be punished for everything he did to my child. I feel like justice is about to be served."

Tarshia Williams said it's been a difficult year for her and she recently marked the anniversary of her child's death by releasing balloons at her grave.

DOJ_NMG_0061304

"He tried so hard to get my daughter away from me ... ," Tarshia Williams said. "When I got my baby back, my baby was unrecognizable."

No trial date has been set, but Williams said she will be here for the trial.

David Klein, Williams' attorney, said that he will fight the imposition of the death penalty if his client is found guilty of murder.

"This is a tragic case that is being compounded by the unfortunate decision by the government to seek the death penalty, especially given Mr. Williams' lack of criminal history and exceptional military service," Klein said.

Williams remains at the Federal Detention Center in Hono-lulu, Klein said. He declined further comment.

Federal authorities said Talia was an abused child and that her father beat her and knocked her to the floor on the day she died. An autopsy showed that Talia died of "inflicted head trauma due to battered child syndrome," and authorities reported that the apartment's walls were spattered with blood.

Yesterday, U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo said that the decision to seek the death penalty was made by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"The Department of Justice has determined that the torture and murder of a young child warrants the death penalty. So we will march accordingly," Kubo said. He declined further comment.

Delilah Williams, Naeem Williams' wife, also has been charged with the murder of Talia.

The death penalty won't be sought against Delilah Williams, U.S. Attorney Marshall H. Silverberg said.

Naeem Williams is only the second person in Hawai'i who has faced the possibility of execution since the federal death penalty was enacted in 1994. The death penalty in four other capital murder cases was rejected while U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno was in office.

In 1999, then-U.S. Attorney Steven Alm was given the go-ahead to seek the death penalty against Richard Lee Tuck "China" Chong. Chong was charged with the 1997 shooting death of William Noa Jr. in Makaha over what prosecutors said was a $100 drug debt. Chong eventually pleaded guilty to the murder charge and was sentenced to life in prison. In September 2001, Chong committed suicide in his cell at the federal penitentiary in Lompoc, Calif.

Capital punishment was abolished by the Hawai'i territorial Legislature in 1957. The last execution under state law was in 1944. The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Reach Curtis Lum at culum@honoluluadvertiser.com.

Prosecutors Seeking Death Penalty In Child Beating (HSB)

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, September 9, 2006

Notice filed in federal court in Naeem Williams case

Federal prosecutors filed notice today that they intend to seek a federal death penalty for a Schofield Barracks soldier if he is convicted of first-degree murder for the death of his 5-year-old daughter.

Spc. Naeem Williams, 26, was indicted Feb. 15 for last year's death of Talia Williams. Her stepmother, Delilah Williams, 22, was also charged with murder, but hasn't been indicted.

The decision to seek the death penalty was made by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, according to U.S. Attorney Edward Kubo Jr.

The death penalty won't be sought against Delilah Williams, U.S. Attorney Marshall H. Silverberg said. Both are being held in Honolulu, he said.

Talia was taken by ambulance from the family's residence at Wheeler Army Airfield to Wahiawa General Hospital on July 16, 2005.

Emergency room doctors pronounced the child dead from "blunt head trauma due to battered child syndrome" shortly after she arrived. Doctors said the girl had bruises on her arms, chest, knees and thighs and a cut on her back.

Court documents have quoted Delilah Williams as saying her husband struck Talia with a belt because she had wet herself, and when he found out she had wet herself again, he struck her again, and she fell, hitting her head on the floor.

Hawaii has no death penalty, but Williams will be tried in the state under the federal death penalty law, Silverberg said.

The case is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court because the crime allegedly occurred on a military base, he said.

A trial date for Williams has not been set.

Only a handful of federal executions have taken place since the 1960s, with fewer than 50 federal death row inmates nationwide.

Only one other person has faced the federal death penalty in Hawaii since the 1950s.

Richard "China" Chong avoided a death sentence in 2000 by agreeing to plead guilty to the 1997 murder of William Noa Jr. over a $100 drug debt.

Chong was sentenced in 2001 to life in prison without the possibility of parole, but died of an apparent suicide about three months later at the federal penitentiary in Lompoc, Calif.

Jail For Va. Man Who Gave China Secrets (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 9, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-A former Pentagon intelligence analyst who disclosed classified information to Chinese spies was sentenced Friday to three months in jail.

Ronald N. Montaperto, 67, pleaded guilty earlier this year in federal court to unlawful retention of classified documents. He admitted that he had contacts with two intelligence officers from China as early as 1983 and as recently as 2001.

At his sentencing, Montaperto said he had wanted to boost his status in the intelligence community and obtain useful intelligence for the United States. "I never meant to hurt my country in any way," he said.

Montaperto's lawyer, Stephen Anthony, said Montaperto was an academic and was untrained in dealing with Chinese spies, and that they essentially wheedled him into making illegal disclosures.

In rejecting prosecutors' request for a term of about two years, U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that there was no evidence that Montaperto sought to profit financially from his disclosures, and that the government would not have had a case had he not admitted his misconduct.

Pentagon Analyst Gets Light Jail Term (WT)

By Bill Gertz, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

A former Pentagon analyst who passed highly classified intelligence to two Chinese military officers was sentenced to three months in prison yesterday -- far shy of four to five years called for in sentencing guidelines.

Federal Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that despite the "very serious charge" against Ronald Montaperto, he was swayed to reduce the sentence based on letters of support from current and former intelligence and military officials.

Montaperto, 67, who pleaded guilty in June to unlawful retention of classified documents he obtained while working at the Defense Intelligence Agency, said he was trying to get intelligence for the United States from the Chinese officials.

"I never meant to hurt my country in any way," Mr. Montaperto said during his hearing at U.S. District Court in Alexandria. He worked at the Pentagon from 1981 until his dismissal in 2003.

Neil Hammerstrom, the assistant U.S. attorney, told the court that Montaperto met 60 times with two Chinese military intelligence officers and provided both secret and top secret information during the meetings.

Mr. Hammerstrom asked for at least a two-year sentence, arguing a tough prison term was needed because Montaperto "repeatedly placed in jeopardy sensitive sources and methods pertaining to our national security."

Montaperto told investigators he could not remember the specifics of the classified information he passed to Chinese intelligence, lapses that prevented prosecutors from charging him with more serious spy charges.

U.S. officials said a major U.S. electronic eavesdropping operation against China went silent around the time Montaperto admitted passing the highly classified data to the Chinese in 1988.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, chairman of the House intelligence committee, said he is concerned by the apparent support for Montaperto from the U.S. intelligence community and promised a committee probe.

"You would think that the intel community would set the standard for holding people accountable for mishandling and passing of classified information to our enemies," Mr. Hoekstra said.

Among the officials who wrote letters of support were Lonnie Henley, currently the deputy national intelligence officer for East Asia in the office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte. Mr. Henley said he has been "close friends" with Montaperto since the 1980s.

Another supporter was retired Rear Adm. Eric McVadon, who currently holds a security clearance as a consultant on China to the CIA and Pentagon. Adm. McVadon said he would not second guess the case against his friend but could only "recoil at characterizations of him in the press as a spy."

Judge Lee said he also considered Montaperto's "extraordinary" voluntary confessions in the light sentence, which includes three months of home detention and five years' probation.

However, investigators said Montaperto did not reveal or admit the passing of secrets until fooled into making the admissions in a 2003 sting operation while he worked at the U.S. Pacific Command think tank in Hawaii.

U.S. intelligence officials have said Montaperto was first investigated in the late 1980s after a Chinese defector said Beijing considered him one of their "dear friends," or informal supporters of China.

DOJ_NMG_0061306

The light sentence contrasts with the 12-year prison term given in January to another former Pentagon official, Larry Franklin, who was convicted of providing classified information to two officials of the America Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Jail For Va. Man Who Gave China Secrets (AP)

AP, September 9, 2006

A former Pentagon intelligence analyst who disclosed classified information to Chinese spies was sentenced Friday to three months in jail.

Ronald N. Montaperto, 67, pleaded guilty earlier this year in federal court to unlawful retention of classified documents. He admitted that he had contacts with two intelligence officers from China as early as 1983 and as recently as 2001.

At his sentencing, Montaperto said he had wanted to boost his status in the intelligence community and obtain useful intelligence for the United States. "I never meant to hurt my country in any way," he said.

Montaperto's lawyer, Stephen Anthony, said Montaperto was an academic and was untrained in dealing with Chinese spies, and that they essentially wheedled him into making illegal disclosures.

In rejecting prosecutors' request for a term of about two years, U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said that there was no evidence that Montaperto sought to profit financially from his disclosures, and that the government would not have had a case had he not admitted his misconduct.

Officials Capture Fugitive On FBI's 10 Most Wanted List (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 9, 2006

CARROLL, N.Y. -- Ralph "Bucky" Phillips turned, pistol in hand. A dog's growl had tipped him that, one more time, police were within seconds of snatching away his freedom.

State police said a trooper fired off a volley of shots in the woods of western New York, about 30 miles from where Phillips is accused of killing a fellow trooper and seriously wounding another.

This time the escaped convict didn't get a shot off. He just ran.

But Phillips, who had already given police the slip several times during five months on the run, couldn't shake his pursuers. The cordon around one of America's most wanted criminals tightened throughout the afternoon and into the evening.

At 8 p.m., an exhausted and gaunt Phillips, with helicopters above and SWAT teams and U.S. Marshals closing in, threw up his hands and surrendered.

"He could run but he couldn't hide," said New York State Police Superintendent Wayne Bennett. "The bottom line is the pressure was so great on him. The game was up and he knew it."

Phillips was being taken to a jail in Buffalo and was to be arraigned Saturday morning. He faces a charge of attempted murder in connection with the shooting of a state trooper on June 10.

Before his capture, Bennett said Phillips wasn't expecting the kind of rapid response and overwhelming manpower brought to bear on the search.

Bennett said Phillips was the "ultimate" danger to police.

"He knows he's facing dying in prison," he said before Phillips was caught. "If that doesn't make him desperate, I'm not sure what will."

Hours after the confrontation near Carroll, a town about 65 miles south of Buffalo, Bennett said there had been two more sightings of Phillips and that the search was focused on a square mile of woods, cornfields and open areas in nearby Pennsylvania.

Local, state and federal police used helicopters, roadblocks and dogs to end the state's largest manhunt ever.

Bennett said residents in the area were not evacuated.

Phillips, 44, is a career thief who broke out of a Buffalo-area jail in April by using a can opener to cut his way through a ceiling. He has threatened "suicide by cop" and once promised to "splatter pig meat all over Chautauqua County."

In June, police believe he shot a state trooper who had pulled over the car he was driving. Phillips escaped and the trooper survived.

On Aug. 31, police say he ambushed two state troopers who were staking out the house of his former girlfriend. Three days later, one of the troopers died. The other remains in critical condition in a Pennsylvania hospital.

Since his escape, he twisted and turned his way throughout southwestern New York and northwestern Pennsylvania, eluding a huge manhunt, stealing cars, burglarizing homes and camps and relying on a network of acquaintances to stay free, police said. He may have stolen 41 guns from a New York gun shop, authorities said.

On Thursday, the FBI put Phillips on its 10 Most Wanted list.

DOJ_NMG_0061307

Friday's search started shortly before 2 a.m. in Pennsylvania when a police officer tried to pull over a stolen car. After a short chase, the car crashed and the driver, identified by police as Phillips, fled into the woods.

A half-hour later, Phillips stole a second car and drove back into New York, where troopers located him and launched a second chase, authorities said.

Phillips jumped out of the moving car and ducked into woods, zigzagging back and forth between New York and Pennsylvania, authorities said.

Police dogs tracked his scent for several hours until he was spotted in a field by federal marshals.

The helicopter zeroed in on him and it was over.

___P>

Associated Press Writers Chris Carola and Michael Virtanen in Albany, and Mike Cowden and Mark Scolforo in Pennsylvania contributed to this report.

___P>

On the Net:

http://www.fbi.gov/wanted/topten/fugitives/fugitives.htm

Fugitive Wanted In Shootings Of 3 Troopers Surrenders (NYT)

By Michael Wilson And David Staba

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

DUNKIRK, N.Y., Sept. 8 — The fugitive Ralph J. Phillips surrendered to the police on Friday night, ending a five-month manhunt in which one state trooper was killed in an ambush and two were wounded.

About 8 p.m., Mr. Phillips, hands in the air, emerged from the woods across the New York State line in northern Pennsylvania, where he had been cornered in a one-square-mile swath of tall brush.

His surrender came just minutes before the search was to be halted for the night, the New York State Police said. Mr. Phillips, 44, was quickly taken out of the woods near the town of Akeley, Pa., in a police car while state troopers cheered inside a command tent.

Mr. Phillips, also known as Bucky, slumped with his head against the rear seat, his hair long, thin and tangled. He appeared to be exhausted, but unhurt.

“Bucky Philips, as I told you before, he could run, but he couldn’t hide, and he is in custody,” said Superintendent Wayne E. Bennett of the state police.

In the previous hours, he was chased by cars, tracked by helicopters and bloodhounds and fired at by a trooper, and finally surrounded.

Many of the people who lived nearby, as well as Mr. Phillips’s friends and relatives, had speculated that he would not be taken alive, and they expressed relief when he was.

After the capture, residents clapped and shouted along the dark roads.

Mr. Phillips had been a fugitive since April 2, when he escaped from the Erie County jail where he was serving a 90-day sentence on a parole violation. He is expected to be arraigned Saturday on escape charges and of charges connected with the June 10 shooting that left a trooper injured during a traffic stop in Chemung County in central New York.

Mr. Phillips is also a suspect in the Aug. 31 shooting of two state troopers outside his former companion’s house in Stockton, in western New York.

Trooper Joseph A. Longobardo was struck in the thigh and died on Sunday, a day after doctors amputated his leg.

Trooper Donald Baker Jr., who was hit in the abdomen, remained in critical condition in an Erie, Pa., hospital on Friday.

Mr. Phillips has not been charged in those shootings.

Less than an hour before the capture, as dusk approached, the authorities said that the search would be suspended when it grew dark, and that troopers would secure the area with a tight perimeter of officers and cars.

The searchers got a break at 1:55 a.m. on Friday when a sheriff’s deputy from Warren County, Pa., chased a stolen car. The car crashed into a tree, and the driver fled into the woods, the police said.

At 2:25 a.m., a second car in the area was reported stolen. The police saw that car about 20 minutes later and gave chase.

This time, the driver jumped out of the car while it was still moving, the police said. Again, he scrambled into the woods.

Hundreds of troopers and officers from other agencies swarmed into the area. The police found evidence in the car — exactly what was not disclosed Friday — that was used to give bloodhounds the suspect’s scent.

“We need scent,” Superintendent Bennett said. “It doesn’t get any better than that.”

“What occurred with the stolen cars was spontaneous — there was no time to put any plan into effect,” Superintendent Bennett said on Friday afternoon in the first of three afternoon news conferences.

DOJ_NMG_0061308

"That's an advantage to us. He didn't have any time to contact anyone or get to a safe house."

At 9:10 a.m., two troopers and a police dog came upon a man they identified as Mr. Phillips from behind, a short distance away. At the sound of the dog's growl, Mr. Phillips spun around with a pistol in his left hand, pointing it at the troopers, and one of the troopers shot at him, the police said.

Mr. Phillips did not fire. He fled, and it was unclear at the time whether he had been struck by the bullet. But he was uninjured, and unarmed, when he surrendered, the police said.

About six hours later, around 3 p.m., there were two more sightings of Mr. Phillips within 30 minutes, one by a trooper and one by a civilian. He had been running in one instance and crawling through brush in the other, Superintendent Bennett said.

Mr. Phillips had crisscrossed creeks in the area in an apparent attempt to confuse the police dogs tracking his scent, the police said.

The searchers closed in on him from the ground and above.

"He got to the point where there wasn't any place to go," Superintendent Bennett said. "You get to the point where there's a helicopter over your head and people with high-powered rifles coming toward you. The game is up."

In April, Mr. Phillips used a can opener to pry open a hole in a kitchen ceiling and escape from jail.

His criminal background, while long, included no violent crimes, and so the June 10 shooting of Trooper Sean M. Brown in Chemung County surprised residents who knew Mr. Phillips.

Trooper Brown was shot in the abdomen, and his injuries were the least severe of the three troopers struck.

By the end of the manhunt, the reward for information leading to Mr. Phillips's capture had grown to $425,000, and he had been added to the F.B.I.'s 10 Most Wanted List, just three names down from Osama bin Laden.

Seven people have been charged with aiding Mr. Phillips during his flight, including his daughter, her boyfriend and her mother,

"I would have to believe he's somewhat exhausted," Superintendent Bennett said after the surrender. "You constantly have to look around. You constantly have to look over your shoulder. I would say he's exhausted. We put a big chase on him today."

Capture Ends Fugitive's Long Run (ALBANYTU)

By Jordan Carleo-evangelist, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, September 9, 2006

Police catch suspected cop killer in woods in Pennsylvania

AKELEY, Pa. -- Ralph "Bucky" Phillips, the man suspected of shooting three New York state troopers in his five-month flight from justice, was taken into custody just before 8 p.m. Friday in rural Pennsylvania.

Phillips, 44, the subject of New York's largest manhunt, was driven out of a wooded area in a Pennsylvania State Police car, past dozens of residents cheering the officers.

The suspected cop killer slumped in the back seat, surrounded by state troopers.

Many officers, including numerous New York state troopers, shared the crowd's excitement -- blaring sirens, honking horns and returning words of thanks.

A raucous shout also went up at the police command post in Carroll, N.Y., witnesses said.

"Bucky Phillips, as I told you before -- he could run, but he couldn't hide," said State Police Superintendent Wayne Bennett. "The bottom line is that the good guys won here."

The excitement was tempered by the death of Trooper Joseph Longobardo on Sunday. The Greenfield resident, who worked out of Wilton, was ambushed with Trooper Donald Baker Jr. of Clifton Park in the woods near Phillips' hometown last week. Authorities have said Phillips is the main suspect.

Baker remains hospitalized in critical condition in an Erie, Pa., hospital. Longobardo's wake is scheduled to start Saturday.

Authorities also allege Phillips shot Trooper Sean Brown in Chemung County on June 10.

The hunt for Phillips -- previously centered in his native Chautauqua County in New York -- took a dramatic turn south early Friday morning.

Authorities focused on an area spanning Chautauqua County and Warren County, Pennsylvania. They captured Phillips as hundreds of law enforcement officers rushed against the coming darkness to search a one-square- mile rectangle in which they believed they had him cornered. Standing almost within arm's length of each other, the officers on one side of that rectangle methodically closed in, Bennett said.

"You're not going to shoot one of our people and get away with it," the superintendent said. "We will track you down. We will hunt you down for as long as it takes."

According to Bennett, here's what happened in the early hours Friday:

DOJ_NMG_0061309

The search began just before 2 a.m. in Warren County. There, a sheriff's deputy pursued a stolen car for several minutes before it crashed into a tree and its occupant ran away.

About a half-hour later, a second car was stolen in Pennsylvania. New York State Police spotted that car in the extreme southern end of Chautauqua County. After a brief chase, the driver fled the car while it was still moving and ran off into the woods.

Hundreds of law enforcement officers descended on the town of Carroll and neighboring communities in Pennsylvania, where they searched for Phillips by ground and air. At 9:10 a.m., two New York state troopers encountered a man who matched Phillips' description in the woods. The man turned with a pistol in his left hand, and a trooper fired.

The gunman did not fire back before fleeing.

Just before dusk, an exhausted, dirty and bearded Phillips appeared near a wood line in binocular sights of a Warren County sheriff's deputy.

The deputy alerted nearby SWAT teams and a helicopter descended on Phillips, who quickly realized he was surrounded and gave up without a fight. Phillips was ordered to raise his hands and was taken into custody.

"The game was up -- and he knew it," Bennett said.

In a law enforcement convoy that included a helicopter, Phillips was whisked almost 70 miles toward Buffalo where he is scheduled to be arraigned at 10 a.m. Saturday in federal court as a fugitive, Bennett said. Late Friday, Phillips was scheduled to arrive at the same Erie County jail he broke out of five months ago.

"What I can tell you is he won't get away from us while we're transporting him," Bennett promised.

After his court appearance, Phillips will be taken to Chemung County to be arraigned on an attempted murder charge for allegedly shooting Brown.

Phillips did not appear to be injured, Bennett said. No law enforcement officers were reported injured.

"Our job is to apprehend him," Bennett said. "If necessary, we were prepared to kill him."

In a statement, Gov. George E. Pataki thanked law enforcement, adding, "The streets are much safer and the citizens of New York can sleep much sounder tonight."

Before midnight, at the White Horse Inn on the village line of Cassadaga, near where Baker and Longobardo were shot, the marquee outside already read, "Bye Bye Bucky, Bye Bye."

Jordan Carleo-Evangelist can be reached at 454-5445 or by e-mail at jcarleo-evangelist@ timesunion.com.

Around The Nation (WT)

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

Police capture escaped convict

CARROLL, N.Y. -- A fugitive suspected of fatally shooting a New York state trooper and wounding two others while on the run for more than five months surrendered to police who had cornered him in a field just over the Pennsylvania border last night.

Ralph "Bucky" Phillips walked out with his hands up, ending a manhunt for the 44-year-old career thief who broke out of a Buffalo-area jail in April, New York State Police investigator Gary Colon said.

Phillips, who was on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted List, was being taken to a jail in Buffalo and is to be arraigned this morning. He faces a charge of attempted murder in connection with the shooting of a state trooper on June 10.

Businessman tied to lawmaker sentenced

A Kentucky businessman who admitted paying more than $400,000 in bribes to a Louisiana congressman was sentenced yesterday to more than seven years in prison.

Vernon Jackson, 54, of Louisville, is a key figure in the federal investigation of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat. The chief executive of the telecommunications firm IGate Inc. said he paid the bribes to gain the congressman's help in obtaining business deals in Africa.

The bribes paid by Jackson, including stocks and cash paid to a company controlled by Mr. Jefferson's family, had a value of $400,000 to $1 million, according to court records.

Mr. Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing.

Schwarzenegger apologizes for remarks

SANTA MONICA, Calif. -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized yesterday for saying during a closed-door meeting that Cubans and Puerto Ricans are naturally feisty and temperamental because of their combination of "black blood" and "Latino blood."

He said the tape-recorded comments "made me cringe" when he read them in yesterday's Los Angeles Times.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I'm sorry, I apologize," Mr. Schwarzenegger said. He added that if he heard his children make similar comments, "I would be upset."

DOJ_NMG_0061310

FDA fines Red Cross millions in safety case

The government said yesterday it was fining the American Red Cross $4.2 million for violating blood-safety laws.

The violations include failing to ask appropriate questions of potential donors and not following test procedures, said the Food and Drug Administration. The FDA said it had no evidence of serious health consequences resulting from the violations.

The fine was the largest single penalty assessed so far under terms of a 2003 court settlement, which allows large fines when the Red Cross violates FDA rules. Previously, the FDA had fined the Red Cross a total of $5.7 million.

In a statement, the American Red Cross said its senior management "is committed to full compliance with the amended consent decree and all applicable federal regulations." It planned to respond to the FDA within 20 days.

WTC families seek help for survivors

NEW YORK -- The father of a police detective who died after breathing in dust from ground zero wreckage told lawmakers yesterday that the government has spent too much time studying the health problems that killed his son.

"We must make the first priority the treatment of the heroes to improve their heath and save their lives. The studies should be secondary," Joseph Zadroga, father of New York Police Department Detective James Zadroga, told a House subcommittee hearing near the World Trade Center.

Public pressure has been growing for the government to deal with health problems blamed on the toxic dust from the site of the September 11, 2001, attacks.

This week, a hospital study concluded nearly 70 percent of ground zero workers had lung problems, and many of them would likely be sick for the rest of their lives.

From staff reports and wire dispatches

CIVIL LAW:

Iraq Contractor Inflated Costs, Lawsuit Alleges (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

A former employee of a Halliburton subsidiary claims that she was fired for revealing to her managers that the company was charging the government fraudulently inflated costs for military facilities it ran in Iraq, according to court papers unsealed yesterday.

At bases in Anbar Province, the desert homeland of Iraq's bitter Sunni-led insurgency, company employees faked head counts to inflate its charges for operating recreational and dining facilities, and led a relatively lavish lifestyle by appropriating food and equipment meant for the troops, the papers charge.

The suit in federal court by the former employee, Julie McBride, is the second corporate whistleblower case to emerge from Iraq. In the first, a jury found the security company Custer Battles guilty of inflating invoices by $3 million, but the case is now going to appeal after a judge held up the settlement.

A spokeswoman for Halliburton, Cathy Mann, said that there had been no wrongdoing by the subsidiary, KBR, formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root.

"The claims included in this lawsuit clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts as well as a lack of understanding of KBR's contractual agreements with its customer, the U.S. Army," Ms. Mann said in a written statement.

Ms. Mann said that the company's charges to the government did not depend on head counts and that KBR employees were contractually entitled to use the food and recreational equipment at camps in Iraq, just as the troops were.

Those assertions were disputed by a lawyer in the case, Alan Grayson, of Grayson & Kubli in McLean, Va., the same firm that represented whistleblowers in the Custer Battles case. He asserted that the KBR employees enjoyed indulgences ranging from cases of soda and tubs of food to big-screen TV's and exercise equipment.

The case is being brought under the False Claims Act, which allows the government to collect triple any damages that a jury might award. The law allows Ms. McBride, as a whistleblower, to collect anywhere from 15 to 30 percent of that assessment if her case is successful. Ms. McBride was not immediately available for comment, but Mr. Grayson said that she is a former lawyer who has two children and now lives in Los Angeles.

Whistle-blower Slams Iraq Contractor (AP-Y)

By Deborah Hastings

AP, September 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061311

Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg, Brown & Root charged millions to the government for recreational services never provided to U.S. troops in Iraq, including giant tubs of chicken wings and tacos, a widescreen TV, and cheese sticks meant for a military Super Bowl party, according to a federal whistle-blower suit unsealed Friday.

Instead, the suit alleges, KBR used the military's supplies for its own football party.

Filed last year in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., by former KBR employee Julie McBride, the lawsuit claims the giant defense contractor billed the government for thousands of meals it never served, inflated the number of soldiers using its fitness and Internet centers, and regularly siphoned off great quantities of supplies destined for American soldiers.

McBride was hired by KBR in 2004 as a "morale, welfare and recreation" coordinator at Camp Fallujah, a Marine installation about 35 miles west of Baghdad. She was fired the next year after making several complaints about KBR's accounting practices, the suit says, and was kept under guard until she was escorted to an airplane and flown out of the country.

Halliburton denied McBride's allegations.

"The claims included in this lawsuit clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts as well as a lack of understanding of KBR's contractual agreements with its customer," said company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross in an e-mail to The Associated Press.

The Super Bowl incident occurred in January 2005, the suit said. "McBride witnessed a large amount of food that was ordered specifically for a Super Bowl party for the military" taken instead to the company's lodgings. "About 10 large metal tubs full of tacos, chicken wings, (and) cheese sticks were taken from the military party site to a KBR camp for a KBR Super Bowl Party for KBR employees," according to the complaint. A widescreen TV was also removed.

McBride worked 12-hour shifts, seven days a week, at Camp Fallujah's recreation center, where the government was billed according to the number of soldiers using the contractor's facilities, which included a weight room, video games, Internet cafe, a library and phone bank, the suit says. She alleges that KBR deliberately overstated the number of military personnel using its services by counting the same person several times. For example, a person who used a computer was counted as one. If that person went on the weight room, another count was added to the list of patrons.

"It wasn't double-dipping, but triple dipping or even quadruple billing," the suit claims.

Attorney Alan Grayson, who represents McBride, said "millions of dollars have been submitted by Halliburton for recreational services" not provided.

The "qui tam" suit, filed under the federal False Claims Act, allows citizens to sue on behalf of the government against contractors who make false claims for payment. The plaintiffs are eligible to receive a percentage of awarded damages, which are tripled in this type of suit.

Such suits are usually sealed for 60 days while the Justice Department investigates the claims and decides whether the U.S. Attorney's office will sign on as a co-plaintiff.

The Justice Department declined comment Friday on why it chose not to participate in McBride's suit.

McBride is not the first Halliburton employee to allege fraudulent billing practices. The company has steadfastly denied wrongdoing.

Rory Mayberry, who worked for KBR in 2004, testified from Iraq via videotape to a group of Democratic members of Congress investigating contractor fraud.

As food manager at another military camp in Iraq, Mayberry said he witnessed KBR employees serving spoiled food to American troops, including food from trucks that had been bombed and shot at. Workers were told to pick out the shrapnel, and then serve the food, Mayberry testified.

He also claimed KBR charged the government for meals it never served.

In July 2004, former KBR planner Marie DeYoung testified before the House Committee on Government Reform. She said she witnessed "significant waste and overpricing" while working for the contractor in Kuwait, including paying a subcontractor $100 per 15 pounds of laundry, costs which were passed on to the government.

Halliburton, which holds more than 50 percent of rebuilding contracts in Iraq, was headed by Dick Cheney before he took office as vice president. He has denied any government favoritism toward his former company.

Halliburton Fraud Lawsuit Details Super Bowl Party (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Halliburton Co. executives ordered a big-screen television and 10 large tubs of tacos, chicken wings and cheese sticks delivered to Iraq for last year's Super Bowl, then billed U.S. taxpayers for their party, according to a lawsuit unsealed Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0061312

The Houston-based company also defrauded the government by double- and triple-billing for Internet, food and gym services for soldiers, according to the lawsuit by a former employee for KBR, the Halliburton subsidiary that runs dining halls for troops in Iraq.

"The administration is not enforcing the laws against fraud when it comes to contractors in Iraq," said Alan Grayson, the attorney who filed the suit. "When it comes to seeing that the law is executed, the Bush administration is a no-show."

Halliburton denied the allegations, filed under the False Claims Act. Designed to prevent war profiteering, such lawsuits allow citizens to sue on behalf of the government and recover a portion of any damages.

The company did not deny ordering the TV and the food; it set up snack buffets and screenings at military bases throughout Iraq for the 2005 Super Bowl. But KBR noted that its contract allowed the firm to provide recreation and morale-boosting services for its employees and for American soldiers.

"The claims included in this lawsuit clearly demonstrate a complete misinterpretation of facts as well as a lack of understanding of KBR's contractual agreements with its customer, the U.S. Army," Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said.

The accusations in the lawsuit are the latest involving Halliburton's controversial multibillion-dollar contract to feed and house American soldiers in Iraq. Democrats have been quick to criticize the company, which was run by Vice President Dick Cheney from 1995 to 2000.

In June, a KBR subcontractor was indicted on kickback charges involving the dining halls, which feed tens of thousands of soldiers a day in camps throughout Iraq and Kuwait. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has withheld $55.1 million out of a total of $13.7 billion in payments on the contract as a result of disputed costs.

The Department of Justice chose not to join the lawsuit against Halliburton after conducting an investigation. Justice officials declined to elaborate Friday, but in legal circles such a decision is usually considered indication of a weak case.

Grayson accused the department of shirking its duties in the middle of a political season. Several dozen lawsuits alleging fraud in Iraq are believed to have been filed, but they remain under seal until the department completes its investigations.

Grayson is best known for having won another fraud case, which Justice officials also passed up, against a private security company named Custer Battles. That decision was recently overturned by a federal judge and is now on appeal.

Grayson, who recently lost a primary race for a House seat in Florida running as a Democrat, denied any political motivations in pursuing the case against Halliburton, noting that he had filed it before deciding to run for office.

He said that the whistle-blower in the case, Julie McBride, came forward only after KBR officials ignored her complaints. McBride said in the lawsuit that she was placed under armed guard and then fired after she raised questions about Halliburton's billing practices. She could not be reached for comment Friday.

Justice Department officials "are stonewalling and keeping these cases under seal unnecessarily," Grayson said.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), who has been the leader in Congress in attacking Halliburton, said that the charges were further proof of war profiteering by the oil services giant.

"One former Halliburton employee after another tells the same story of outrageous and intentional overcharging," Waxman said in a statement. "Yet no one in the Bush administration seems to care."

Government Won't Join Lawsuit (HC/BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly, Bloomberg News

Houston Chronicle, September 9, 2006

Whistle-blower says Halliburton overcharged for Iraqi recreation

The Justice Department declined to join a whistle-blower suit against Halliburton Co. that accuses the Houston-based company of overcharging the government in contracts to operate recreation facilities for soldiers in Iraq.

Julie McBride, a morale, welfare and recreation coordinator employed by a Halliburton unit in Iraq, alleged in an April 26 complaint unsealed Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington that the company sought to artificially inflate revenue by overestimating the number of soldiers using its facilities.

On June 27, the U.S. declined to take part in the case, according to court records. The False Claims Act allows individual whistle-blowers to sue on behalf of the government and recover part of any settlement or verdict. The Justice Department then decides whether to take part, and while plaintiffs may continue to pursue a case if the U.S. declines to join, they must do so at their own expense.

"I think it is irresponsible," Alan Grayson, McBride's lawyer, said of the government's decision. He said his client will continue to pursue the case.

Cynthia Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment on the complaint but said the agency "diligently investigates all allegations before determining whether or not to intervene."

DOJ_NMG_0061313

The government often doesn't join false claim cases, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a nonprofit policy group.

KBR vehemently denied the allegations of fraud.

"We intend to vigorously defend our position," spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said in a prepared statement.

The lawsuit also accused Halliburton executives of ordering a big-screen TV and 10 large tubs of tacos, chicken wings and cheese sticks delivered to Iraq for last year's Super Bowl, then billing taxpayers.

The company did not deny ordering the television and the food; it set up snack buffets and special screenings at military bases throughout Iraq for the 2005 Super Bowl. But KBR noted that its contract allowed the company to provide recreation and morale-boosting services for its own employees, as well as American soldiers.

Halliburton's KBR subsidiary helps run dozens of military camps across Iraq where it operates facilities, including fitness centers and Internet cafes. The Army through July has placed $17 billion worth of orders for Iraq services and paid Halliburton $15 billion.

The Army said in July it will end Halliburton's multibillion-dollar agreement to handle troop services in Iraq later this year and put the five-year contract up for bid.

Grayson, who recently lost a primary race for a House seat in Florida running as a Democrat, denied any political motivations in pursuing the case.

The Los Angeles Times contributed to this report.

Pfizer Wins Dismissal Of Suit By Former Executive (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly And Shannon Pettypiece

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Pfizer Inc., the world's largest drugmaker, won dismissal of a ``whistleblower'' lawsuit by a former executive who accused the company of promoting unapproved uses for Genotropin, a growth hormone.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Tauro in Boston dismissed the suit by Peter Rost, who was a vice president of marketing at Pfizer until he was fired in December 2005. Rost said in a telephone interview that he plans to appeal.

Rost sued Pfizer in 2003 under the False Claims Act, alleging the New York-based company illegally promoted Genotropin for so-called off-label uses and gained sales of $50 million in 2002 as a result. Rost has criticized the drug industry, including Pfizer, for positions such as opposing legislation that would allow Americans to buy drugs abroad. He is also suing Pfizer for wrongful termination in a separate case.

Rost's suit ``fails to identify one actual false claim that was submitted to the government for the reimbursement of an off-label prescription of Genotropin,'' Tauro said in his Aug. 30 order. ``No matter how likely the existence of false claims, this court cannot speculate that such claims inevitably flowed from defendants' activities.''

Pfizer spokesman Paul Fitzhenry said the court ruling ``sends a very clear message'' about the merits of the case by dismissing it in its entirety without giving Rost an opportunity to amend his complaint.

The Justice Department in December said it wouldn't join Rost's suit. He was fired the same day.

Genotropin Approval

The Food and Drug Administration approved Genotropin for medical conditions including growth deficiency in children and adults. Rost alleged Pfizer promoted the drug as an anti-aging treatment for adults and for short stature in children that wasn't caused by hormone deficiency.

``We will amend our complaint with the requested data and expect to prevail with an appeal,'' Rost said.

Shares of Pfizer rose 14 cents to $27.59 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They've risen 18 percent this year.

The False Claims Act allows individuals, known as whistleblowers, to sue for fraud on behalf of the government and recover part of any settlement or verdict. The government reviews such cases and decides whether to take part.

Rost has had a series of disputes with employers. He publicly criticized Pfizer and the pharmaceutical industry in 2004 for opposing legislation that would allow U.S. citizens to buy drugs abroad. In 2001 he sued Wyeth, where he'd worked previously, claiming he was forced to quit his job at the drugmaker after he told superiors that managers were helping workers evade taxes in Sweden. Rost settled the case with Wyeth.

The case is Rost v. Pfizer, 05cv10384, U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

To contact the reporter on this story: Cary O'Reilly in Washington at caryoreilly@bloomberg.net ; Shannon Pettypiece in Washington at spettypiece@bloomberg.net

DOJ_NMG_0061314

ANTITRUST:

Michaels Sale Wins Antitrust Approval (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

The $6 billion sale of Michaels Stores Inc. to Bain Capital LLC and Blackstone Group LP won U.S. antitrust clearance, according to a list of terminated merger reviews published by the government.

The sale of the biggest U.S. arts and craft retailer to the two private-equity firms was on the list published by the Federal Trade Commission. Bain Capital and Blackstone agreed June 30 to purchase equal shares of Michaels Stores, based in Irving.

Under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, transactions of more than $56 million must be reported to the Justice Department and FTC to give the agencies an opportunity to determine if they might violate antitrust laws. The agencies have 30 days to decide whether to open an investigation or terminate the merger review.

The Justice Department is investigating Michaels' granting of stock options since 1996. A company spokesman said yesterday that an internal review conducted by an independent legal counsel found no evidence to support a conclusion that there was intentional misconduct.

Michaels Buyout Wins Antitrust Clearance (DALBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, September 9, 2006

Arts and crafts retailer Michaels Stores Inc.'s $6 billion sale to private equity firms The Blackstone Group and Bain Capital has gained approval from anti-trust regulators, according to a government listing of terminated merger reviews.

The move was published on the Federal Trade Commissions list of early termination notices. An early termination is granted only when the FTC and the Department of Justice Antitrust Division have completed their review of the deal and determined not to take any action.

The deal is expected to close late during the third quarter or early in the fourth quarter.

Michaels (NYSE: MIK - News) is the subject of a Justice Department investigation related to its granting of stock options that is ongoing.

The company also faces shareholder lawsuits alleging infractions in the granting of stock options to certain officers and directors from 1994 through 2000, and class-action allegations regarding the proposed buyout of the company.

Alltel To Sell Operations In Rural Minnesota As Part Of Midwest Purchase (RCRWN)

By Jeffrey Silva

RCR Wireless News, September 8, 2006

WASHINGTON—The Justice Department said Alltel Corp. agreed to sell wireless assets in several rural Minnesota markets as a condition to antitrust approval of its $1 billion purchase of regional operator Midwest Wireless.

"The department's action ensures that wireless telephone consumers will continue to obtain the benefits of competition—lower prices and higher quality," said Thomas Barnett, chief of the department's antitrust division. "The required divestitures preserve competition in rural areas where consumers often have fewer choices for wireless telephone services."

The state of Minnesota supports the divestiture, in which Alltel will get rid of mobile phone systems in four rural markets where Midwest also offers service, and the issue is now headed to a federal judge for consideration. The Federal Communications Commission too is expected to rule on the Alltel-Midwest Wireless deal by month's end.

U.S. Cellular Corp. previously warned the FCC that an Alltel-Midwest tie-up would hurt competition in southern Minnesota.

Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., is the nation's fifth-largest mobile phone operator, serving around 11 million customers. Alltel also provides roaming and other wireless services in 35 states to other mobile wireless providers who use CDMA, TDMA and GSM technologies. Alltel had wireless revenues of approximately $6.6 billion last year.

Midwest Wireless, headquartered in Mankato, Minn., serves around 440,000 wireless customers in three states. Midwest Wireless also provides roaming and other wireless services to other mobile wireless providers who use CDMA technology. Last year Midwest Wireless earned about $264 million in revenues.

Government Pressuring Realtors To Include All Listings Online (MJS)

By Michele Derus Mderus@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 9, 2006

Documents indicate southeast Wisconsin among areas targeted by federal commission on antitrust grounds

America's online home shoppers might get a broader view of their choices, because of the Federal Trade Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0061315

Regulators want Multiple Listing Service operations to publicly market all "for sale" listings - not just the ones that guarantee Realtors full sales commissions. Realtors, a trademarked group, created and run the nation's estimated 900 MLS databanks, which showcase all houses for sale listed by Realtors.

"We say people should be free to choose," said Patrick J. Roach, deputy assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Competition.

"Upwards of three-quarters of people who buy homes use the Internet, and most of what's out there are sites fed by MLS," Roach said. "If its rule says that, if you vary from the traditional form of listing agreement, this house is not going to be visible to the general public - well, from an antitrust perspective, that means a bunch of competitors are dictating terms for all agreements."

Roach said his Washington, D.C., agency is challenging such rules where it finds them. In the past week, it logged its first two victories.

The Austin, Texas, Board of Realtors signed a consent order agreeing to treat all listings equally, and the Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin said it would begin sending exclusive agency listings to www.realtor .com, the biggest public-access site, and the Internet Data Exchange clearinghouse for brokers' sites.

"Exclusive agency" contracts are a tiny part of the $60 billion-plus annual home-selling trade - suppressed because MLS operators often don't make them publicly available, said antitrust lawyer David Barry. In such contracts, the listing agent's commission is reduced or waived if the homeowner snags a buyer without assistance.

"Those agents can tell the seller, 'If you find the buyer, you don't have to pay me a nickel.' But if they find the buyer, they get their full commission," said Barry, senior attorney at Barry & Associates in San Francisco.

Some MLS systems feed exclusive agency listings to publicly accessible industry Web sites, such as the 3 million-listing www.realtor.com.

Others exclude them. Lawyers for the National Association of Realtors and its state chapter in Wisconsin say they don't know how many don't grant public access - but federal regulators are tracking them down.

Shielding this money-saving type of listing from public view, while promoting the full-fee type, is illegal, the trade commission's Roach said.

His agency charged the Austin Board of Realtors with antitrust violations and, this week, the parties announced a consent order that no listing would be kept private. Last week, the Appleton-based Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin announced that, in light of a Federal Trade Commission inquiry, it would change its ways, too.

Both realty organizations denied doing anything wrong. But, as Margery Chapman, executive director of the Appleton group, put it: "This change (should) eliminate any doubt." Southeast Wisconsin in focus

Will southeast Wisconsin's Metro MLS be next?

The Journal Sentinel obtained paperwork this week indicating that this market is a Federal Trade Commission target. Officials at Metro MLS and the trade commission declined to confirm or deny that, however.

Peter Shuttleworth, executive vice president of Wauwatosa-based Metro MLS, said: "We do not publish exclusive agency listings on public Web sites or the Internet, and we've had that rule since 1984. This is a broker-to-broker cooperative. We have no obligation to market FSBOs, which is what some of these are."

FSBO means "For Sale By Owner," a direct seller-to-buyer deal. Some FSBOs can buy their way into an MLS through cut-rate deals with Realtors.

That means there is no listing-broker commission - the same scenario that might occur with an exclusive listings agreement.

FSBO deals represent about 10% to 15% of all home sales, depending on locale and market conditions, experts say. Most such sellers do offer to pay a commission to any realty broker who supplies the buyer - typically 2% to 3% of sales price or a flat fee.

FSBOs have long been a sore point in the realty industry. Lately, so have the realty brokers who provide services to them. Now federal regulators, nosing into sometimes long-held rules on exclusive agency listings, are getting on industry nerves, as well.

"The rule has a legally defensible rationale," said Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors. "Why would you want to advertise that kind of listing? We're not in the business of helping sellers sell their homes and cut brokers out of their compensation."

Nonetheless, the national trade group doesn't dictate policy on this, Janik said.

"If an MLS wishes to exclude these from public advertising display, fine," she said. "If they don't want to, that's fine, too."

It's not fine with the Federal Trade Commission, Roach said.

"We've made it clear that we're looking at other places," he said.

At least 14 places so far, Janik said, though she wouldn't name them.

Critics say the realty industry is overdue for change. At congressional hearings this summer, regulators, consumer groups and industry entrepreneurs accused the powerful National Association of Realtors of stifling money-saving changes.

Among them was attorney Barry, who said the industry's market stranglehold has cost consumers billions of dollars a year.

"The FTC deserves kudos for pushing this issue," Barry said. Their victories in Texas and Wisconsin "may wake up consumers all over America (and) the lawyers that advise these boards of Realtors."

Information on Federal Trade Commission action regarding the realty industry is online at www.ftc.gov (under Hot Topics, click on Real Estate Competition) Information on Federal Trade Commission action is online at www.ftc.gov (under Hot Topics, click on Real Estate Competition)From the Sept. 9, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Have an opinion on this story? Write a letter to the editor or start an online forum.

Subscribe today and receive 4 weeks free! Sign up now.

GE Gets Antitrust OK To Buy Kinder Morgan Natural Gas Unit (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- General Electric Co. (GE) has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the natural gas unit of Kinder Morgan Inc. (KMI).

The FTC said Friday that it granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law.

General Electric's energy unit will buy Kinder Morgan's U.S. natural gas retail operation for $710 million.

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act requires under certain circumstances that prospective acquirers of voting securities or assets apply for clearance from regulators. Requests for early termination or clearance are granted when the Federal Trade Commission and the antitrust division of the Department of Justice have determined that they won't take enforcement action during the waiting period.

Shares of General Electric recently traded at $33.95, down 9 cents, while Kinder Morgan shares recently traded at $104.23, up 2 cents.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Department Rejects Interim Plan For Nuclear Waste (NYT)

By Martin Stolz And Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

SKULL VALLEY, Utah, Sept. 8 — The Interior Department has moved to block a huge “interim” nuclear waste storage plant on an Indian reservation here, citing a lack of confidence that it would truly be temporary because there is so much doubt about completion of a permanent repository, at Yucca Mountain, Nev.

But sponsors of the project, which was granted a license by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in February, said that the Interior Department decision had numerous errors and that they were considering an appeal.

A consortium of eight utilities negotiated a lease 10 years ago for an 800-acre corner of the reservation that belongs to the Goshute band, a tiny tribe, about 50 miles west of Salt Lake City. The lease would run for 25 years with an option for another 25, and the waste would be stored in above-ground casks of a type already used at reactors around the country.

Some waste is so old that the reactors that generated it have been torn down. And many nuclear power plants still operating have expanding fields of storage casks and no place to ship them.

But in a decision issued Thursday, the Interior Department said that acting as a “prudent” trustee of Indian lands, it could “derive no confidence from the public record” that there would be someplace for the fuel ultimately to go.

“Construction of Yucca Mountain could be indefinitely delayed by any number of factors, including protracted litigation,” the department said, adding that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission “acknowledges that ‘decades’ are the most relevant unit of time for predicting the completion date.”

The decision was hailed by many elected officials in Utah, which has no reactors, and where many non-Indians oppose the plan.

But John D. Parkyn, the chairman of the board of Private Fuel Storage, the consortium, said in a telephone interview on Friday that the opinion about Yucca Mountain was contrary to federal policy and that there were various errors in the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0061317

One, Mr. Parkyn said, is that the decision said development on the reservation would require a tribal police force. But in fact, he said, the plant would have only about 20 employees, and most of those would be guards. If tribal police were somehow required, he said, the project would pay for them.

The decision also cites the environmental impact of two extra-large trucks per week going to the site, but the Interior Department has already approved a garbage dump on the site that requires about 1,000 truckloads a week, Mr. Parkyn said.

He said that the Interior Department had told him a decision had been made but that he had not given him a copy. He received one from a reporter, he said, and had not finished analyzing it.

The tribe is divided over the project. A proponent, Garth Jerry Bear, said Friday at his home on the reservation that the plant would provide hope for the desperately poor members, good-paying jobs and money for schools. "This is a third-world country, right here in the United States," Mr. Bear said.

He added that the county, state and federal government were usurping tribal sovereignty because of resentment over not getting their share of the lucrative contract.

"It's like the broken treaties," Mr. Bear said.

Sammy Blackbear, an opponent of the storage plan, said he was elated by the decision.

"It should have come a long time ago,'' Mr. Blackbear said, "but this is better late than never."

Denise Chancellor, an assistant attorney general in Utah, said that the law gave the Interior Department wide discretion in deciding about leases, and that "it's got to be fairly blatant before a court will step in and overturn it."

The Interior Department's decision is "the final nail" in killing the project, Ms. Chancellor said.

At the Energy Department, a spokesman, Craig Stevens, said the Yucca Mountain repository would be finished by 2017.

But nuclear waste may yet go elsewhere. Mr. Stevens said the department had received dozens of proposals for sites for interim storage and then reprocessing, in which uranium and plutonium are recovered for future use.

Nuclear experts said, however, that given the experience of the Skull Valley project, it would take years for any of the sites to get a license.

The department is under pressure to find some way to accept nuclear waste, because it signed contracts with utilities in the early 80's, promising to do so beginning in 1998, in exchange for payments by the utilities of one-tenth of a cent per kilowatt-hour generated at their reactors.

The Skull Valley partners offered that site to the Energy Department, but Mr. Parkyn said the Energy Department had not responded.

Valero Refinery To Clean Up Air With New System (WILNJ)

By Jeff Montgomery, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, September 9, 2006

A multi-million dollar system that will tame one of Delaware's largest single air-pollution sources is expected to start up next week at the refinery near Delaware City.

The Valero refinery near Delaware City lit up the sky when it flared off chemicals in July. (Buy photo) The News Journal file/JON P. ZAIMES

A multi-million dollar system that will tame one of Delaware's largest single air-pollution sources is expected to start up next week at the Valero refinery near Delaware City.

The new sulfur dioxide "scrubber" on Valero's petroleum "coking" unit will demote its smokestack from one of the nation's top refinery sources of acid rain, smog and dust-forming emissions to something more typical of other nearby crude oil processors.

Valero planned to notify by letter thousands of residents who live within 5 miles of the development.

"It's going to take out 19,000 tons a year of sulfur dioxide -- it's a huge amount, absolutely," said Ravi Rangan, an environmental program manager for the Department of Natural Resources and Environmental Control.

Rangan was one of the DNREC officials who helped pursue the refinery's various owners for years over uncontrolled sulfur dioxide emissions and other pollution offenses. The effort eventually wound up in federal and state courts, producing corporate agreements to install two sulfur scrubbers now slated to start up before the end of the year.

The Environmental Protection Agency, DNREC and state and federal justice departments collaborated on the settlements and related penalties -- approved in early 2001 and later amended. Recent estimates of the scrubber costs to the refinery have ranged as high as $400 million.

Deadlines for the original agreement were set back in part by public objections to the refinery's first scrubber design. That system would have flushed more than 100,000 tons of sodium sulfate into the Delaware River annually, along with traces of mercury and other contaminants.

DOJ_NMG_0061318

A substitute design developed for the refinery will convert sulfur dioxide gases into elemental sulfur that Valero can sell for other industrial uses. For complete coverage see The News Journal on Saturday or www.delawareonline.com

Contact Jeff Montgomery at 678-4277 or jmontgomery@delawareonline.com

Judge Halts Petroleum Lease Sales (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeannette J. Lee, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

(AP) - ANCHORAGE, Alaska-Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne expressed confidence in an upcoming oil lease sale in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska when he visited the North Slope last week. "We're set to go forward," Kempthorne said after taking a helicopter ride over a section of the vast reserve. But that sale will likely have to wait.

A judge on Thursday temporarily halted lease sales of more than 1 million acres in the NPR-A that environmentalists say are essential feeding and breeding grounds for caribou and migratory birds.

Nearly 13 million acres of the reserve in northern Alaska are available for lease sale or have been sold to oil companies, most notably ConocoPhillips. The company hopes to augment waning crude stocks in the Prudhoe Bay fields east of the NPR-A.

Environmentalists filed the lawsuit against the Department of the Interior, the state of Alaska and oil companies in hopes of cordoning off about 600,000 acres of the 23-million acre reserve from more exploratory drilling. The government had planned to open bids on Sept. 27 for about 1.7 million acres, which encompass the area targeted by environmentalists.

ConocoPhillips has its eye on the contested area, which holds a potential 2 billion barrels of oil beneath the permafrost near Lake Teshekpuk.

The order, filed in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, said the government had not adequately considered the cumulative environmental effects of the lease sales in the eastern and western sections of the reserve.

Environmental impact statements addressed the effects of leasing individual parcels, but those reports were too narrow in scope because they did not consider how leasing in the northeastern part of the reserve would affect land and wildlife in the northwestern section, according to the order.

U.S. District Judge James Singleton chastised the defendants for the oversight, writing that they "violated the National Environmental Protection Act."

The Department of the Interior and ConocoPhillips did not immediately return messages left late Thursday.

Singleton is expected to make a final ruling the last week of September, said Charles Clusen, director of the Alaska project for the Natural Resources Defense Council based in Washington, D.C., one of the plaintiffs.

The government set aside the NPR-A in 1923 for energy development.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne, whose department is in charge of the lease sale, flew over the lake area last week. He said afterward that he was convinced a restricted drilling plan could accommodate energy development and wildlife protection.

The lease plan would allow for caribou migration by banning some areas to drilling and set up buffers to protect geese molting areas, Henri Bisson, the Bureau of Land Management's Alaska director, has said.

Environmental groups said they only want to preserve the most sensitive fractions of land and don't aim to block exploration in the arctic oil reserve.

"Kempthorne can go ahead with the lease sale of the northwest and the rest of the northeast sections, but he has to leave this part alone," Clusen said. "We're not asking to shut everything down, we're just going after the most valuable wildlife area."

Other plaintiffs are the National Audobon Society, the Alaska Wilderness League, Center for Biological Diversity, Northern Alaska Environmental Center, Sierra Club and the Wilderness Society.

Primary defendants include the federal Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Stresses GOP's Immigration Efforts (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Congress will not address major immigration revisions before the Nov. 7 election, the Senate's top Republican said yesterday, but he and his allies hope to limit political damage to their party by telling voters they have poured millions of dollars into one component of the controversy: tightening the border with Mexico.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) acknowledged that a broad-based immigration bill, backed by President Bush and passed by the Senate, is dead for now. But Republican leaders have added money for border fences and patrol agents to recent spending measures dealing with the Pentagon and homeland security. Frist said he thinks that step may lessen public anger over the porous border and the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0061319

"We need to message very well the fact that we have increased over the last two years . . . the level of funding for immigration and border control fourfold, the fact that by the time we finish here in four weeks we will have 375 miles of fence being built and being funded . . . and the fact that stopping people at the border coming across has increased . . . by 25 to 30 percent in the last eight months," Frist told reporters.

The effort omits many of the provisions that he and Bush backed in the Senate bill, Frist conceded, including pathways to legal status for many illegal immigrants. However, he said, most Americans "just want to see the fence going up."

The legislative standoff amounts, in part, to a back-door victory for House Republicans, who have insisted on tougher enforcement of immigration laws before tackling broader revisions. Several prominent GOP senators have criticized that approach, saying voters expect their party to address all major aspects of the immigration debate. They include a larger temporary-worker program, improved record-keeping and worker verification procedures, and strategies for dealing with illegal immigrants without trying to deport them all.

"If it is perceived by the public that the Republican Party -- which owns the House, the Senate and the White House -- cannot solve hard problems working with Democrats, then we will lose our majorities," Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) said earlier this year.

Frist, briefing a half-dozen reporters in his Capitol office yesterday, predicted that voters will give his party more time.

"We have to address the 12 million people, the temporary-worker program and work-site enforcement, as well as border security," said Frist, who is not seeking reelection but may run for president in 2008. "We're not going to be able to do that before the election." The delay will not hurt GOP incumbents this fall, he said, because "what Republicans expect us to do is be firm on the border, secure the border, and we intend to do that," primarily through military and homeland security appropriations bills "and other bills that may come forward."

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who is poised to succeed Frist as the Republican leader next year, told the reporters that if he were a GOP senator asked about immigration in a debate, "whether I voted against that comprehensive Senate bill or voted for it, as [Frist] and I did, here would be my answer." He then read from a list compiled by the Senate Budget Committee of spending measures in the past two years: 3,736 new Border Patrol agents, 9,150 new detention beds for arrested illegal immigrants, 370 miles of fence along the Mexican border.

"I think that's the way our candidates are going to handle it this fall," McConnell said.

The Senate's immigration bill called for about 350 miles of new fencing along the 1,950-mile border with Mexico. The House bill called for 700 miles of fence. The two bills were never sent to a conference committee for reconciliation efforts.

Graham and other GOP supporters of multifaceted immigration legislation have opposed enforcement-only approaches. They feared they would lose leverage with House conservatives if enforcement measures were not linked to other goals such as possible citizenship for illegal immigrants with longtime employment and clean criminal records. However, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said this week that the recent spending measures do not amount to a de facto House victory because legislators realize they eventually must confront the broader aspects of the immigration problem.

Democratic strategists said Congress's failure to enact a major immigration bill this year is proof of the Republican Party's ineffectiveness.

"They don't have a single accomplishment, yet they have control of the government," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), leader of his party's drive to regain control of the House this fall. He cited government findings that between 1999 and 2003, work-site enforcement operations were scaled back 95 percent by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, while the number of employers prosecuted for unlawfully hiring immigrants dropped from 182 in 1999 to four in 2003.

"I wish their actions were as tough as their rhetoric," Emanuel said.

Stalled Bills Might Have Cut Mall Rally Crowd, Some Say (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman And Allison Klein

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

In April, Jose Martinez was among the giddiest participants in a pro-immigration rally that attracted more than 100,000 demonstrators to the Mall.

Spurred by promotions on his favorite Spanish radio program, the Salvadoran-born mechanic persuaded nearly every co-worker at his Southeast Washington auto repair shop to march with him. He brought along T-shirts emblazoned with American flags for his friends to wear. And he vowed to treasure his own shirt forever "as a memory of this day."

But Thursday afternoon, while immigrants and their supporters were convening on the Mall for a reprise of the April 10 rally, Martinez, 43, was back in the auto shop, working out the dents in the door of a silver Chevrolet Monte Carlo.

DOJ_NMG_0061320

"No, I'm not going. I'm not motivated this time," said Martinez, who is a legal permanent resident but who has friends in the country illegally. "I really expected a change to the immigration law by now, but we haven't gained anything since [the spring]. . . . All I've seen is an increase in the arrests of immigrants."

It was a refrain repeated across the Washington region as immigrants sought to explain how a demonstration that organizers had predicted would mobilize hundreds of thousands fizzled into a gathering of less than 5,000 demonstrators, most from out of town. Rallies in other cities this week drew similar numbers.

Many locals who did participate Thursday appeared to be union members bused in by their leaders.

Maya Bhullar, who, like many in the crowd, wore the orange cap of the Service Employees International Union, speculated that fewer people might have shown up because a restrictive immigration bill that loomed large in the spring had stalled after winning House approval.

That legislation, which, among other measures, would make it a felony to be in the country illegally or to assist illegal immigrants, alarmed many previously apolitical immigrants. They appeared by the hundreds of thousands at rallies in cities across the country in the spring.

"I don't think people's anger has died down," said Bhullar, 31, who is a U.S. citizen of Indian descent and lives in Northwest Washington. "[But] last time our message was so much about the [House] bill."

Meanwhile, a Senate bill that would permit illegal immigrants to legalize their status after paying a fine also stalled, causing some immigrants to lose faith in rallies as engines of change.

"At the beginning, I thought [demonstrating] was positive," said Enrique Torres, 26, an Arlington resident who chose to work rather than attend the rally Thursday. "Then I realized they were increasing deportations. So it's been negative, too."

The subdued mood also seemed to have affected local Spanish-language radio shows, which had played a pivotal role in urging listeners to go to the rally in April.

"Last time, I heard about the rally everywhere -- even on TV," said Rene Garcia, 22, a Mexican construction worker living in Falls Church who attended the demonstration Thursday. "For this rally, I didn't even hear about it on the radio. I don't know what happened."

Michael Ahn Paarlsberg, 26, a Korean American living in Fairfax, said there was little promotion in the Asian media, despite outreach efforts by organizers that yielded at least a few articles about the rally in Korean-language newspapers.

Rally organizers said they were satisfied with the turnout, which they estimated at 50,000.

Jaime Contreras, chairman of the National Capital Immigration Coalition, who organized the rally, said, "We're very proud of the people that came out despite the fact that [President] Bush's scare tactics of sending [immigration agents] to our neighborhoods has put some fear in people's minds."

Contreras said advocates have shifted their focus from rallies to voter registration drives and cautioned politicians not to conclude that the movement has lost steam just because its rallies are attracting fewer demonstrators.

"If they do, they're going to be sadly mistaken come election time," he said.

Staff writers Ernesto LondoÃ±o, Josh Partlow, Nick Miroff, Tom Jackman and Karin Brulliard contributed to this report.

Boston Tests System Connecting Fingerprints To Records Of Immigration Violations (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 — Immigration officials will automatically be notified anytime the local or state police do a federal fingerprint check on a suspect who also happens to be wanted for serious immigration violations, under a new system being tested in Boston.

The automated notification is part of a Department of Homeland Security program that could expand the role that the local and state police nationwide play in the immigration enforcement effort.

To federal officials, it is a natural next step as police forces have hundreds of thousands of officers who routinely come into contact with illegal immigrants, while Immigration and Customs Enforcement has a squad of only about 6,000 criminal investigators.

“We are giving more information to more people who can act on the information,” said Robert A. Mocny, acting director of US-Visit, the Department of Homeland Security program coordinating the effort. “It only makes sense.”

But some immigration and civil liberties advocates objected.

“Once the police become viewed as immigration agents, as opposed to simply safety and law enforcement patrols, they will lose the cooperation and trust of a significant portion of the communities they serve,” said Marshall Fitz, director of advocacy at the American Immigration Lawyers Association. “That ultimately undermines all of our security interest.”

DOJ_NMG_0061321

Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program at the American Civil Liberties Union, said he was also concerned. The Homeland Security Department's records rely upon just two fingerprints, instead of 10, and are therefore more subject to error, Mr. Steinhardt said, which could result in someone's being wrongly detained on immigration charges.

"It is an unreliable system being run by a barely competent agency," Mr. Steinhardt said.

The new program has started off in a relatively modest way. When the Boston Police Department does a fingerprint check of federal criminal records for crime suspects, it will also check a Homeland Security Department database of 420,000 people who have violated immigration laws. The federal list includes people who have been previously deported from the United States or tried to enter but were denied a visa.

If the police happen to stop one of those people, both the Boston Police Department and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a division of the Homeland Security Department, will be notified. The department may then ask the Boston police to hold the person for up to 48 hours, until the federal authorities can take him into custody or otherwise begin deportation proceedings, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman said.

Eventually, as more cities and states participate, the Homeland Security Department intends to add nine million sets of fingerprints to the database to include people with less serious immigration records, like someone caught trying to cross the border from Mexico who then voluntarily returned home, Mr. Mocny said.

The local and state police in many cities, including Boston, already routinely contact Immigration and Customs Enforcement to see if suspects they have detained might also be wanted on federal immigration violations. Federal criminal databases already include some people wanted on felony immigration violations.

But the immigration-related inquiries have previously been based on a names and dates of birth, which may be forged. And the checks are not frequently done on every arrest and fingerprint check, as is now the case in Boston."You can't hide from the fingerprint," Mr. Mocny said.

Mr. Fitz, of the immigration lawyers group, said he had no objection if the fingerprints were checked for immigration violations only after an individual had been charged with another crime.

His concern, he said, is that the local police might begin to submit these kinds of requests routinely during traffic stops or patrols simply to determine if someone was in the United States legally.

William M. Casey, deputy superintendent of the Boston police, said Boston did not plan to take such a step.

"We are doing nothing differently than we were doing before last Sunday," Mr. Casey said. "We are enforcing the laws the Boston police always enforce."

Mr. Mocny said the Homeland Security Department was already moving to a 10-fingerprint system to address the potential for fingerprint mismatches. He added that he understood that this new program might provoke debate.

It is also unclear how much demand it will place on the federal immigration enforcement authorities in detaining illegal immigrants and conducting deportation proceedings.

That is why the project is being tested in Boston before being expanded nationally over the next two years.

"Eventually,'' Mr. Mocny said, "it will be all violators of all immigration laws. But we are going to give this 22 months to cook to make sure that we are getting it right."

Pa. City OKs Illegal Immigration Overhaul (AP-Y)

By Michael Rubinkam

AP, September 9, 2006

The City Council gave tentative approval Friday to an overhaul of an anti-illegal-immigration law considered to be one of the nation's toughest, hoping to put the measure on sounder legal footing.

Like the version it will replace if granted final approval Tuesday, the new ordinance punishes businesses that employ illegal immigrants and landlords who rent to them.

The revisions, however, remove much of the burden that had been placed on businesses. They soften penalties, give landlords and businesses time to correct violations and leaving it to city officials to verify workers' immigration status with the federal government.

Since the council adopted the original law in July, many municipalities around the nation have approved or considered similar measures.

Last week, the city of 31,000 residents agreed not to enforce the original law after the American Civil Liberties Union and Hispanic groups sued in federal court to overturn it. In return, the plaintiffs agreed not to seek an injunction against the city.

Under the agreement, Hazleton must give the plaintiffs at least 20 days' notice before it begins enforcing the replacement law — enough time for the ACLU to head back into court to try to stop it.

David Vaida, a civil rights lawyer who also sued the city, said the new ordinance has the same flaws as the old one.

"It is pre-empted by federal law. The United States has exclusive and sole jurisdiction over immigration," he told the council.

Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, predicted that the law will exacerbate tensions in the city by encouraging neighbors to inform on one another.

"The neighbor and co-worker snitching system will almost certainly exacerbate the polarization in the community based on race, ethnicity and national origin," he said.

Mayor Lou Barletta, however, said the law specifically forbids the city from investigating any complaint based solely on a person's ethnicity or race.

It is not clear how many illegal immigrants live in Hazleton, about 80 miles northwest of Philadelphia, but the city's Hispanic population has soared in recent years. Barletta, who proposed the ordinance after two illegal immigrants were charged with shooting and killing a man, has said the new law has already spurred many illegal immigrants to leave the city.

TAX:

Guilty Plea In $200m Tax Fraud Case (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Walter Anderson, a US telecommunications businessman, on Friday pleaded guilty to evading over $100m in taxes in biggest criminal tax fraud in US history.

Mr Anderson was indicted last year on charges that he evaded over $200m in federal income taxes over five years, partly by hiding $450m in earnings at Barclays Bank in the Channel Islands and other offshore accounts.

Prosecutors alleged he concealed his identity as owner of two telecommunications companies in the 1990s through an elaborate web of private mail boxes, including one in the Netherlands.

A search of his home in Washington, DC revealed he had created seven aliases. Officials seized manuals showing how to disguise identities, including one entitled: “Poof! How to Disappear and Create a New Identity.”

Mr Anderson was also alleged in 1999 to have failed to report investment income of $238m from investments that he derived from two companies, Gold & Appel and Iceberg Transport.

The indictment said Mr Anderson, also a widely travelled art collector, failed to file tax forms on two paintings he bought – one a $1.2m Rene Magritte work bought at a Christie’s auction and a second painting by Salvador Dali.

Appearing in an orange jumpsuit at a court in Washington, Mr Anderson admitted his guilt in a plea arrangement with government prosecutors on two counts of tax evasion and a third count of fraud.

Government prosecutors agreed to cap any sentence to 10 years. At the time of his indictment, Mr Anderson was reported to have been eligible for up to 80 years in jail.

In exchange, Mr Anderson agreed that prosecutors had enough evidence to prove that he evaded taxes worth over $100m.

While accepting the thrust of the prosecution’s case in the counts where he pleaded guilty, Mr Anderson told the court through his defence counsel, Michelle Peterson, that he disputed some of the allegations.

He said he had always intended to use some of the funds he had amassed for charitable purposes and to fund “privatisation of space travel and exploration”.

Ms Peterson sought to persuade judge Paul Friedman that there was no longer any risk that Mr Anderson would flee the country to escape sentencing.

She argued that the last year a half he had spent in jail had resulted in him being “broken down in the most unbelievably harsh conditions”.

She told the judge he needed time to complete community service, get his personal affairs in order and spend time with his parents. “I know his mother is anxious for him to clear out their garage,” she said.

Mr Friedman declined to release Mr Anderson, who continues to be held without bail. Sentencing is expected in January.

Guilty Plea In Big U.S. Tax-Evasion Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 (AP) — A telecommunications entrepreneur, Walter Anderson, pleaded guilty to tax evasion and fraud Friday in connection with what authorities said was the nation’s largest-ever criminal tax case.

DOJ_NMG_0061323

Mr. Anderson was indicted in 2005 on charges he evaded $200 million in federal and local taxes. Prosecutors said Mr. Anderson used offshore corporations and bank accounts to hide income from tax collectors.

He pleaded guilty to two counts of tax evasion and one count of fraud Friday. He admitted hiding hundreds of millions of dollars in income from the Internal Revenue Service and from Washington, D.C., tax collectors during 1998 and 1999.

Under a plea deal with prosecutors, he faces up to 10 years in prison.

Mr. Anderson started a long-distance telecommunications business in the 1980's as the industry was being deregulated. When his first company, Mid-Atlantic Telecom, merged with another company in 1992, Mr. Anderson formed corporations in the British Virgin Islands to hide the income, prosecutors said.

Authorities said Mr. Anderson used other offshore corporations to disguise his ownership in other telecommunications companies that earned more than $450 million from 1995 to 1999.

Mr. Anderson, who prosecutors said did not file federal income tax returns from 1987 to 1993, has been held without bail since his arrest. Prosecutors say he owes $170 million in federal taxes and $40 million in Washington income taxes.

In court documents, the government said Mr. Anderson could be linked to at least seven aliases and that officials seized forged identification and manuals detailing ways to create fake identification and to hide from authorities.

Among them were "Poof! How to Disappear and Create a New Identity" and "The ID Forger: Homemade Birth Certificates and Other Documents Explained," the court documents said.

Among the taxes said to be owed to Washington are use taxes, equivalent to sales taxes, on art, jewelry and wine. The indictment states that Mr. Anderson bought a painting by Salvador Dalí and several paintings by René Magritte, an 18-karat gold bracelet and more than $47,000 in fine wines, then had them shipped to a Virginia address to avoid Washington taxes.

Telecom Mogul Guilty Of Tax Scam (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Defendant Admits To $365 Million In Hidden Income

A former telecommunications tycoon accused by prosecutors of being the biggest tax cheat in U.S. history pleaded guilty yesterday in a deal that calls for him to serve no more than 10 years in prison.

Walter C. Anderson, a Washington-based businessman who amassed a fortune during the tech boom of the 1980s and 1990s, admitted to hiding $365 million in income by using aliases, shell companies, offshore tax havens, secret accounts and drop boxes in the Netherlands. He was so wealthy that he talked at one point about leasing the Russian space station Mir -- all the while dodging his taxes, officials said.

Prosecutors said Anderson avoided paying $200 million in taxes from 1995 through 1999 in what they say is the largest personal income tax evasion case brought in the United States. As part of his plea deal, Anderson agreed that the court could order restitution. But how much the government can collect is a big question: The onetime mogul, 52, who had a multimillion-dollar art collection and other trappings of success, has filed for bankruptcy.

Anderson pleaded guilty at the federal courthouse in Washington to three felony charges -- two for evading federal taxes and one for defrauding the D.C. government with a phony tax return. Among other things, Anderson admitted earning more than $126 million in 1998, a year that he claimed an income of $67,939 on his federal tax return. He paid $495 in taxes that year, authorities said.

"This case sends a strong signal to anyone thinking about going offshore to avoid taxes," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a statement. "We have stepped up our efforts to pursue high-income tax cheating, whether it takes place in the United States or overseas."

In return for his guilty plea, prosecutors dropped nine felony charges. According to the agreement, Anderson and prosecutors have settled on a maximum sentence of 10 years. In court yesterday, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman indicated that he will go along with the agreement at sentencing Jan. 16.

Anderson, rail-thin with a thinning crown of silver hair, has been jailed without bond since his arrest Feb. 26, 2005, at Dulles International Airport, where he was returning from a trip to London.

His attorneys -- including a federal public defender -- have repeatedly sought to have Anderson released on bond. They urged the judge yesterday to cut him loose until sentencing, saying Anderson needed the time to, among other tasks, clean up his aging parents' garage and file his taxes.

Prosecutors said Anderson should be kept behind bars, saying they think he still has plenty of money socked away and homes, contacts and girlfriends around the world. In searches of Anderson's Georgetown apartment during their criminal investigation, authorities found fake documents and books titled "Poof!" and "Disappear Without a Trace."

Friedman turned down Anderson's request to be freed pending sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0061324

Anderson's admission of guilt was a turnaround for a defendant who maintained his innocence and was openly scornful of the prosecutors' case. At one early hearing, he defiantly stood up to complain about the government's case.

In an interview with Washington Post reporters at the D.C. jail soon after his arrest, Anderson denied any wrongdoing and mocked the prosecution. "I don't need to steal money from the U.S. government to be successful," he said.

Even during yesterday's hearing, Anderson could be overheard complaining about prosecutors to his attorneys. But he turned down an opportunity to address the court, telling the judge, "I'll probably have a lot to say at the sentencing hearing."

Anderson grew up in Silver Spring and graduated in 1971 from W.T. Woodson High School in Fairfax. He was one of the original employees of MCI Corp. and founded a series of telecommunications companies, including Mid Atlantic Telecom Inc., Esprit Telecom Group PLC and Telco Communications Group Inc., which he sold for huge profits.

According to prosecutors, Anderson invented a detailed web of financial schemes designed to hide $450 million he made from business ventures from 1995 and 1999. He formed Gold & Appel in the British Virgin Islands and used the alias Mark Roth to hire a third party to form Iceberg Transport in Panama. He used other measures to conceal his ownership and control of these entities. He then transferred ownership of his telecom companies to offshore companies.

He did not disclose his ownership interest or income from the companies on his federal or D.C. tax forms, prosecutors said.

Anderson used some of his money to indulge his passion for private space exploration. He was an investor in a group that tried to privatize the aging Mir space station. In 1997, he founded an organization that issued grants for the search for extraterrestrial intelligence, the tracking of near-Earth asteroids and plans for a human outpost on the moon.

Anderson has said the money is gone and so are the days of private jets, 19,000-square-foot mansions and original paintings by Salvador Dali and Rene Magritte. But prosecutors doubt that Anderson's pockets are empty.

"There is enough evidence that there is money out there," Assistant U.S. Attorney Susan B. Menzer said. "There are people willing to help him."

This much was clear yesterday: Anderson can afford to pay a special assessment levied by the court. He agreed to turn over $200 within 10 days of his sentencing.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Delays Summit With Automakers (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 9, 2006

President Bush delayed a summit with the Big Three automakers, but he called a Ford Motor Co. executive as he flew here to raise funds for a Republican facing a tough Senate race.

The call from Air Force One was aimed at easing tensions in a state where economic concerns are a key issue in the upcoming congressional elections. Democrats — and Dick DeVos, the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Michigan — say the delay in scheduling the meeting shows Bush is not taking seriously the concerns of a major manufacturing sector and its employees.

"This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich. "President Bush insists on showing a lack of urgency as good paying American jobs are shipped overseas," she said.

Along the motorcade route, a half-dozen protesters, turning their backs to Bush, held a sign that read, "Mr. President, you've let us down" and urged him to meet with the automakers.

White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said Bush telephoned Bill Ford Jr., who quit as chief executive of Ford Motor Co. this week after struggling for five years to steer it toward financial stability. The company was founded by his great-grandfather.

"They are friends, and the president wanted to check in with him especially after Ford's news this week about the changes at the company," Perino said. "The Big Three meeting with the president will happen after the election since the idea of a meeting had gotten mired in politics."

On Tuesday, Ford introduced Alan Mulally, executive vice president of Boeing aerospace company, as the new president and chief executive officer of the nation's No. 2 automaker.

Bush was in Michigan for a luncheon fundraiser for Mike Bouchard, the sheriff of Oakland County in suburban Detroit, who is running against Stabenow.

The luncheon fundraiser raised $1.5 million for the Michigan Republican Party and Bouchard, who greeted Bush at the airport and rode in the motorcade to a 220-acre wooded lot that has horses and two private lakes. It is the home of Pam and

DOJ_NMG_0061325

David V. Johnson, an entrepreneur and luxury community developer who is chairman of Victor International Corp. and Bay Harbor Co.

Later, Bush traveled to Kansas City, Mo., where he raised $600,000 at another private event for Sen. Jim Talent, who is facing a difficult re-election challenge from Democratic state Auditor Claire McCaskill.

The fundraiser drew hundreds of protesters — some carrying signs that said "Bring 'em home" and "No Iran War" — to a grassy median strip of a boulevard that runs near the affluent home of Scott Ward, co-president of Russell Stover Candies Inc.

"The event is really in support of the Missouri Republican Party, so the sum total of the connection we'll have with the president is probably going to be a picture," said the host's brother, Tom Ward, a co-president of Russell Stover and longtime Republican Party member.

The White House says events at supporters' homes routinely are closed to the public. Democrats said the events were private because GOP candidates do not want to be seen campaigning in public with Bush, given his low approval ratings.

"Instead of misleading Missourians, Jim Talent should stand up and admit to being one of the president's men," said Missouri Democratic Party spokesman Jack Cardetti.

When he returned to Andrews Air Force Base, Bush shook hands on the tarmac with some Marine reservists who were among a group of 156 leaving shortly after midnight on seven-month deployment to Iraq. They are part of the 4th Civil Affairs Group, which will be helping rebuild Iraq and establish democratic institutions.

Ford Chairman Receives Call From Bush (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

DETROIT, Sept. 7 — Although he has put off a meeting with Detroit automotive leaders until after the November elections, President Bush called the chairman of Ford Motor on Friday, only days after the struggling automaker named a new chief executive.

The phone call came the same day that Ford disclosed details of its employment agreement with the new chief, Alan R. Mulally, the former Boeing Company executive whose appointment was announced this week.

Ford said Mr. Mulally would receive a salary of $2 million a year, plus a $7.5 million signing bonus. He will also receive $11 million to offset performance awards and stock options that he forfeited by leaving Boeing, where he was chief executive of the commercial airplanes business.

Mr. Bush's call to the Ford chairman, William Clay Ford Jr., came as the President flew to the Detroit area, where he attended a fund-raising event north of Detroit for Mike Bouchard, the Republican candidate for the United States Senate. Mr. Bouchard is challenging Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Democrat who is completing her first term.

During the call, Mr. Bush discussed the changes taking place at Ford, which is struggling to hang on to second place in the American car market. As soon as next week, Ford will announce new steps under its restructuring plan, called the Way Forward, which are expected to include more plant closings, job cuts, and buyout offers. Ford's directors are scheduled to meet Thursday to consider the moves.

White House officials said Mr. Bush phoned Mr. Ford because the two are friends. Mr. Ford contributed $2,000 to Mr. Bush's re-election campaign in 2003, federal election records show, but has supported both Democrats and Republicans in other races.

Mr. Bush, on the call, reiterated that a long-sought meeting with leaders of the three Detroit auto companies would take place after the elections. Mr. Bush does not want the meeting to become "mired in politics," said a White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

A Ford spokesman declined to discuss the nature of the conversation but the subjects were summarized in a report from the White House.

The president was originally set to meet with Detroit automotive leaders, including Mr. Ford, in May. The session, at which the executives hoped to discuss issues like the environment, was put off two more times after that.

The White House said the cancellations were not meant as disrespectful, but the cancellations drew criticism from both Michigan's Democratic governor, Jennifer M. Granholm, and the state's Republican gubernatorial candidate, Richard Devos Jr.

This week, with the President's trip to Michigan approaching, the White House announced the meeting would take place this fall.

Now, Ford Motor will presumably be represented at the meeting by its new chief executive, Mr. Mulally. In a regulatory filing Friday, Ford disclosed that Mr. Mulally signed his employment agreement a week ago, although his appointment was not announced until Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0061326

His $2 million salary is more than double the $825,000 he received at Boeing last year, where his total compensation was $9.96 million, including his long-term incentive awards.

Mr. Ford has not drawn a salary for more than a year, vowing not to accept one until Ford ends its losses in North America. The chief executive at General Motors, Rick Wagoner, receives $2.2 million a year in salary.

The news about Ford came as its closest rival, Toyota, broke ground in York Township, Mich., on its new North American design center. The center, which will also include a crash testing plant, was a victory for the state's governor, Ms. Granholm.

Her administration pushed an incentive package through the Legislature, and went to court so that Toyota, instead of a local developer, could obtain the 700-acre site.

The $187 million plant is scheduled to open in two years. It is scheduled to have 400 employees by 2010. Toyota's North American technical center is in Ann Arbor, about 20 minutes north of the York Township site, once home to a state mental institution.

Hi Bill Ford, It's George Calling (FREEP)

By Justin Hyde

Detroit Free Press, September 9, 2006

Raising money for a Senate candidate may have been President George W. Bush's motivation for visiting Michigan on Friday, but he spent at least a few minutes discussing Detroit's auto industry.

Bush called Ford Motor Co. Chairman Bill Ford to personally deliver a pledge to meet with the heads of the Detroit automakers after Election Day, aiming yet again to calm the tempest stirred by Michigan Democrats over the lack of a date for the meeting.

According to the White House, Bush called Ford from Air Force One en route to a fund-raiser for Republican Senate candidate Mike Bouchard at a home in Clarkston to talk about Ford's hiring of a new chief executive, former Boeing executive Alan Mulally, earlier this week.

"While the White House maintains regular contact with the Big Three, the president reiterated he's looking forward to meeting with the Big Three executives after the elections," White House spokesman Alex Conant said.

The call lasted several minutes, Conant said, and Bush talked with Ford because the two are "friends." Spokesmen for the two friends declined to divulge any more details about their chat.

All three Detroit automakers -- Ford, General Motors Corp. and the Chrysler Group -- have felt a little chagrined ever since the possibility of a meeting with the president on trade and energy issues first surfaced in April. The original date of May 18 hadn't been confirmed by the White House, and when that date fell through and a new one couldn't be hammered out among three globe-trotting executives and the leader of the free world, the issue began to fester.

GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner told the Free Press earlier this week that the automakers wanted to meet with Bush to discuss issues affecting all of U.S. manufacturers, not just the auto industry.

"Would I have liked to have done it sooner? Sure. But, we'll do it as soon as he's able to schedule it," Wagoner said.

Many Democrats, including Gov. Jennifer Granholm, accused Bush of ignoring problems facing Detroit's automakers on several fronts, including health care and trade. Bush suggested in some interviews and comments that the Detroit automakers needed to be more competitive.

The lack of a meeting date suggested to some Washington operatives that the administration did not want to highlight struggling corporations and massive job cuts just before an election, despite the political trouble that the delay created in Michigan.

Last month, Republican gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos blistered the White House over the delay, while Bouchard had said he was pleased Bush would meet with the automakers "because the issues facing our state are too important to be used for political gain."

"If the president doesn't convene a White House meeting on the subject most on Michigan residents' minds, it becomes a fair game for that to become a Michigan partisan political issue," said Craig Ruff of the Lansing-based Public Sector Consultants. "It has not made sense to Michigan that the White House has seemed indifferent."

The administration attempted to lance the political boil by saying earlier this week it had agreed with the automakers to push the meeting back to an unspecified date after Nov. 7, officially pledging for the first time to have Bush sit down with the executives.

But that pledge has not been sufficient for some. As the president's motorcade passed a group of protesters outside the Flint airport Friday, Art Reyes and fellow union members turned their backs.

DOJ_NMG_0061327

"I find it disgusting that the president doesn't have time to talk with executives or workers affected by his economic and trade policies but would go to a fund-raiser where they were trying to make a million dollars," said Reyes, an electrician at Delphi Corp.'s Flint East plant, whose workforce has been decimated by the firm's bankruptcy.

Democrats have continued to harp on the move, saying it reflects the administration's priorities.

"This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow, whose defeat is the target of Bush's fund-raising visit.

Ruff said the administration's moves could allow DeVos to claim some credit for pushing the White House to act, while defusing an issue that Democrats were using to their advantage.

"I don't think it has the traction that it did when there was no outreach to auto manufacturers," he said.

One other question remains about the meeting with Bush: Now that Bill Ford has given up the CEO job, will he be replaced or joined at the get-together by Mulally?

Bush Calls Ford Amid Criticism (DNw)

By Charlie Cain And David Shepardson

DNEWS, September 9, 2006

CLARKSTON -- President Bush placed a midflight phone call to Ford Motor Co. Executive Chairman Bill Ford on his way to Michigan on Friday, but it did little to douse the firestorm of criticism from state Democrats that the White House has turned a deaf ear to Detroit's automakers.

Bush, who traveled to Michigan to help raise money for the uphill U.S. Senate campaign of Oakland County Sheriff Mike Bouchard, made the call amid mounting criticism that he has refused to schedule a meeting with executives from the Big Three to discuss domestic carmakers' problems.

White House spokesman Alex Conant said the president called Ford because the two men are friends.

"He looks forward to meeting with the Big Three CEOs after the election," Conant said. Bush and Ford also talked about the recent hiring of Alan Mulally as the new CEO and president of Ford.

Bush told Ford he wanted to delay the meeting until after Nov. 7 to "to avoid getting it mired in politics," Conant said.

U.S. Rep. John Dingell, D-Dearborn, who has repeatedly criticized the president for his dealings with domestic automakers, was not impressed by the phone call.

"The auto industry wonders who's he working for: us or the foreign automakers," Dingell said.

Ford Motor Co. spokesman Josh Gottheimer said the company doesn't comment on Bill Ford's private phone calls. GM and Chrysler declined to talk about the meeting.

U.S. Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Lansing, who faces Bouchard in the November election, was also critical of the president.

"This isn't about phone calls to friends, it's about President Bush sitting down with the heads of a crucial American industry and figuring out how to provide the support they need," Stabenow said.

At Friday's groundbreaking for the $187 million Toyota Technical Center expansion on 690 acres in York Township, Gov. Jennifer Granholm said it is "time for state and frankly federal government to step up to save American jobs."

"I would encourage the president of the United States, who is in Michigan today, to meet me to have an industrial policy at the federal level that supports these manufacturers."

Bush, she said, "needs to be a hands-on player and not a hands-off player."

John Truscott, a spokesman for Republican gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos, said the phone call between Bush and Ford was a good sign. DeVos would like a meeting of the president and automakers to occur sooner, but said he didn't think this would be a significant issue in the election.

He said Granholm was using this as an issue "to distract from the fact that Michigan's lost 100,000 jobs under her watch."

The president was the drawing card for a $2,100-a-person fundraiser at the Clarkston home of David Johnson, chairman of Victor International Corp. More than 500 people attended the reception and the Bouchard campaign said the event netted them more than $1 million.

The fundraiser was closed to the media and the president made no public remarks during his visit.

On the drive from Flint's Bishop International Airport to Clarkston, the president's motorcade passed by supporters and protesters who lined the streets. Some applauded, some faced the other way showing the president their backs. "God bless you Mr. President" read one banner, while another proclaimed: "Let's try Democracy here."

As he concluded his 3 1/2 -hour visit to Michigan, Bush met with the Mattawan Little League girls softball team on the tarmac beside Air Force One.

The team, from a town of 2,500 west of Kalamazoo, captured the world championship last month, capping a 23-0 season.

DOJ_NMG_0061328

The girls, ages 11 to 13, and three of their coaches had their pictures taken with Bush, who autographed the straps on the championship medallions.

"He said 'Congratulations, it's a great accomplishment' and stuff like that," said Bekka Crow, a 13-year-old left fielder. "It was awesome. I never thought that I would meet the president of the United States.

Silencing A Skeptic (NSWK)

Newsweek, September 9, 2006

As the White House pressed its case for war against Iraq in the fall of 2002, one senior GOP lawmaker agonized about what to do. In this exclusive excerpt from 'Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War,' a new book by Michael Isikoff and David Corn, is the previously untold story of how Dick Armey, who was then House majority leader and a silent skeptic about Iraq, succumbed to Vice President Dick Cheney's pressure—much to Armey's later regret.

The president's message was direct. There was no time to wait. The showdown with Saddam Hussein, the dictator of Iraq, had to start right away.

It was the morning of September 4, 2002, and George W. Bush had summoned eighteen senior members of the House and Senate to the Cabinet Room of the White House. When the lawmakers took their seats at the imposing oval mahogany table, they were given copies of a letter from the president. "America and the civilized world face a critical decision in the months ahead," it began. "The decision is how to disarm an outlaw regime that continues to possess and develop weapons of mass destruction." Bush told the assembled leaders he needed a quick vote in Congress on a resolution that would grant him the authority to take on Saddam—perhaps with military action. He wanted this vote within six weeks—before Congress left town so members could campaign for reelection. It was the start of an extraordinary public relations campaign by the White House to persuade the American people—and the world—that Saddam was such a pressing threat that war might be the only option.

Listening to the president, Senator Majority Leader Tom Daschle felt trapped. House and Senate members were gearing up for the final stretch of the campaign—with control of the Senate up for grabs. Bush was informing them that the national debate would now focus on Iraq, not health care, not tax cuts, not the environment or anything the Democrats wanted to talk about. Daschle pressed Bush on why there was a need to move quickly. Sure, Saddam was a problem that had to be addressed. But what was new? How immediate was the threat? Where was the tangible evidence?

As he did so, Daschle was thinking of one man: Karl Rove. The previous January, Rove, Bush's master strategist, had telegraphed his intention to use terrorism and national security issues to hammer Democrats in the fall campaign. "We can go to the country on this issue," Rove had proclaimed at a Republican gathering, because the American people "trust the Republican Party to do a better job of strengthening America's military might and thereby protecting America." Daschle wondered whether Bush was cynically pushing the Iraq threat as a campaign gambit.

The day before, Daschle had attended a breakfast with Bush in the president's private dining room with Cheney, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Senate minority leader Trent Lott, and House minority leader Dick Gephardt. And he had put the same questions to the president. Wouldn't it be better, he asked, to postpone this until after the election and take politics out of the question? Bush had looked at Cheney who shot the president what Daschle would describe as a "half-smile." Then Bush turned back to Daschle and said, "We just have to do it now." That was it, Daschle would later recall: "He didn't answer the question." But Bush's sidelong glance to Cheney told Daschle that the two of them had thought this through.

Now in the Cabinet Room, within a larger group of legislators, Daschle received no more satisfying a reply, as Bush insisted that the House and Senate proceed quickly. "The issue isn't going away," Bush told the congressional leaders. "You can't let it linger."

****

Daschle was not the only congressional leader in the White House feeling uneasy that morning. Although it never got reported at the time, the most critical comments came from a Republican leader who rarely weighed in on national security issues: House Majority Leader Dick Armey, the number two Republican in the House. A month earlier, Armey, a Texan, had bluntly voiced his own misgivings about a war against Iraq. While campaigning in Iowa for a GOP congressional candidate, Armey told reporters that Saddam was "a blowhard." But as long as the Iraqi dictator didn't bother anybody outside his own borders, Armey had said, he couldn't see any basis for invading Iraq: "We Americans don't make unprovoked attacks."

Armey's Iowa comments had generated a brief flurry of media attention. They also upset the White House. Dan Bartlett, a deputy to White House communications director Karen Hughes, called Terry Holt, Armey's press secretary, and complained. "It isn't helpful for Armey to be out there speaking out against the president," Bartlett said, according to Holt. Armey dropped the issue. Armey was a plain-speaking, free-market-over-all economist, with an endless passion for country music. Neither he—nor anyone else in Washington—considered Armey a foreign policy wizard. But the notion of going to war with Iraq made no sense to him. He assumed the administration's war talk was merely bluster on Bush's part—an effort to intimidate Saddam into accepting the return of United Nations weapons inspectors.

DOJ_NMG_0061329

But in the Cabinet Room , watching Bush pressure his congressional colleagues, Armey realized that Bush was serious, that he seemed committed to launching a war and overthrowing Saddam. He thought of another president from Texas, Lyndon Johnson, and what a reckless war had done to his administration. Armey, who had not said anything else about Iraq after his Iowa outburst, decided this was the moment to speak his mind directly to Bush. "Mr. President," he said, "if you go in there, you're likely to be stuck in a quagmire that will endanger your domestic agenda for the rest of your presidency."

As he explained his thinking, Armey got worked up and ended his comments with a bowdlerized line from Shakespeare he had gleaned from a country music song: "Our fears make cowards of us all." What did he mean by this? Armey believed that Bush and other administration officials were over-reacting to the country's post-9/11 fears. It was as if the Iraq warriors were gripped with what he later called a "he-man macho psychosis where they felt the need to go out and shoot somebody to show you're the tough guy on the block." Armey could tell his comments were not going over well. "I was the skunk in the garden party," he said later.

When Armey finished, Cheney spoke. It would be a good idea, the vice president said curtly, if Armey would not dissent from the president's position in public. Frankly, Armey replied, I didn't realize there was a specific White House position yet. Then Bush, according to Armey, "asked me if I would withhold any public comments until I had all the briefings. So I could understand how necessary this was." The president was saying, wait until you've seen the intelligence. That would prove why urgent action—maybe even a war—was required.

Had Armey spoken up after leaving the Cabinet Room, he might have sparked a ruckus that could have complicated the White House's upcoming efforts. But out of deference to Bush and Cheney, he agreed to hold his fire. "I won't speak publicly about this again," Armey promised the president, "until I'm fully briefed."*

Upon exiting the meeting, the congressional leaders stood on the White House driveway and issued brief remarks for the assembled reporters. Senator John McCain said Bush had made a "convincing case" for action. House Speaker Dennis Hastert commented that he expected Congress would vote on a resolution before the elections. House minority leader Dick Gephardt, who during the meeting had indicated he was willing to work with Bush to convince Americans that Saddam's WMDs were a real danger, said that Bush had to demonstrate to the public that "this is something that we need to do and to take seriously." Daschle, more guarded, repeated the concerns he had raised inside: "What new information exists? What has changed in recent months or years?" He added that he was "hoping for more information and greater clarity" in the weeks ahead. Armey walked by the TV cameras, saying nothing. But he still had his questions. Why a war? Why now?

****

By late September, the White House was stepping up the pressure. Nearly every day, administration officials were trekking up to Capitol Hill to offer briefings, hoping to coax unsure lawmakers and bolster those already aboard. They would begin citing new claims— about Saddam providing chemical weapons training for Al Qaeda and building a fleet of mobile biological weapons labs. At the same time, Bush seemed to be viewing the cause in stark and personal terms.

On the afternoon of September 26, 2002, Bush was at a Houston fundraiser for Republican senatorial candidate John Cornyn. Surrounded by old friends from Texas, he made his most bellicose public comments about Saddam yet. There would be "no discussion, no debate, no negotiation" with the Iraqi dictator. He repeated the standard litany: Saddam had tortured his own citizens, gassed the Kurds, invaded his neighbors: "There's no doubt his hatred is mainly directed at us. There's no doubt he can't stand us." But it was one particular line in this speech that would grab worldwide attention: "After all, this is a guy that tried to kill my dad at one time."

Bush was referring to a plot by a group of Iraqis and Kuwaitis who had been arrested walking in the Kuwaiti dessert one night in April 1993. They were later charged by the Kuwaiti government with conspiring to assassinate George H.W. Bush with a car bomb during a ceremonial visit the former president and his family had made to Kuwait that month.

The Kuwaitis rested their case on the discovery of a car bomb and a confession made the by alleged ringleader, Wali al-Ghazali, after four days in Kuwaiti custody. But much about the case was hazy. Amnesty International questioned whether al-Ghazali had been tortured—a practice not unheard of in Kuwaiti jails. A classified CIA report, leaked at the time to the Boston Globe, expressed skepticism about the Kuwaiti government's claims, noting that Kuwait may have "cooked the books." No testimony or documents ever tied Saddam to the plot. "I had no evidence of any direct order" by Saddam, the U.S. ambassador at the time, Edward (Skip) Gnehm, acknowledged in a 2006 interview (although Gnehm, and the Clinton administration, endorsed the Kuwaiti verdict of Iraqi complicity.)

The fact that Bush was pointing to the incident nine years later to explain his current policy made some members of Congress uncomfortable. Armey later said he "just cringed" when he read about the president's comment. "Wow," he remarked to his wife, "I hope that's not what this is all about."

DOJ_NMG_0061330

****

At one point, other members of Congress were able to witness Bush's intense feelings about Saddam up close. At a breakfast with a few congressional leaders in late September, Bush expressed exasperation when the issue of a diplomatic settlement arose. Saddam had shown his contempt for the United States, he told the legislators. There was no use in talking to him. “Do you want to know what the foreign policy of Iraq is to the United States is?” Bush asked angrily. The president then answered his own question by raising his middle finger and thrusting it inches in front Senator Daschle's face, according to a witness. “F--k the United States!" Bush continued. "That’s what it is—and that’s why we’re going to get him!"

****

"Trust me on this, Dick," Vice President Dick Cheney told House Majority Leader Dick Armey. “When I get done with this briefing, you’re going to be with me.”

It was an afternoon late in September, and Armey had been invited over to the vice president’s small hideaway office in the U.S. Capitol. This was the briefing Bush had promised Armey three weeks earlier. Ever since then, Armey had bowed to the president’s wishes and not said anything in public about his doubts about the Bush's stand. But the White House understood Armey’s importance. He was the number two Republican in the House. If he broke ranks, that would be a problem. So Cheney was dispatched to do the job himself.

Armey thought Cheney’s opening remark was odd: "He didn't say you're going to be with us. He didn't say you're going to be with the president. He said you're going to be with me."

Over the next half hour, Cheney, surrounded by aides, pointed to pictures of the aluminum tubes, showed overhead images of nuclear sites supposedly under construction, displayed drawings of mobile biological labs and photographs of UAVs that could hit Israel and spread mass death. He talked about the "associations" and "relationships" between Saddam and al Qaeda. He noted that the Iraqis could slip miniaturized biological weapons (that fit in suitcases) to terrorists, who could bring them into the United States and kill thousands.

As Armey listened to Cheney and stared at the photos, it occurred to him that he couldn't really see anything in the pictures. They were aerial shots of buildings and other sites. Who knew what was in those buildings? Armey realized he had to rely on what Cheney was telling him. "It wasn't very convincing," Armey later recalled. “If I had gotten the same briefing from President Clinton or Al Gore, I probably would have said, 'Ah, bulls--t.' But you don't do that with your own people." He assumed Cheney was leveling him; it never occurred to Armey that the vice president was not telling him the whole story.

Armey asked few questions at the briefing; he didn't challenge Cheney on any point. As the briefing concluded, Armey thanked Cheney cordially and promised to mull over the matter. He didn’t commit to voting for the resolution. But he was coming around.

****

As the White House stepped up the heat, Armey was being muscled by his own aides. His chief of staff laid it out for him: "This war is going to happen with your or without you". The train was leaving the station—no matter what he said or did. Armey concluded, he later said, that he could “participate in the process and give it guidance or I could be a cranky voice on the outside and lose control.” Armey decided to get on the train. He even agreed to introduce the Iraq resolution on the floor of the House.

****

After a week of debating, on October 10, the House was poised to voted on the legislation that would grant Bush the power to use military force "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and to "enforce all relevant" UN Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq.

Armey, who had questioned the need for a war and Bush's motivations, gave the final emotional address before the members voted. Armey echoed the arguments that Cheney had made to him two weeks earlier. He talked about how Saddam with his “ongoing working relationships with a myriad of evil terrorist organizations” could provide them with biological weapons that would be concealed in suitcases that could be left “in a train depot, a service station, an airport.” He declared that Saddam could attack Israel at any time and “to me, an attack on Israel is an attack on America.” Armey closed his remarks with an impassioned plead to the president to use his new power wisely Choking up with tears, Armey referred to American troops and said, “Mr. President, we trust to you the best we have to give.

The measure passed easily in the House on a 296 to 133 vote, with all Republicans but six voting for the measure. The Democrats split, with 126 voting nay, and 81 siding with Bush. (The next day, the Senate voted 77 to 23 for the resolution, with Daschle too casting his vote with the president.) .

Armey had succumbed to Cheney's pressure. He had decided to be the good soldier, the loyal partisan. But this vote weighed upon him. For weeks afterward, he would agonize about it and try to convince himself that he had not actually voted for a war. He wanted to believe that he had merely given Bush the option to use military force, to strengthen the president's hand in pursuing a diplomatic solution to the Saddam problem. “I’ll tell my grandchildren that," he later said. "I’ll split that hair until hell freezes over." But Armey suspected he was lying to himself. In December of that year, he would be driving along a stretch of Texas highway when a country song would come on about a fellow who looked in the mirror and saw a stranger. The line hit him hard. He had voted for the war against his better instincts, Armey now thought, and he had become that stranger. Disappointed with himself, Armey was thankful he had a year ago decided to leave the House at the end of this term. Six years later, the vote on Iraq still weighed on him—one of the biggest regrets of his public life.

DOJ_NMG_0061331

From "HUBRIS: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War" by Michael Isikoff and David Corn. Copyright © 2006. Available from Crown Publishers, a division of Random House, Inc.

Join Michael Isikoff for a Live Talk at noon ET on Wed., Sept. 13, 2006

The Affluent Soon Will Be Paying More For Medicare (MCT)

By Tony Pugh

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - After 41 years of charging most older Americans the same price for the same care, Medicare will require affluent seniors to pay higher monthly premiums for coverage of doctors' visits, diagnostic tests and outpatient hospital care beginning in 2007.

A little-known provision of the 2003 Medicare Modernization Act calls for an estimated 1.5 million seniors to face premium hikes ranging from 10 to 55 percent over the next three years if they earn at least $80,000 a year, or $160,000 for married couples. Seniors who earn more than $200,000 and couples with incomes over $400,000 will see their so-called "Part B" premiums rise the most.

The move, designed to help shore up Medicare's shaky finances, has enraged many because it was adopted without public debate. A Republican-led conference committee added the measure to the Medicare bill even though neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate version contained it.

Medicare, the national health plan for the elderly and people with disabilities, faces an uncertain future due to rising health-care costs, a growing number of beneficiaries who utilize more services and a dwindling tax base to support the program.

The premium increases are expected to boost revenue by about $7.7 billion from 2007 to 2011, and $20.8 billion from 2007 to 2016.

The 2007 "Medicare and You" handbook, which will be mailed to all beneficiaries in October, will explain the changes. The Social Security Administration will mail out reminders in November.

Outgoing Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan said that gradually increasing the share that high-income beneficiaries paid was necessary to sustain the program.

"We don't want people to pay a large share of their income for their Medicare benefits, but we also want to make sure these benefits are available for everyone for many years to come," he said.

Senior advocacy groups such as AARP, the Medicare Rights Center and the Senior Citizens League oppose the change. They say high-income beneficiaries paid more into Medicare during their working lives and shouldn't have to pay more now. They also argue that the higher rates will dissuade seniors from seeking jobs.

Even more troubling, they say, is that Congress increased the premiums without public debate.

"This was slipped in in the dead of night behind closed doors," said Robert Hayes, the director of the Medicare Rights Center.

Others worry that the new premiums could lead healthier, wealthier seniors to depart the Part B program, leading to higher costs for those who remain. "With fewer people in it, the price has to go up to sustain the system," said Shannon Benton, the executive director of the Senior Citizens League. "Our fear is it will increase premiums for even the lower-income people."

McClellan said the added expense could cause up to 50,000 seniors to leave the program next year and even more after that. But he said their exodus wouldn't alter the program's risk pool enough to increase the cost of coverage dramatically.

Other opponents of the move say the premium increases don't address the real problem of rising health-care costs but merely shift the burden of paying for them.

"Continually shifting the cost onto the people is not the answer," said David Certner, the legislative policy director at AARP. "We need to figure out why we're spending so much more as a nation on health care and our health outcomes are no better than average."

Medicare and Social Security enjoy great popularity and political support because of their themes of universal coverage. Medicare advocates fear that the income-related rate hikes could chip away at that foundation, making it easier for Medicare opponents to further erode program benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0061332

"The beauty of these programs is you have everybody paying in and everybody getting benefits," Certner said. "If you make (Medicare) less valuable to some people, there's more of a chance that they won't want to be in the program and that they won't want to support the program as well."

The income thresholds that trigger the higher premium rates will be adjusted for inflation each year. President Bush's 2007 budget proposal calls for eliminating those adjustments, however. Doing so could nearly double the number of affected seniors to 8 percent of beneficiaries by 2016, McClellan said.

Seniors who drop their Part B coverage can re-enroll later but must pay penalties to make up for premiums they missed, McClellan said.

Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., has introduced legislation to repeal the rate hikes, but the bill has stalled in a House committee.

Medicare premiums are updated annually under a formula set by statute. The law requires that Part B beneficiaries pay 25 percent of the program's premium costs; the federal government pays the other 75 percent.

In 2006, beneficiaries' Part B premiums were $88.50 a month. Medicare officials expect that to rise to $98.40 when they announce the 2007 rates later this month.

Seniors who earn $80,000 to $100,000 a year - and married couples with incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 - will pay an even higher rate, about 28.3 percent of the total premium cost. That works out to roughly $111.38 per month based on Medicare projections. In 2008, those same beneficiaries will pay 31.6 percent of total premium costs, and 35 percent in 2009.

Individuals who earn $100,000 to $150,000 - and married couples with incomes of $200,000 to $300,000 - will see their premium costs increase by 25 percent - roughly 8.3 percent a year - from 2007 to 2009. Their 2007 Part B premiums will increase to roughly $131.06.

Individuals earning $150,000 to $200,000 - and couples with incomes of $300,000 to $400,000 - will face premium increases of 40 percent - about 13.3 percent a year - from 2007 to 2009. That works out to a 2007 premium of roughly $150.74 a month.

Individuals who earn $200,000 or more and couples who earn more than $400,000 will face the largest increases. Their Part B premiums will jump 55 percent over the next three years, about 18.3 percent a year. That works out to a premium of roughly $170.42 in 2007 based on current Medicare projections.

Shuttle, Delayed By Faulty Sensor, Will Try Again Saturday (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Sept. 8 — NASA will try on Saturday for a fifth time to launch the space shuttle Atlantis after a faulty fuel tank sensor forced managers to call off Friday's attempt with the six astronauts already on board.

The effort on Saturday, scheduled for 11:14 a.m., will be the shuttle's last chance before the end of the month to lift off for an 11-day mission to resume construction of the International Space Station.

Weather forecasters said conditions at the Kennedy Space Center here should be very good on Saturday morning, with only a slight chance of showers.

The sensor problem that interrupted Friday's countdown, just 45 minutes before liftoff, was a familiar one. The shuttle Discovery's mission in July 2005 — the first since the 2003 Columbia disaster — was delayed two weeks while engineers swapped fuel tanks and wrestled with a faulty sensor. Since then, NASA has been using newer versions of the sensors and putting them under closer scrutiny for flaws.

Early Friday morning, an engine cutoff sensor inside the giant external tank failed a routine test as technicians loaded more than 500,000 pounds of liquid hydrogen and liquid oxygen. The sensor is one of four in the liquid hydrogen section of the tank that monitor the level of fuel.

If the fuel tanks were to run unexpectedly low during ascent, the sensors would set off a controlled shutdown of the engines so they did not run on empty, which could result in a disastrous explosion. Malfunctioning sensors could also cause the engines to cut off prematurely, endangering the chance to reach orbit.

NASA rules state that if a single cutoff sensor fails, engineers need to drain the fuel tank and verify that all the sensors are working as they go dry. If the other sensors and system work as expected then or during refueling, the Atlantis could be cleared to launch with three of four working sensors on Saturday.

"We feel very good that we really need only three of those engine sensors to work," N. Wayne Hale Jr., the director of the shuttle program, said at a news conference. "If everything is performing as expected and we just have one sensor that continues to be a bad actor, we'll launch tomorrow."

DOJ_NMG_0061333

If the Atlantis misses this last launching opportunity, it will have to wait until at least late September or early October for another chance, and that would require changing a requirement for daylight launchings. After the Columbia disaster, NASA was required to limit launchings to daytime so photographs could be taken of potentially damaging debris from the external fuel tank, the type that damaged and doomed the Columbia.

Any launching after Saturday and before the end of the month would conflict with Russia's plan to launch a Soyuz spacecraft on Sept. 18 to carry a new crew to the space station and to return the laboratory's departing crew on Sept. 29.

Russian and American space officials have agreed that if the Atlantis launches on Saturday, it must leave the station on the day of the Soyuz launching instead of the day before, as had previously been planned.

Construction of the half-built space station stopped when shuttles were grounded because of the Columbia accident. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is eager to resume building the orbiting outpost by having the Atlantis take up a 30,000-pound girder section that includes a new set of solar power arrays.

Before Friday's problem with the fuel tank sensor, the flight of the Atlantis had been delayed for nearly two weeks by a lightning bolt that struck the launching pad; by Tropical Storm Ernesto; and by an erratic electrical reading in one of three fuel cells that produces electricity and water for shuttles in flight.

Last-Ditch Launch Attempt (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Atlantis could go up this morning. If not, the mission would be delayed for weeks.

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — After nearly two weeks of delays caused by bad weather and faulty electrical equipment, NASA on Friday scheduled a last-ditch attempt to launch the space shuttle Atlantis today at 11:15 a.m.

If the space agency can't get the shuttle off the pad, the launch will have to be put off for weeks, increasing the scheduling pressure on NASA as it works to finish construction of the International Space Station before the shuttle is retired in 2010.

The launch window closes after today because a later launch would conflict with the arrival at the space station of a Russian Soyuz craft, which is carrying a new crew.

Even if Atlantis launches on schedule, it will be undocking from the space station only 12 hours or so before the arrival of the Soyuz flight.

Atlantis' Friday liftoff was called off because of a balky fuel sensor.

The fuel sensor is one of four engine-cutoff sensors designed to shut down the shuttle's main engines when the fuel level gets low. One sensor gave a bad reading during a test early Friday, showing the tank was full when it was supposed to show empty.

A bad sensor could shut an engine down early, preventing the shuttle from reaching orbit, a potential disaster for the crew. It could also fail to shut down the engines when the fuel ran low, which would destroy the engine.

Backup sensors are designed to prevent those things from happening. The launch of Discovery in July — the first shuttle launch after Columbia was destroyed on reentry in 2003 — was delayed by a similar problem. Discovery finally took off when the sensor corrected itself.

After that incident, NASA adopted a requirement that in case of a similar problem, a launch be delayed at least a day so mission managers would not be making decisions in the heat of a countdown.

On Friday, a number of mission managers were ready to waive the rule and launch anyway.

The final decision to scrub came after a representative of the astronaut office objected during a closed-door meeting of the Mission Management Team, which has final launch authority.

Atlantis was originally scheduled to launch Aug. 27, but a lightning strike to the pad and the approach of Tropical Storm Ernesto forced delays. Next came an electrical short in a pump motor connected to one of three fuel cells supplying electricity for the craft.

NASA officials decided this week that the craft could still launch because the short did not pose a safety threat.

Atlantis is carrying 17 tons of construction equipment in its payload bay for the space station. Its 11-day mission includes three spacewalks to install a new truss on the station, as well as solar power arrays that will double the amount of power produced by the station.

*

john.johnson@latimes.com

Atlantis Launch Scrubbed As Fuel Gauge Issues Persist (USAT)

By Traci Watson, Usa Today

DOJ_NMG_0061334

USA Today, September 9, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL — A persistent fuel-gauge problem that NASA engineers thought they had finally solved cropped up again today, forcing space officials to cancel the launch of space shuttle Atlantis less than an hour before liftoff.

The launch was rescheduled for Saturday at 11:15 a.m. ET. Otherwise, NASA will have to wait until Sept. 29 at the earliest for the next launch opportunity.

The hatch already had been sealed on Atlantis' crew compartment in preparation for a 11:41 a.m. ET blastoff when launch director Michael Leinbach came onto the radio at 10:54 a.m. ET to break the news. He told the six astronauts that technicians will drain the shuttle's fuel tank and prepare for a possible launch Saturday.

"We're going to detank this vehicle, come back in tomorrow, fill back up and see how (the sensors) behave and see if we can get more confidence in that system for tomorrow's attempt," Leinbach said. "We ought to feel good about the attempt we made today."

"We understand, and we concur 100%," said Atlantis commander Brent Jett. "It's the right thing to do, and coming out here today we got a good check, at least as far as we could get, on all the systems."

The crew, also including pilot Chris Ferguson, mission specialists Joe Tanner, Dan Burbank, Heidemarie Stefanyshyn-Piper and Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean, already had been strapped into their seats for several hours when the decision was made.

"We had a lot of discussion. ... We followed the rules," Leinbach told the crew. "Ought to feel good that we did that." In order to fly, NASA would have to waive a rule allowing the shuttle to launch with one malfunctioning sensor only after draining the tank and refilling it again the next day.

Atlantis' launch, originally scheduled for Aug. 27, has been delayed by a lightning strike, a tropical storm and a troubling reading from one of the spacecraft's fuel cells.

The latest problem cropped up before dawn this morning as technicians filled the shuttle's giant orange fuel tank with liquid hydrogen and liquid oxygen, the fuels that power the ship as it hurls itself into orbit. During routine tests, technicians sent commands that should have caused the four hydrogen gauges to indicate a low fuel level. But one sensor improperly indicated plenty of fuel.

An incorrect fuel-gauge reading also caused the postponement of the 2005 launch of shuttle Discovery, the first mission after shuttle Columbia disintegrated on its way home in 2003. Problems with the fuel gauge also led NASA to delay the launch of the second flight after the accident. That mission eventually launched in July.

A major fuel-gauge malfunction could be catastrophic. The gauges are supposed to tell the engines to shut down if the fuel tank becomes empty prematurely. Otherwise, the engine could explode or a fire could erupt. On the other hand, if the gauges needlessly signal an engine shutdown despite plenty of fuel, the shuttle could fail to reach orbit and be forced to do a risky emergency landing.

NASA officials said this spring that they thought they had traced the problem to a batch of gauges that had a defect in the connection between the gauge and its wires. That led them to replace the sensors on the tank for the Atlantis mission and the tank that flew on the July shuttle mission.

For years, the agency's launch rules said that all four gauges must be working for the shuttle to be cleared for liftoff. In 2005, managers decided to bend the rule to allow for a launch if only three of the four gauges were working correctly, as long as the failed gauge was behaving in a way consistent with engineers' explanations for what could be wrong.

"We feel very good that we really need only three of those engine sensors to work," Wayne Hale, shuttle program manager, said at a news conference. "If everything is performing as expected and we just have one sensor that continues to be a bad actor, we?ll launch tomorrow."

A launch rule written in June requires NASA to drain the tank and refill it before launching with one malfunctioning sensor. Yet at a meeting this morning, many NASA managers voted to ignore the rule and launch the shuttle today. Only a representative of the astronaut office and the leader of the mission management team voted against launch.

NASA has highlighted Atlantis' mission as the first in nearly four years to add significant components to the International Space Station. Construction of the half-built station was put on hold by the Columbia accident. NASA faces a tight deadline of 2010 to complete the station, which is made up of such massive pieces that only the shuttle can lift them into orbit.

NASA had only five-minute launch windows today and tomorrow — and Saturday was a last-minute addition after talks with Russian space officials — before it had to scrap its plans for at least two-and-a-half weeks.

The Russians are launching a three-person Soyuz capsule to the space station on Sept. 18, and Atlantis has to leave the station before the Soyuz arrives to prevent a cosmic traffic jam.

A Saturday launch would create a delicate job for above-the-air traffic controllers because within 21 hours three spaceships would come and go from the space station. If Atlantis launches Saturday, it would undock from the space station at 9 a.m. ET on Sept. 18, just nine hours after the Soyuz would launch. And 12 hours after the shuttle undocks an unmanned Progress resupply ship also leaves the space station.

If the launch isn't completed by Saturday, NASA could open up launching opportunities in late September and early October by relaxing a requirement that launches take place in daylight.

The rule was implemented for the first few flights after the Columbia accident so NASA can check if foam comes off the external fuel tank and could damage the shuttle's heat shield as it did Columbia's.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Industrials Climb 60.67 As Oil Drops (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

Stocks rallied to end an otherwise rocky week of trading, helped by a decline in crude-oil prices to a five-month low and comments by the president of the Cleveland Federal Reserve.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 60.67 points, or 0.5%, to 11392.11. It was off 0.6% on the week. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.4%, or 4.90 points, to 1298.92, off 0.9% on the week. And the technology-laden Nasdaq Composite Index was up 0.5%, or 10.50 points, to 2165.79, off 1.3% on the week.

Oil's selloff capped a weeklong downturn during which many of the bugaboos that have plagued energy markets faded. Crude-oil futures contracts guaranteeing October delivery slid $1.07, or 1.6%, to $66.25 a barrel, off 4.2% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In particular, traders celebrated the fact that, as the weekend approached, no major storms were threatening offshore drilling facilities in the Gulf of Mexico. On many Fridays in the past, traders have bought futures in order not to be "caught short" in the event of a crisis while markets were closed over the weekend.

But with much of this year's hurricane season past, such pressures have eased. At the same time, U.S. oil inventories have been robust, a tenuous cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah has held, and geopolitical tensions with Iran over its nuclear program haven't boiled over.

"I'm not ready yet to call a top to the crude market," said energy analyst Phil Flynn, of the futures brokerage Alaron Trading in Chicago. "But we have definitely reached a major crossroads in the long-term bull market."

In a speech, Cleveland Fed President Sandra Pianalto, who sits on the U.S. central bank's rate-setting committee, said that while she remains concerned about inflation, the Fed's previous efforts to fight such a general rise in prices, including more than two years of interest-rate increases, are still taking hold as the economy slows.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks1 and bond prices rose2. The 10-year note gained 2/32 point, or $0.63 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.781%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 116.90 yen, compared with 116.43. The euro fell to $1.2671 from $1.2734.

U.S. Stocks Rise On Drop In Oil, Fed Official's Rate Comment (BLOOM)

By Hilary Johnson

Bloomberg, September 9, 2006

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rebounded from two days of losses as oil fell to a five-month low and a Federal Reserve policy maker signaled the central bank is in no hurry to raise interest rates again.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest retailer, led the advance as the drop in energy costs suggested consumer spending will increase. Technology shares rose on speculation that Texas Instruments Inc., the No. 1 maker of semiconductors for mobile phones, may raise its earnings forecast next week. Stocks had their biggest weekly loss in a month.

Investors will ``start to price in a reacceleration in the economy," said Larry Adam, chief investment strategist at Deutsche Bank Alex. Brown in Baltimore, which manages $58 billion. ``The market has come around to what we've been feeling for a while, and that's that the Fed has completed this tightening cycle."

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 4.90, or 0.4 percent, to 1298.92. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 60.67, or 0.5 percent, to 11,392.11. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 10.50, or 0.5 percent, to 2165.79.

DOJ_NMG_0061336

Lennar Corp., the second-largest U.S. homebuilder by market value, declined after reporting quarterly profit dropped for the first time in six years.

Weekly Decline

Stocks fell for the week as builders' earnings showed a housing slump is deepening and economic reports pointed toward accelerating inflation.

The S&P 500 dropped 0.9 percent since last Friday, the biggest decline since the period ended Aug. 11. The Dow average lost 0.6 percent and the Nasdaq retreated 1.3 percent.

Investors gained renewed confidence in the interest-rate outlook today following Cleveland Federal Reserve Bank President Sandra Pianalto's comments.

Pianalto, a member of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee, said the full effect of past increases has yet to take hold and last month's pause was ``appropriate." The Fed ended a two-year series of rate increases on Aug. 8 when policy makers decided to hold the benchmark at 5.25 percent.

Her views appear to concur with those of San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen, who yesterday said the central bank needs time to assess the impact of past rate increases.

A Bloomberg News survey of economists shows that the faltering property market may lead to an end of rate rises through the first half of next year because housing's slowdown will be more of a drag on growth than expected, economists said.

Gross domestic product is expected to expand at an average rate of 2.7 percent in the first half of 2007, down slightly from last month's survey as economists shaved a 10th of a point off their second-quarter forecasts.

Wal-Mart

Wal-Mart gained $1.18 to $46.72. Its 2.6 percent rally was the second-biggest in the Dow average. Target Corp., the No. 2 U.S. discount merchant, added $1.88 to $50.56. An S&P 500 measure of retailers rose 1.2 percent.

Crude oil plunged 1.6 percent to $66.25 a barrel in New York on speculation U.S. fuel inventories will be sufficient as economic growth in the world's biggest energy consumer slows. That's the lowest close since April 4.

Texas Instruments added 50 cents to $31. The company will update its third-quarter sales and profit forecast following the Sept. 11 market close.

The last time Texas Instruments offered a quarterly update, on June 8, it raised its sales and profit forecasts due to strong demand for handsets in India and China.

Lennar

Lennar fell 54 cents to $42.71 after the homebuilder became the fourth such company this week to report lower earnings or cut its forecast. Third-quarter profit was as much as $1.35 a share, below the $1.81 average estimate of analysts in a Thomson Financial survey. Lennar said preliminary net new orders slid 5 percent in the quarter.

About three stocks rose for every two that dropped on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.31 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 16 percent less than the three-month daily average.

A measure of computer-related companies advanced 1.1 percent for the best performance among 10 industry groups. For the year, technology shares have lost 2.9 percent, the only decline among the 10 S&P 500 groups.

International Business Machines Corp., the biggest computer-services provider, gained $1.26 to $80.66.

Microsoft Corp. added 17 cents to $25.60. The software maker plans to sell a cheaper version of its Xbox 360 game console in Japan from Nov. 2, a week before Sony Corp. releases its rival PlayStation 3, to boost sales during the Christmas season.

Gateway

Gateway Inc. gained 3 cents to $1.89. The No. 3 U.S. personal-computer maker named J. Edward Coleman chief executive officer, ending a nine-month search to replace Wayne Inouye.

Amazon.com Inc. jumped 78 cents to $30.51. The world's largest online retailer unveiled a service that will sell movies and television shows from 30 studios and networks. It will compete with Apple Computer Inc.

Shares of technology companies may have benefited from lower oil prices, said Wayne Wilbanks, who helps manage $1.1 billion as chief investment officer of Wilbanks Smith & Thomas Asset Management.

Looking Toward Technology

Investors looking for stocks with above-average returns buy computer-related shares when ``you've got the potential bloom coming off the energy sector," said the Norfolk, Virginia-based Wilbanks. ``If you're a high-growth investor, you're naturally going to look to tech."

Not all computer-related stocks gained.

Broadcom Corp. declined 34 cents to $26.09. The maker of chips for consumer devices discovered more instances of stock- option backdating that will require it to at least double its charges for the practice to $1.5 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0061337

Shares of energy producers dropped 1.9 percent for the only decline among 10 industry groups in the S&P 500.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, lost 88 cents to $66.81. Sunoco Inc., the largest refiner in the U.S. northeast, dropped $2.22 to $65.50.

Equifax Inc. jumped $3.92, or 12 percent, to $36.34 for the biggest advance in the S&P 500. The consumer-credit information company raised its profit estimate for this year to more than $2 a share, higher than its projection of as much as $1.99. The company also lowered its forecast for capital expenditures.

Ford Motor Co. rose 19 cents to $8.77, after Mazda Motor Corp., which is a third owned by the second-largest automaker, said it is raising production capacity of engines on increased demand. UBS AG said it now expects Ford shares to reach $9 within 12 months, up from $7.

Ford, Borders

The company also said it will pay at least $20.5 million to new Chief Executive Officer Alan Mulally in the first year.

Borders Group Inc., the second-largest U.S. bookstore chain, climbed $1.38 to $20.60 after Credit Suisse upgraded the stock to ``outperform'' on confidence in new CEO George Jones.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, rose 37 cents to $130.28. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, gained 24 cents to $38.72.

S&P 500 futures expiring in September rose 3.1 to 1310.50 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures advanced 2.75 to 1589.50.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $612 million, added 0.3 percent to 708.54. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, gained 42.33, or 0.3 percent, to 12,977.52. Based on its increase, the value of stocks rose by $52.9 billion.

Amazon.com Inc. (AMZN US) Broadcom Corp. (BRCM US) Equifax Inc. (EFX US) Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM US) Ford Motor Co. (F US) Gateway Inc. (GTW US) International Business Machines Corp. (IBM US) Lennar Corp. (LEN US) Microsoft Corp. (MSFT US) National Semiconductor Corp. (NSM US) Sunoco Inc. (SUN US) Texas Instruments Inc. (TXN US) Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT US)

A Brief Rebound But Losses For The Week (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

Wall Street rebounded moderately yesterday from two losing sessions as oil prices dropped further and investors mostly shrugged off another warning from a home builder about declining demand. The major indexes ended the week with losses.

Investors apparently took in stride the Lennar Corporation's announcement that it was lowering its third-quarter profit forecast, joining several rivals in pointing to lackluster demand in a slowing housing market. Warnings earlier in the week from companies like Beazer Homes USA and Hovnanian Enterprises left Wall Street unnerved at the prospect of a sharp economic slowdown.

With relatively little in the way of market-moving economic news to chew on, investors got their biggest clue about the economy from the home builders. A few speeches from Fed officials also kept Wall Street guessing about the central bank's future.

"It's the third warning in three days from the home building industry and it's a sign that the damage on the rest of the economy is all still in front of us," said Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist at J. P. Morgan Asset and Wealth Management.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 60.67 points, or 0.54 percent, to 11,392.11.

Broader stock indicators extended their gains. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 4.90 points, or 0.38 percent, at 1,298.92, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 10.50 points, or 0.49 percent, to 2,165.79.

Bonds rose, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note gaining 3/32, to 10025/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, falling to 4.77 percent from 4.78 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

The major indexes ended the erratic, holiday-shortened week with losses amid a dismal outlook of an economic slowdown accompanied by higher inflation; investors' dismay at the home builders' warnings was compounded by government data showing a jump in wage inflation during the second quarter.

For the week, the Dow lost 0.63 percent, the S.& P. shed 0.92 percent, and the Nasdaq dropped 1.25 percent.

But yesterday, Wall Street, which has been hoping the Federal Reserve will temper its efforts to hold back inflation should the economy show further signs of slowing, appeared to regard comments from the Cleveland Federal Reserve president, Sandra Pianalto, as acceptable.

DOJ_NMG_0061338

She was quoted by news services as saying it was crucial that the Fed "anchor inflation expectations in order to best promote sustainable economic growth."

Ms. Pianalto's speech followed remarks from the San Francisco Fed president, Janet L. Yellen, on Thursday that some on Wall Street saw as indicating that further interest rate increases were likely.

Many investors are wary of more rate increases, contending the Fed's previous string of 17 straight increases have already slowed the economy too quickly. The Fed, which left rates unchanged at its last meeting, plans to meet again Sept. 20.

Mr. Schweitzer predicted that a cooling economy could lead to a rate cut in the first half of next year.

"I think the market is in a tug of war between the potential benefits and problems from a slowdown in the economy," he said.

Falling oil prices also helped stocks yesterday. Oil, which had recently been above $70 a barrel, has fallen in recent days as inventory figures showed increases and as tensions with Iran over its nuclear ambitions eased. The end of the summer driving period and a relatively uneventful hurricane season have also helped lower prices. Light crude oil was down $1.07, at $66.25 a barrel.

Lennar fell 54 cents, or 1.2 percent, to $42.71 after saying it expected to earn $1.25 to $1.35 a share for the third quarter, well below the $2.06 a share the company earned in the comparable quarter last year. Wall Street had been expecting $1.81 a share. Beazer Homes USA declined 9 cents, to $37.24, while Hovnanian Enterprises shed 92 cents, or 3.4 percent, to $26.17.

AirTran Holdings, which operates the low-fare carrier AirTran Airways, fell $1.19, or 11 percent, to $9.48 after the airline cut its third-quarter revenue forecast amid falling demand.

Equifax, a credit-reporting and marketing company, rose $3.92, or 12 percent, to $36.34, after it said its full-year earnings would exceed $2 a share; it had previously forecast a profit of $1.90 to $1.99 a share.

Consumer Credit Slowed In July As Higher Wages Provided Cash (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

Consumer borrowing increased less than expected in July as higher incomes allowed Americans to reduce their credit card use.

Consumer credit, or nonmortgage loans to individuals, rose 2.8 percent at an annual rate, to $2.35 trillion, the Federal Reserve said yesterday in Washington. In June, consumer debt increased at a rate of 7.3 percent.

Rising wages gave Americans more cash to spend as they went to shopping malls and auto dealerships in July. Consumer borrowing and spending may slow in coming months as the cooling housing market dents confidence and household wealth.

"Consumers have seen a pickup in their wages lately and this may be one reason they are not overdoing it when it comes to paying the bills with their credit cards," said Chris Rupkey, an economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ in New York. "They are not overextending themselves to make purchases."

Total consumer borrowing increased by $5.5 billion in July, the report showed. Economists had forecast an increase of $6.8 billion after an initially reported gain of $10.3 billion in June, according to a median of forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey.

Nonrevolving debt, including loans to buy cars, rose $3.1 billion in July after increasing $5.01 billion in June. Revolving debt, which includes credit cards, rose $2.4 billion after gaining $9.1 billion.

Home sales have been depressed by rising borrowing costs. The Federal Reserve raised its benchmark lending rate to 5.25 percent on June 29, the 17th straight increase since June 2004. The prime lending rate, the basis for home equity loans and other consumer debt, has risen to 8.25 percent from a four-decade low of 4 percent at the start of the Fed increases.

At the same time, cooling home prices have made home equity loans less attractive

"Credit card borrowing has been going down for the last few years mainly because people have been refinancing credit card debt into their mortgages," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York. "That is going to go in the other direction."

Consumer Borrowing Slows In July (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, September 9, 2006

Americans increased their borrowing in July at the slowest pace in four months as the gain in credit card debt fell off sharply.

The Federal Reserve reported Friday that consumer borrowing rose at an annual rate of 2.8 percent in July, down from an increase of 7.3 percent in June.

DOJ_NMG_0061339

The slowdown was led by a sharp deceleration in credit card debt, which rose by just 3.4 percent in July after gains of 13.2 percent in June and 13 percent in May.

Borrowing to buy autos also slowed in July to an annual rate of gain of just 2.5 percent after an increase of 4 percent in June.

All of the increases pushed debt up by $5.5 billion after a much larger increase of $14.1 billion in June, which had been originally reported as a gain of $10.3 billion. The July increase was slightly below the $6.5 billion advance economists had been forecasting.

The increases left consumer credit at a record level of $2.35 trillion. The Fed's measure of consumer credit does not include mortgages and other loans secured by property.

Consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of the total economy, slowed abruptly in the spring, pushing overall economic growth down to a 2.9 percent rate of increase.

Analysts believe consumer spending will remain sluggish in coming months as Americans struggle with high energy prices and interest rates and a cooling housing market.

States Must Find Welfare Recipients Jobs (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 9, 2006

The welfare rolls aren't dropping as fast as they used to, and that could pose a big money problem for states from coast to coast after a new federal law takes effect next month.

The states' task: find jobs for tens of thousands of people on welfare or risk losing millions in federal money. More than two dozen states have work to do, including Pennsylvania, California and Michigan.

The law requires states to place into job training, community service or other work activities 50 percent of their households that get welfare aid — and 90 percent of two-parent households that receive assistance.

"About half the states are in pretty good shape," said Wade Horn, assistant secretary at the Department of Health and Human Services. "About a quarter of the states are really going to have to work hard."

Pennsylvania will have to add nearly 23,000 recipients to the work rolls, which amounts to a 220 percent increase in work participation, according to federal estimates obtained by The Associated Press.

California has to find work activities for more than 60,000 people_ a 100 percent increase in its work participation rate.

Michigan must add nearly 11,500, a 117 percent increase.

Several other large states, including Texas, Florida and Georgia, will meet the requirements easily, according to the federal estimates.

The requirements are part of broad rules that more strictly define what constitutes work and require states to verify that adults are doing the activities the states say they are.

This week, five Democrats on the House Ways and Means Committee said the rules had placed new challenges on the states that would make the program more expensive and difficult to administer. They are asking for a congressional hearing.

Some analysts also are concerned that states will penalize beneficiaries as a way to get to 50 percent work participation, rather than help recipients land and keep jobs.

"The people who have the most barriers to employment, the most issues in their life, they tend to be sanctioned more than others," said Evelyn Ganzglass of the Center for Law and Social Policy. "But they often have problems that prevent them from complying. These can be mental health problems, physical disabilities, all kinds of issues that these families face."

Pennsylvania officials say their state has made significant strides since March, the last month included in the federal figures. Work participation is now up to about 32 percent instead of the 15 percent cited by the federal government, they said.

"We're confident we're going to hit the number," said Ted Dallas, executive deputy secretary for the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare.

Dallas said the new regulations have forced Pennsylvania to re-evaluate its program. He said there has been more one-on-one counseling and more accountability from contractors. He also said more recipients have been penalized when they did not comply with state requirements.

States can kick recipients out of the program if they have not met certain requirements, such as attending appointments with counselors or going to job interviews. Sanctions in Pennsylvania rose from 1,030 in February to 2,327 in July, state officials said. A sanctioned recipient in Pennsylvania becomes ineligible for benefits, such as cash assistance.

Horn stresses that states do not have to be at 50 percent work participation come Oct. 1, just at that average over the course of the year. Then, states will have a chance to take corrective action. The earliest that penalties could begin is 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0061340

Those penalties could be severe. States face a reduction of their welfare block grant of up to 5 percent the first year they fail to meet the new threshold, and 2 percentage points for each additional year.

Pennsylvania, for example, gets $719 million. If it fails to meet the work requirement, it could lose as much as $36 million in federal funds in 2009.

One important feature of the 50 percent threshold is that states get extra credit when they reduce the number of welfare recipients. If a state's caseload drops by 5 percent from 2005 levels, then the work participation requirement will also drop by 5 percent.

Under the current welfare law, states are also supposed to have 50 percent work participation, but the extra credit that states got stemmed from caseload reductions since 1996. As a result, many states could have 10 or 20 percent work participation, such as Pennsylvania did, and still easily meet the federal requirements.

States that have reduced the number of welfare cases over the past year include Georgia, 22.8 percent, and Texas, 19.2 percent. That means those two states would need to have only about a third of their welfare rolls in work activities to meet the new guidelines, Horn said.

Larry Jones, communications director of the Texas Workforce Commission, said various factors play a role in reducing welfare rolls. The state's economy is strong, generating about 630,000 jobs in the past three years. The state also has stricter time limits in place than most states, with some beneficiaries allowed to collect cash assistance a maximum of one year before they have to work.

But mostly, Jones said, the state has been successful placing recipients into the work force.

He said that about three-quarters of participants get jobs and, of that group, 71 percent have those same jobs six months later. Jones said the jobs pay more than $7 an hour and recipients can continue to get food stamps, state-subsidized child care, Medicaid and other benefits.

"We very strongly emphasize work and a quick attachment to the work force," Jones said. "Through work, one builds the skills needed to stay employed and build a career."

Bush's Speech Called Uplifting And Warm (FREEP)

By Tina Lam

Detroit Free Press, September 9, 2006

President George W. Bush swooped in Friday afternoon for a fund-raiser at a palatial house in Clarkston, pleasing listeners with a casual, upbeat speech.

Linda Lee-Williams, a state worker from Lansing, was thrilled with her first-ever chat with the president.

"I told him I had been praying for him since he took office," she said. "He gave me a kiss on the cheek."

U.S. Rep Mike Rogers, a Brighton Republican, described Bush's remarks as relaxed, uplifting and warm.

"He talked a little about terrorism and the economy but spent more time talking about the trials and tribulations of being a wartime president," Rogers said.

The event was closed to reporters.

Bush flew to Michigan to help raise $1 million for Republican Senate candidate Mike Bouchard and the state Republican Party. Rogers said about 400 people were there and that he believed the event brought in close to its goal.

Bush Zips In For Feel-good Visit (KCS)

By Dave Helling, Steve Kraske, And Scott Canon

The Kansas City Star, September 9, 2006

Air Force One landed uneventfully at Kansas City International Airport about 3:40 p.m. Friday and took off the same way at 6:31.

In between, hands were shaken, politics were discussed, large checks were discreetly handled.

On Ward Parkway, protesters protested. Across the street, reporters and photographers cooled their heels in a mansion under rehab.

But it's always news when the POTUS rolls into town.

Did he make a speech?

Nothing for the public, nor any impromptu news conferences. He didn't stop at a barbecue pit, either. (He never does. What's up with that, anyway?) So no national ripples; don't go surfing CNN or FOX.

Of course, it was pretty exciting if you were one of the 450 folks who were shuttled to the Scott Ward home at 1217 W. 55th St. and got to grip and grin with the big dog, the leader of the free world.

DOJ_NMG_0061341

Or you were Bradley Fisher and Taylor Mayes, both 17-year-old seniors at Smithville High School, who were presented Volunteer Service Awards at KCI for their work to prevent teen substance abuse.

Or you were U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, who collected perhaps $600,000 for his re-election bid.

So everyone had "a really cool experience," as Fisher reported ?

Maybe not those folks who hadn't counted on a presidential motorcade complicating Friday-night rush hour between the Country Club Plaza and the airport.

The president's had a pretty big week. He moved some Sept. 11 plotters to Guantanamo, near the five-year anniversary of the attacks; he pushed Congress to write new legal rules for the war on terror; he wants to speak to the nation Monday; and his poll numbers have bounced back a bit. Did he discuss any of this?

Yes. People who attended said Bush spoke about 45 minutes, mixing politics with policy, although he did not take questions. He told the gathering that Talent and Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who also was there, would provide the help he needs to pass legislation expanding his authority to prosecute the war on terror.

Former U.S. Rep. Wendell Bailey said Bush talked about his "commitment to the presidency rather than being the president. He's just hard to beat in that venue."

Who is Scott Ward, the host of the fundraiser?

He's the co-president of Russell Stover Candies. He and other members of the Ward family are longtime contributors to the Republican Party and Republican causes: Since 1998, he's given more than $57,000 to Republican candidates and committees, according to a campaign cash Web site.

Why was the fundraiser closed to the media?

Critics have said Talent held it in a private home to avoid news coverage — particularly photographs and video — of him standing next to Bush. For the record: Many high-level fundraisers are off-limits to reporters. But this year, the Democrats are flogging the issue because of the poor polling of the president and his party. Some note that Talent's yard signs neglect to mention his party.

What does Talent say to this?

"Now, this is the third time he's come in to campaign for me. That's a strange way to distance myself from him," Talent said at news conference before the event. "People have plenty of film of us together if that's what they want to use."

Asked why reporters were not allowed in to see them together, Talent said: "That was a decision the White House made."

Does the Republican Party or Talent's campaign pay for this political jaunt?

Bush is doing a lot of flying and fundraising, trying to keep the GOP in control of the Congress. And you're helping the president elect Republicans, just as you helped his predecessor elect Democrats.

The Federal Election Commission requires Talent's campaign to pay only the equivalent of a first-class air ticket for all political travelers on Air Force One. So Talent's few thousand dollars won't begin to cover the cost of bringing in that Boeing 747, Secret Service agents, nonpolitical staff and two limos.

As usual, Kansas City police officers provided security "as part of their normal workday," said spokesman Rich Lockhart. "There will be no additional overtime costs."

What did guests get for their $1,000?

"Finger food and beverages," reported Rich Chrismer, Talent's spokesman. "It's a reception."

Any Russell Stover candy put out?

Of course.

But, proving that revenge in politics is, well, sweet, contributors to a Web site called buyblue.org suggest "progressives" should stop buying Russell Stover chocolates.

Surely not those pecan turtles?

Apparently.

Who wrote the checks?

We won't know for sure until campaign fundraising disclosures are filed Oct. 15.

So Talent sees dollar signs when Bush shows up?

Better believe it. In late June, Bush went to a $2,000-a-head event in St. Louis, raising an estimated $750,000. The topper, however, was a similar event in 2005 that brought in more than $1 million — a state record — for Talent.

The overall fundraising scorecard? Through the end of June, Talent has raised $9,935,711; Claire McCaskill, $4,572,707, according to the Federal Election Commission.

Will McCaskill get any high-powered fundraising help for herself?

Yes. Former President Bill Clinton will appear today in St. Louis, where he's expected to help gather $1 million for McCaskill.

DOJ_NMG_0061342

So what's the Democrats' line?

Jack Cardetti, Missouri party spokesman: "With each million-dollar fundraiser, Jim Talent grows more indebted to President Bush and less likely to stand up to the president."

How many protesters showed up?

About 400, assembling on the Ward Parkway median.

How many Republicans does it take to rile up the Bush protesters?

Just one, but about 20 showed up, mostly waving Talent placards. One had a "Students 4 Bush" sign. Most appeared to be in their 20s. Clearly the most senior was 81-year-old W.C. Wissmueller of Kansas City. He waved a sizable American flag and at one point poked his staff at a bullhorn being used to lead the protesters in a chant. Cooler heads prevailed.

"I wanted to make sure somebody was here to support the president," Wissmueller said. "These people (the Bush protesters) are crazy."

What did some of those protesters' signs say?

"Emperor Bush, stop fiddling. Iraq burns"; "Mission accomplished? Where's Osama?" "Missouri needs a raise"; "Liar, liar, world on fire."

So the Iraq war was a major theme here, as it is in the national campaign?

Just ask Patrick Farnan of Weston. He was protesting with his wife, Deann. They lost their only son, Colby, to an improvised bomb near Taji, Iraq, on Feb. 25, 2005. The 22-year-old Army specialist is one of dozens of casualties from Missouri.

"It's 54. You've got to know that stuff. We all need to know that stuff," Patrick said.

They think their son died in an unnecessary war and came to Ward Parkway, they said, to hold the president accountable. "My son thought the war was all about oil," Deann Farnan said, "and I'm not sure he wasn't right."

Did Bush get to see the protesters?

For a couple of seconds, as his limo made the corner onto the parkway.

Cheney Visit Is Met By Traffic, Protests (BOS)

By Raja Mishra And Michael Levenson

The Boston Globe, September 9, 2006

Avoided in public by the state's leading Republicans, Vice President Dick Cheney arrived in Boston yesterday and was greeted by a boisterous protest and a well-heeled GOP crowd in the Back Bay.

When Cheney's plane touched down at Logan International Airport, he was greeted by a little-known state representative from Shrewsbury and a small band of local officials.

Governor Mitt Romney and Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey were nowhere in sight, and the vice president, whose poll numbers make him among the least popular political figures in the country, was whisked away in a black limousine.

Cheney's visit created traffic snarls, and for a few afternoon hours, Back Bay became a congested circus. Sign-waving protesters chanted into bullhorns. A massive retinue of police officers and Secret Service agents lined the streets. Afternoon traffic stood still. Flowing through it all were hundreds of Red Sox fans slowly making their way to Fenway Park.

The protests produced numerous confrontations, as guests to the fund-raiser, which cost $2,500 per person, had to walk through a gantlet of virulent anti-Cheney activists on their way to the Harvard Club in Boston, where Cheney spoke.

``Shame! Shame!" the protesters chanted at the Republican supporters streaming by.

Grace Ross , the Green-Rainbow Party candidate for governor, began giving a speech excoriating Cheney when police confiscated her microphone and speakers, citing noise ordinances.

Inside the Harvard Club, Cheney spoke for about 20 minutes to nearly 300 guests, giving a public service award to Richard J. Egan , the founder of the Hopkinton-based EMC Corp. and a stalwart Bush supporter. He also spoke about the war on terrorism.

``He talked about the need to stay the course," said Brian Dodge , executive director of the state Republican Party.

The event was closed to the public. In attendance yesterday were Romney , Healey , former governor Paul Cellucci and the new Turnpike Authority head, John Cogliano.

Cheney arrived at Logan at about 4 p.m., greeted there by a small entourage of Republican officials. State Representative Karyn E. Polito , a Shrewsbury Republican who was in the welcoming party, recalled her brief exchange with Cheney.

``I said, `I'm a Republican state representative, a wife, and a mother, and my family sleeps easy at night knowing you and President Bush are in the corner office,' " Polito said in an interview on the tarmac, just after Cheney left. ``He said, `Thank you for running for office. I'm happy to be here.' "

DOJ_NMG_0061343

The Harvard Club sits just off the intersection of Commonwealth and Massachusetts avenues, among the most congested crossroads in the city, and Cheney's visit exacerbated the typically nightmarish traffic that clots there on a Friday afternoon when the Red Sox are playing at home.

There were rolling road closures throughout the late afternoon and early evening, and downtown traffic was backed up and barely moving along long stretches of Back Bay starting at just before 4 p.m. Motorists were asked by police on foot to stop and remain stopped for as long as 30 minutes.

Parts of Commonwealth Avenue were shut off to motorists, with cars being diverted under Massachusetts Avenue, creating confusion among school bus drivers, trolley drivers, and others looking to escape the snarl.

At the same time, traffic on Interstate 93 south backed up to the Zakim Bridge late yesterday while Leverett Connector traffic headed toward Storrow Drive and Leverett Circle backed up as well.

Police kept protesters about 50 feet away from the Harvard Club entrance, with many of them spilling out onto Massachusetts Avenue.

``This war [in Iraq] has everything to do with greed ," said Alice Brown , 68, of Canton, whose son, Lieutenant Colonel David Floyd, recently returned from service in Iraq.

Some guests at the Eliot Hotel next door gathered on the hotel steps to watch the festivities.

``I don't believe they have much intellect or understanding of the issues," John Hanron , 68, said of the protesters. He was in town from Lincoln, Calif., for a family reunion. ``I'm disappointed that we have this subversion going on."

But Janet Minkin , 60, on vacation from Milwaukee, didn't seem to mind. ``I agree with the protesters 100 percent," she said. ``I had a little trouble getting through to the hotel. But I'm glad to see them there."

Lieberman Points Out A Turnabout By Lamont (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Sept. 8 — Ned Lamont, who this week chastised Senator Joseph I. Lieberman for his public rebuke of President Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal, wrote to Mr. Lieberman at the time praising the eloquence of his speech on the Senate floor.

“I supported your statement because Clinton’s behavior was outrageous: a Democrat had to stand up and state as much, and I hoped that your statement was the beginning of the end,” Mr. Lamont, then a cable television executive, wrote in an e-mail message to the senator’s Washington office on Sept. 16, 1998, two weeks after Mr. Lieberman’s speech.

Mr. Lamont defeated Mr. Lieberman in last month’s Democratic primary in Connecticut, but will face the incumbent — now running on his own party line — in November. In an interview with reporters and editors on Wednesday night in Washington, Mr. Lamont said he shared Mr. Lieberman’s “moral outrage” over Mr. Clinton’s sexual misbehavior but thought the senator should have handled it behind closed doors before making a public speech.

“You don’t go to the floor of the Senate and turn this into a media spectacle," Mr. Lamont said of Mr. Lieberman’s remarks. "You go up there, you sit down with one of your oldest friends and say you’re embarrassing yourself, you’re embarrassing your presidency, you’re embarrassing your family, and it’s got to stop.”

At the time, Mr. Lamont wrote that he had “supported the moral outrage” Mr. Lieberman expressed reluctantly because he “thought it might make matters worse,” adding that “unfortunately, the statement was the beginning of a process that has turned more political and morally offensive.” He urged Mr. Lieberman to “stand up and use your moral authority to put an end to this snowballing mess,” and suggested that “It’s time for you to make up your mind and speak your mind as you did so eloquently last Thursday.”

“I’m the father of three and the thought that Clinton testifying about oral sex before the grand jury may be broadcast into my living room is outrageous,” Mr. Lamont wrote. “This sorry episode is an embarrassment to me as a father and to us as a nation.”

A campaign aide to Mr. Lieberman alerted a reporter to the e-mail late Friday, after an article about Mr. Lamont’s recent comments appeared in The New York Times. Mr. Lieberman’s Senate office then faxed a copy of the message.

Casey Aden-Wansbury, a spokesman for Mr. Lieberman, said that after Mr. Lamont announced his candidacy, the senator recalled corresponding with him, and the staff culled old files. She said the 1998 missive was the only correspondence found from Mr. Lamont.

Mr. Lieberman’s campaign aides pointed out Friday night that Mr. Lamont contributed $500 to his campaign shortly after the speech, in 1999, and did not donate to Mr. Clinton’s legal defense fund.

Mr. Lamont, who declined to discuss the 1998 speech when an Associated Press reporter asked about it on Friday, was unavailable to explain the apparent discrepancy between his recent remarks and his e-mail at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0061344

His campaign manager, Tom Swan, did not address the content of the message, but said in response: "It is clear that Senator Lieberman would prefer to try to cloud Ned's statements from eight years ago, instead of talking about the important issues of national security, the war in Iraq and health care. It is shocking to see that his Senate staff, at taxpayer expense, is spending their time trying to make up dirt on Ned Lamont."

Senator Lieberman, asked about Mr. Lamont's recent comments, said on Friday that "it was important for someone who was a Democrat to stand up and call on him publicly to accept more responsibility for what he had done."

Back in 1998, he wrote to thank Mr. Lamont, saying his "kind comments and words of support mean a great deal to me."

"This was the most difficult statement I have had to make in my 10 years as a senator," Mr. Lieberman wrote, adding a handwritten "Thanks, Ned" at the bottom. "So it is very reassuring that you feel I made the right decision in speaking out."

Lieberman Defends 1998 Rebuke Of Clinton (AP-Y)

By John Christoffersen

AP, September 9, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman defended his reprimand of former President Clinton for his involvement with a White House intern, dismissing rival Ned Lamont's claim that he turned the 1998 rebuke into a spectacle.

"It was important for someone who was a Democrat to stand up and call on him publicly to accept more responsibility for what he had done," Lieberman said Friday. "In that case, I stood up and did what I believed was right for our country."

In September 1998, as the sex scandal raged, the Connecticut senator was the first prominent Democratic lawmaker to openly criticize Clinton's conduct with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. On the Senate floor, Lieberman spoke about being "personally angry because Clinton had, by his disgraceful behavior, jeopardized his administration's historic record of accomplishment."

The senator said his personal dismay evolved into "a larger, graver sense of loss for our country, a reckoning of the damage that the president's conduct has done to the proud legacy of his presidency."

Lamont, who defeated Lieberman in the Democratic primary Aug. 8, criticized the incumbent in an interview with The New York Times.

"You don't go to the floor of the Senate and turn this into a media spectacle," Lamont told reporters and editors from the newspaper during a dinner meeting Wednesday night.

"You go up there, you sit down with one of your oldest friends and say, 'You're embarrassing yourself, you're embarrassing your presidency, you're embarrassing your family, and it's got to stop,'" Lamont said.

Lamont, campaigning in Naugatuck on Friday, said he would have told Clinton what he thought before he said anything publicly.

"That's just the way I am," Lamont told The Associated Press. "I don't want to get into this issue anymore, though."

Lieberman, who is running as an independent after losing to Lamont, said his speech helped diffuse what had been partisan divisions over the scandal. He called it one of the toughest decisions of his life, but said he has no regrets.

Days before the Connecticut primary, Clinton joined Lieberman at a campaign rally.

"It's time for Ned to stop running a negative campaign and start talking about what he would do for the people of Connecticut over the next six years," Lieberman said. "He had to go back to 1998. Hey Ned, it's 2006."

Polls show Lieberman leading Lamont in a three-way race that includes Republican Alan Schlesinger.

As Outsider, Lieberman Walks A Tricky Path (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina And Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Sept. 8 — It was the sort of awkward moment that Senator Joseph I. Lieberman now faces regularly: He and the mayor of Stamford, both Democrats, recently appeared in a city park that Mr. Lieberman helped win millions for, and talked about their long friendship — and about how the mayor is not supporting him for re-election this fall.

"Joe Lieberman has a right to come to Stamford — it's his town and his state," said the mayor, Dannel P. Malloy, who, like many Democratic officials, has abandoned Mr. Lieberman for the party's new Senate nominee, Ned Lamont. "When you do good work, you deserve to come and visit the projects you're working on."

Mr. Lieberman, as a three-term incumbent, never needed anyone to explain his right to visit Stamford before. But the senator is now running on his own party line, and he has begun a complicated, occasionally clumsy tango as he tries to woo Democrats, Republicans and unaffiliated voters without the backing of any party.

Since his defeat in the Aug. 8 Democratic primary, Mr. Lieberman has been seeking Democrats while appealing to Republicans with tough talk about terrorism that is similar to President Bush's. He is mulling creating nonpartisan "citizen town committees" because he must build a new voter-turnout operation from scratch. And he is calibrating his language to try to appeal across party lines without seeming inconsistent or awkward — though, at times, he does.

DOJ_NMG_0061345

No longer the Democratic nominee, he has lost a handful of union endorsements, and his allies in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. may stay neutral. His campaign must replace and train hundreds of field workers that the state party usually deploys to help turn out voters. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, usually on his side, is now providing fund-raising and strategy help to Mr. Lamont. And there is no party organization that can quickly gather its members for the large campaign rallies that can be a shot in the arm.

Independent candidacies are rare, because party affiliation provides so many advantages: Fund-raising aid, battle-tested organizers, policy and strategy assistance, volunteers and an apparatus that can attack the candidate's opponent without the candidate appearing negative.

But interviews with Mr. Lieberman and his advisers make it clear that he has made a strategic bet: That his stature, name recognition, appeal among Republicans and power to deliver federal money to Connecticut will more than compensate for the lack of a party behind him. He has spent much of August highlighting federal projects he has supported — such as the $6 million park expansion that he and Mayor Malloy celebrated — and suggesting that a Senator Lamont, as a liberal in a Republican-controlled chamber, would not deliver as much. Mr. Lieberman said that if he is re-elected, he will continue to caucus with Senate Democrats.

Yet as Mr. Lieberman acknowledges, there is an element of making it all up as he goes along.

He hesitated when asked in a recent interview if there was any Republican endorsement he would not accept, knowing that his ties to President Bush have cost him before. He is trying to strike a balance between Republican and Democratic endorsements and appearances; for instance, he suggested, he was waiting for the right timing and opportunity to invite a Republican friend, Senator John McCain of Arizona, to campaign with him.

"I haven't asked him — yet," Mr. Lieberman said in a recent interview.

"This is a very different kind of race than anything that's been run before," he added. "Maine had an independent governor, and there was Jesse Ventura of Minnesota. I've taken a look at those. But as far as we can tell, we're doing something different here. The moment is different. So we're putting together a campaign in a way that makes sense for the moment."

Mr. Lieberman has hammered away at polarizing partisans in his campaign, though he is reluctant to say just whom he is referring to, other than Mr. Lamont, whom he once criticized as having too many ties to Republicans.

"People are sick of the partisanship and sick of the old party rules," Mr. Lieberman said on Friday.

Mr. Lieberman has managed to hire one prominent Democratic media consultant, Josh Isay, who demonstrated partisan flexibility by working for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg last year. (He already has a Republican pollster, who also works for Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.) Yet other Democrats have left his campaign, leaving Mr. Lieberman's staff of loyalists to shoulder many new tasks — in particular, building its own get-out-the-vote operation without relying on state and town Democratic organizations that can move voters to the polls.

Sherry Brown, who took over as Mr. Lieberman's campaign manager last month, said her team needed new ways to identify and mobilize voters beyond using the traditional lists of registered voters that the parties use to plan turnout strategy. The citizen committees are one idea; she also said the senator would rely more than usual on assistance from unions, environmentalists and other groups that have endorsed him, such as the Chamber of Commerce.

Vets for Freedom, a group with ties to top Republican strategists, is also planning to rally Republicans to vote for Mr. Lieberman, using commercials and other organizing tools. Alan Schlesinger, the Republican challenger, is trailing far behind, with only nominal support from his party leaders.

"The biggest question for us is the ground war: Where do you target for votes and how do you find and move people without a party organization?" said Ms. Brown, who oversees a paid staff of 25. "It's something we have to develop."

Lieberman advisers declined to discuss their strategy in detail, saying they did not want to tip their hand. But Ms. Brown said the senator would go after voters in the two major parties — and Connecticut's many independents — and would highlight his support for a higher minimum wage and access to better health care for the working class.

She said that Mr. Lieberman's popularity was strong enough across party lines to counter setbacks; she said invitations to him to march in local Democratic parades have been fewer than before, but added that he has received more invitations overall than he could ever accept.

Mr. Lieberman's loss last month was also, to some extent, a loss for the state's Democratic Party apparatus. He has been a consistent fund-raiser for the party, helping add as much as $1 million to its coffers in some election years. He could tap his national base of donors for help, too. The newcomer, Mr. Lamont, may now end up devoting money and precious time to aiding the party.

DOJ_NMG_0061346

Connecticut voters have a history of embracing independent candidates, most notably Lowell Weicker, a former Republican senator elected governor as an independent in 1990. And the makeup of the electorate appears hospitable to an independent bid: The largest bloc of registered voters, nearly 830,000, belongs to neither party, while there are 657,860 Democrats and 413,093 Republicans, as of last month.

"Connecticut tends to support mavericks — Chris Shays, Weicker, Lieberman — who show an independent streak and are willing to buck their own party," said Douglas Schwartz, director of the Quinnipiac University Poll.

While Mr. Lieberman has, as Mr. Weicker did, two advantages to help overcome the lack of a party — broad name recognition and a centrist image — the political dynamics have changed. The electorate today is sharply divided over the record and conduct of the Bush administration, and Mr. Lieberman appears to some as a sore loser who has tried to have it both ways — running as a Democrat and then as an independent. (Mr. Weicker became an independent before his 1990 run.)

"Lieberman's fate as an independent will depend on how he is viewed, and I think the bloom is off the rose as far as his image in the state," said Mr. Weicker, who lost his Senate race to Mr. Lieberman in 1988 and who is supporting Mr. Lamont this fall.

Mr. Lieberman said he hoped to create the sort of grass-roots, nonpartisan political movement that helped support the third-party former governors that he has looked to — Angus King of Maine and Mr. Ventura of Minnesota. Asked if there was enough time to do this, with less than 10 weeks until the general election, Mr. Lieberman said he was not sure.

"It's an open question," he said. "But it's my desire to create a real, independent citizens' movement in this race."

Tom Swan, Mr. Lamont's campaign manager, said there was no evidence that Mr. Lieberman could inspire such citizen brigades.

"How does he come across as anything but a whiny self-centered career politician trying to cling to power?" Mr. Swan asked.

Mr. Lieberman has walked a political tightrope at almost all of his campaign appearances, and has sometimes stumbled. Recently he called himself a "noncombatant" in the three Congressional races where Democrats are challenging incumbent Republicans; his aides amended the statement a day later, saying he would support the Democrats.

Lieberman advisers acknowledged that this episode was awkward, saying the senator was working through the right language to describe his support for Democratic Congressional candidates who have endorsed his rival, Mr. Lamont.

Adding to the confusion, two days after the "noncombatant" comment, Mr. Lieberman attended a motorcycle rally with one of the Republican incumbents, Congressman Christopher R. Shays, a close ally. Lieberman aides did not alert the press corps to the joint appearance, but according to a report on Fox News, Mr. Lieberman said that the Democrats should have considered the effects of his independent bid on their Congressional candidates before electing Mr. Lamont.

"Well, I guess I should say they should have thought of that during the primary," Mr. Lieberman said in the Fox segment. "But here we are."

At other times, Mr. Lieberman has reasserted his party credentials, calling himself a "proud Democrat."

Yet there is a fine line between party fidelity and his new pride as an independent, with Lamont supporters accusing him of caring only about "the party of one."

During a campaign stop in New London this week, Mr. Lieberman was dogged by reporters pressing him to explain whom he saw as his base of support.

"People treat the parties as if they are the only thing that matters," Mr. Lieberman said, adding that he hoped his run would show that there was a "higher loyalty to our state and our country."

Nancy Reagan Asks Webb To Pull Ad With Her Husband (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 8 -- Former first lady Nancy Reagan on Friday asked Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb to not use a television commercial that shows former president Ronald Reagan praising Webb, his former Navy secretary.

In a letter faxed to Webb at 5 p.m., the chief of staff of the Reagan Library in California urged him to not use footage from a speech by the former president at the Naval Academy in 1985. Webb is trying to unseat Sen. George Allen (R) in November's election. The speech lauded Webb and his achievements.

"Using the president's name, image or likeness implies endorsement which is neither fair nor respectful of any candidate, certainly not after President Reagan's death," wrote Joanne Drake. "At the direction of Mrs. Reagan, please refrain."

The ad shows Reagan saying: "James's gallantry as a Marine officer in Vietnam won him the Navy Cross and other decorations." An announcer's voice continues as Reagan's image morphs into pictures of Webb as a Marine.

DOJ_NMG_0061347

Webb's campaign immediately rejected the criticism and said it intended to proceed as planned by running the commercial in Norfolk, Roanoke and Northern Virginia. Spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd accused Allen's campaign of playing partisan politics.

"It doesn't imply an endorsement," Todd said. "It's Reagan in his own words. What Reagan said about Jim Webb, that belongs to Jim Webb, frankly."

The library's letter could hurt Webb's effort to woo moderates by wrapping himself in Reagan's legacy. But it could also give much broader attention to the ad, which Webb has paid less than $100,000 to run in just three television markets for a limited time.

The Reagan Library has often asked campaigns to refrain from using the former president's image. It made a similar request to the conservative Club for Growth in 2004, when the group ran an ad comparing Reagan to President Bush and criticizing Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.). An official at the library, Kirby Hanson, said Nancy Reagan was aware of the Webb ad and asked for the letter to be written. Hanson said the same would be asked of "any political campaign."

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said he hoped "the Webb campaign would respect the clear request of Mrs. Reagan."

But he declined to say whether Allen would remove a photo from his campaign Web site that shows Reagan and a young Allen shaking hands. It appears next to a Reagan quote.

"We do not have a television ad that is trying to convey the false impression that the late president has endorsed a candidate in this race. Only one campaign is trying to do that," Wadhams said.

Hanson declined to say whether the library would request that Reagan's image be taken down from Allen's Web site.

Earlier in the day, Allen unveiled a plan that he said would reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

In a speech from the Senate floor, Allen urged further exploration of oil and gas reserves in the United States, including in an Alaska wildlife area. And he called for more international cooperation to isolate oil-rich nations with which the United States is in conflict.

"In each challenge to our self-determination and freedom, we not only declared our independence, we mustered the resolve and the resources to achieve it," Allen said. "And it is time to declare our independence again."

Allen linked energy independence to the fight against terrorism, saying, "Today, many of our gasoline dollars now go to finance the war efforts of our enemies."

The speech coincided with Allen's new 30-second television advertisement, in which he says, "We need to be developing and exploring for more oil and gas in our own country." Allen advisers said the ad is running statewide.

Todd called Allen's proposals "rhetoric" without serious substance.

"It sounds like Allen is just trying to take care of his oil buddies to us," Todd said.

Concerns about energy and oil became issues in the race as gasoline prices surged this summer and the candidates traded barbs about connections to profitable oil companies.

Webb has accused Allen of taking $800,000 in campaign contributions from oil companies and has demanded that Allen give the money back. Allen, in turn, accused Webb of owning more than $64,000 in oil company stock.

Webb has called for a windfall tax on oil company profits. Allen dismissed the idea, saying higher taxes would slow the economy.

In an interview after the speech, Allen dismissed critics who say some aspects of his proposal, such as drilling in the Artic National Wildlife Refuge, could endanger the environment.

"You would think [the refuge] was Yosemite or Yellowstone," Allen said. "There are not trees. It's barren. It's flat. It's tundra."

Nancy Reagan Objects To Campaign Ad (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 9, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb has a television ad ready to air featuring praise from his late boss Ronald Reagan — and Nancy Reagan called on him Friday to cancel it.

Webb, who was Reagan's Navy secretary before Webb switched to the Democratic Party, uses the ultimate GOP icon to send a sentimental message to conservatives and moderates courted by his Republican opponent, Sen. George Allen. The ad is scheduled to begin airing next week.

But a three-paragraph letter from the former first lady's office said the use of footage of Reagan, who died in 2004, is "neither authorized nor appropriate."

DOJ_NMG_0061348

The 30-second ad opens with video of Reagan praising Webb during a commencement address at the U.S. Naval Academy in 1985, when Reagan was president and Webb, a Navy grad, was an assistant secretary of defense.

"James' gallantry as a Marine in Vietnam won him the Navy Cross and other decorations," Reagan says on the video.

Webb was campaigning in southwestern Virginia on Friday and was not immediately available for comment on the criticism. His campaign spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd, said the ad was fair.

"At this time, we are not changing our plans," Denny Todd said.

The first lady's letter, sent from the Ronald Reagan Presidential Foundation in Simi Valley, Calif., said use of his name and image implies endorsement of the candidate.

"At the direction of Mrs. Reagan, please refrain from the use of her husband's name, video footage, photograph, likeness, and/or quotes in any further campaign materials, including television advertisements," it concluded.

In a telephone interview, Edwin Meese, attorney general under Reagan, called use of the footage "improper, unethical and very possibly illegal. ... For him to use video of Ronald Reagan to appear in a campaign ad to favor him is fraud."

The ad debuts days after Allen mailed campaign brochures that include a photo of a boyish looking Allen standing beside Reagan. The same photo and a Reagan quote appear on Allen's campaign Web site.

"So, I guess this means George Allen is going to take down all the images he has on his Web site of him with Ronald Reagan?" Denny Todd said. "Where's the cease-and-desist order there?"

Webb became Navy secretary in 1987 but resigned the following year, refusing to reduce the Navy fleet after congressional budget cuts. More recently, he left the GOP over President Bush's decision to invade Iraq and other issues. He won a contentious Senate primary in June.

Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, called the ads "disingenuous and terribly hypocritical" and cited Webb's 1988 resignation, saying he "quit on Ronald Reagan after he did not get his way as Navy secretary."

Allen, seeking a second term, began airing his own biographical ads last month while Webb scrambled to raise money. Allen's campaign had more than $6.6 million on hand at the start of July compared with $424,245 for Webb.

Bellwether Community Still Handicapping Hopefuls (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

BEDFORD, Va. -- Voters here know how to pick winners in statewide elections.

This community of nearly 6,300 residents has picked the Republican winners -- President Bush and Sens. George Allen and John W. Warner -- and Democratic winners Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner in Virginia's presidential, congressional and gubernatorial races since 2000.

"We vote for the man, not the party," Grace Nichols, 69, told The Washington Times along with her husband, Ray, 76, at a local Hardee's -- a morning hangout for the city's older crowd.

With less than two months until voters choose among Mr. Allen, Democrat James H. Webb Jr. and Independent Green Party candidate Gail Parker in the race for one of Virginia's U.S. Senate seats, many residents in this city roughly 25 miles east of Roanoke feel disconnected from Capitol Hill, and are disappointed in the federal government's handling of the war in Iraq, immigration and other domestic issues.

"If I had my choice, I'd run every ... one of them out of the legislature," said Clarence Lawler, 76, a former Fairfax County teacher who now is a member of the Elks National Home retirement community. "They've sat ... all year long and done nothing."

Others say elected leaders don't live in the real world.

"You have 535 individuals living in a glass house inside the [Capital] Beltway, and it is all fogged for them," said Jim Revell, an independent who voted for Mr. Allen in 2000. "They can't see out into the real world."

Donna Keler, 50, agreed. "I make $663 a month on disability. Let them come down off their high horses and live on $663 a month."

Aside from the die-hard party faithful who are pretty much decided which candidate will get their vote, other residents seem hesitant to trade the familiar face of Mr. Allen for the unfamiliar face of Mr. Webb.

"I like Webb, but if I were to vote today it is still kind of a tossup," said Mr. Revell, 57, a Vietnam War veteran.

Mr. Lawler, a Republican who supports Mr. Allen, agreed. "I don't think that people down in this part of the country know Mr. Webb at all."

Local Democrats acknowledge Mr. Webb's limited name recognition is a problem.

"I don't know as much about [Mr. Webb] as I'd like to know," said Craig Amo, 60, a Democrat who owns Cup-a-Joe coffee house downtown. "To get the word out in the entire state takes money and he didn't have it until recently. I think between now and November we will get a lot more information out of Jim Webb."

DOJ_NMG_0061349

Mr. Webb, Navy secretary under President Reagan, missed a chance to push his message in this part of the state on Labor Day, when he skipped the traditional campaign kick-off parade for statewide elections in nearby Buena Vista. Mr. Webb opted to spend time with his son, Jimmy, a 24-year-old Marine lance corporal, before he deployed to Iraq on Tuesday.

Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, is scheduled to appear in this part of the state at a variety of events today, and will begin airing his first 30-second campaign ad in Northern Virginia, Norfolk and Roanoke media markets showing a video clip of Mr. Reagan praising his military record.

Yesterday, former first lady Nancy Reagan told Mr. Webb in a three-paragraph letter not to use video of her husband praising him in the ad, the Associated Press reported.

The letter from Mrs. Reagan's office said using footage of Mr. Reagan was "neither authorized nor appropriate," the AP reported.

Mrs. Reagan's letter came the same day as two former members of the Reagan administration and the chairman of Mr. Reagan's presidential campaigns said they were displeased with the ad.

"James Webb is dishonoring the memory of President Reagan by using an old video clip to imply that Ronald Reagan would be supporting him," they said in a statement.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Webb told AP the ad was fair and the attacks against it were politically inspired by Mr. Allen.

"At this time, we are not changing our plans," spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said.

Residents here say that Mr. Webb still needs to sell them on what separates him from Mr. Allen.

"I saw [Mr. Webb] in debate and it was 'me too-isms,'" Mr. Lawler said. "[Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen] both spoke almost identically."

When asked why people still support Mr. Allen, the residents said the senator was a "great governor" who touts the conservative values people here hold dear.

For others, the reasons were simpler.

"On TV he looks straight at you," said Betty Miller, 74. "I like that."

Still, Mr. Webb's military background plays well with others around the city of Bedford, home of the National D-Day Memorial.

A Marine who returned from Iraq last month and supported Mr. Allen in 2000 hinted he was leaning toward supporting Mr. Webb, a former Marine.

"Once a Marine, always a Marine," said the Marine, who did not want to be identified because of his military status.

New Jersey's Sen. Robert Menendez Faces Tough Challenge (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

NORTH PLAINFIELD, N.J. - The audience had listened politely. But people began to applaud loudly as Sen. Robert Menendez decried the war in Iraq.

"If I could not vote to send my son or daughter to war, I would not vote to send anyone else's son or daughter to war," the New Jersey Democrat said as the congregation at Shiloh Baptist Church - "A Place of Peace," as it bills itself - nodded in agreement.

Menendez - the son of Cuban immigrants and a sitting senator since his appointment to the post last January - is staking his campaign to keep his Senate seat on staunch opposition to the war, lacing his speeches with the body count and price tag of the conflict.

It's a strategy that Democrats hope to use to oust Republican incumbents. And it strikes a chord in this heavily Democratic state, where polls suggest that the war is increasingly unpopular. But Menendez's race - crucial to Democratic efforts to capture the Senate - has turned into an unexpectedly close and increasingly contentious contest, to the puzzlement of strategists, who wonder whether his ethnicity is a factor.

"New Jersey is behaving very, very oddly," noted Charles Cook, a nonpartisan handicapper who publishes the Cook Political Report. The seat, he said, may be the only Democratic Senate seat in jeopardy.

A former congressman, Menendez voted against the war in Iraq, and he's outdone his opponent 3-to-1 in fundraising. Still, he finds himself neck and neck with Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr., a state senator with a brief record but an outsized name.

Kean's father is former New Jersey Gov. Tom Kean, who chaired the Sept. 11 commission and is so revered that beachgoers along the Jersey shore over the Labor Day weekend needed to know only the familial ties to pledge support to his son.

DOJ_NMG_0061350

"If you're half the person your father was, you've got my vote," Rosemary Sullivan, 67, a Fairfield retiree, called after the younger Kean as he worked the crowd in Lavallette.

Some question whether Menendez's Hispanic roots - and surname - are playing a role in dampening the polls.

"Sad to say, but I do think the Latino surname may be hurting him on the margins," said David Rebovich, a political science professor at New Jersey's Rider University Institute for New Jersey Politics. "And there's a lot of skepticism about the Hudson County ties."

The campaign in many ways has revolved around Hudson County, a gritty collection of cities hard by the New York skyline that for years has welcomed newly arrived immigrants - and earned a reputation for political corruption. Menendez is a former mayor of Union City, the second-largest city in Hudson County and the second-largest Cuban-American stronghold in the United States, after Miami.

Kean, who lives in suburban Westfield, denounces Menendez as a pol who muscled his way up the county ranks, calling him in an interview "nothing but a partisan Hudson County Democratic party boss." He's seized on newspaper accounts that Menendez collected $300,000 in rent from a nonprofit agency for which he helped land federal money, accusing him of a conflict of interest.

Menendez, charging that Kean is practicing the "politics of personal destruction," says the House Ethics Committee cleared the arrangement.

Menendez says his campaign is "looking carefully" at statements that Kean and other Republicans have made, suggesting that they're thinly veiled attempts to denigrate the senator's Hispanic roots. New Jersey has never elected a Hispanic or black candidate statewide.

Menendez's campaign hopes for a comfortable vote cushion out of Hudson County, telling voters there that the Kean campaign is disparaging the county, which is increasingly Hispanic.

"I was one of three Hispanics in my elementary school. My brother was the second," Union City Mayor Albio Sires said. "Now the county is overwhelmingly Hispanic. It's really angering people that they're seeming to say people from Hudson County are no good."

Kean, who in campaign speeches accuses Menendez of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants by backing a Senate immigration bill, says he's not criticizing Hudson County, simply looking "to protect the hardworking people of Hudson County from the Democratic machine that is hurting New Jersey."

Menendez was appointed to the Senate to fill the term of Jon Corzine, who was elected governor.

His elevation to the Senate opens the way for the election of another Cuban-American congressman: Sires, who came to the United States from Cuba in 1962 at age 11.

Should Sires, a Democrat, win his race for Menendez's former House seat - and there are no signs that he won't - he'd be the fourth congressman with Cuban ties, along with Reps. Lincoln and Mario Diaz-Balart and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, all Florida Republicans.

"We'll be over-represented population-wise," rejoiced Cuban-American lobbyist Mauricio Claver-Carone, referring to the U.S. Cuban population, which numbers fewer than 2 million. "And that's just fine with us. We hope to be even more over-represented."

To that end, Claver-Carone's group, the U.S.-Cuba Democracy Political Action Committee, has maxed out contributions to Menendez, arguing that the community would benefit from a Republican Cuban-American senator, Mel Martinez of Florida, and a Democrat, Menendez.

Cuba, though, hasn't figured in the New Jersey race. Menendez said it rarely came up on the trail. "This is not Miami," he noted with a broad grin. Indeed, most of New Jersey's Cuban-Americans are loyal Democrats, Sires said.

Kean suggested that Cuba probably is the only area on which the two candidates agree. He said he had an aunt who'd fled Cuba, and he pledges he'd be staunchly pro-embargo.

The national parties are watching the race carefully. Democrats expect to hold the seat, central to their hope of taking control of the Senate.

But should the numbers continue to look rosy for Kean, national Republicans could throw some money his way, strategists suggest, though other states had looked more viable.

That New Jersey could be in play is worrying Democrats.

"The war could do it for him," said Ed Hughes, 72, a diehard Democrat who came to hear Menendez at a campaign event to quell doubts created by the ethics charges. "But they're going to try to take those machine ties and strangle him."

Inquiry Said To Involve An Agency's Links To Senator Menendez (NYT)

By David W. Chen

DOJ_NMG_0061351

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TRENTON, Sept. 8 — Federal prosecutors are reportedly examining the records of a nonprofit community agency in Hudson County that paid more than $300,000 in rent to Senator Robert Menendez while also getting millions of dollars in federal grants with Mr. Menendez's help.

WNBC-TV and The Star-Ledger of Newark reported on Thursday that the United States attorney's office had issued subpoenas to the agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, in Union City, this week. A spokesman for the United States attorney declined to confirm or deny those reports on Friday, and repeated attempts to reach the North Hudson Community Action Corporation were unsuccessful.

But Mr. Menendez, speaking on Friday at the annual convention of the Democratic State Committee in Atlantic City, criticized the timing of the subpoenas as being politically motivated, and repeated his earlier assertions that he did nothing either illegal or unethical in renting the house to the agency for use as office space.

Mr. Menendez is in a tight race for a full six-year term against his Republican opponent, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. The United States attorney who issued the subpoenas, Christopher J. Christie, is a Republican appointed by President Bush.

"We have seen an orchestrated series of leaks, bogus ethics complaints and outright fabrications since the beginning of this campaign," said Mr. Menendez, adding that he personally had not been subpoenaed.

Jill Hazelbaker, Mr. Kean's communications director, dismissed Mr. Menendez's criticism.

"It's disturbing that despite an ongoing investigation by federal authorities, Bob Menendez refuses to take responsibility for his ethical failings," she said. "He's desperate and his campaign is imploding."

The landlord-tenant arrangement between Mr. Menendez and the agency is the latest flash point in a Senate race that has been dominated by accusations of ethical lapses.

Last month, two Republican assemblymen filed a federal ethics complaint claiming that Mr. Menendez had skirted conflict-of-interest rules in the transaction.

But Mr. Menendez repeated on Friday that he received oral permission from the House's ethics committee, and that the agency had received federal funds long before he was elected to Congress. He has also said that the agency, which provides various health and social services, had continued to receive funds, though he sold the house three years ago.

Mr. Menendez, who was appointed to the Senate by Gov. Jon S. Corzine to finish his term, was selected over several other Democrats, including Representative Robert E. Andrews of Camden County.

So when news of the subpoena spread on Friday, reporters asked Mr. Menendez and Mr. Andrews whether Mr. Menendez was under pressure to drop out of the race and be replaced by the congressman.

"In the end, this is all beside the point," Mr. Andrews said. "Menendez is going to win the election because of substance."

For his part, Mr. Menendez said that no one had asked him to drop out. "I think that if you heard all the speeches, the question need not be asked," he said, referring to those delivered by Democratic colleagues at the Atlantic City convention. "The answer is no."

Cardin, Mfume Seek To Distinguish Campaigns (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

One question remained after the two leading Democrats in Maryland's U.S. Senate primary debated for more than an hour in front of an audience of black pastors in Prince George's County yesterday.

"How do the two of you differ?" the moderator asked.

"A lot of times we seem to be very similar," Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin said. "I think we're different."

"We get this question all the time," said former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume, whose contest will be decided in Tuesday's primary, emphasized that they have avoided negative attacks and have focused on issues.

"We've been doing this in the right way," Mr. Cardin said.

But after opening statements and 10 rounds of questions on issues ranging from the war in Iraq and genocide in Sudan to mandatory minimum sentencing and same-sex "marriage," their responses provided little to separate the two candidates.

Whoever wins Tuesday likely will face Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, in the general election.

Yesterday's debate was held at the First Baptist Church of Glenarden in Landover.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume spent much of the hour yesterday agreeing on issue after issue, giving similar answers to the members of the Collective Banking Group Inc., which was formed to fight discriminatory lending against black churches.

On the question of bringing federal facilities to Prince George's, Mr. Mfume said, "Ben and I feel pretty much the same way."

DOJ_NMG_0061352

On federal funding for faith-based ministries, Mr. Cardin said, "Kweisi and I are in agreement about much of what has been said."

After the Rev. Jonathan Weaver posed the last question -- "How do you differ?" -- one pastor in the audience piped up, "That's the same question I was going to ask."

Mr. Cardin noted one difference. "Kweisi Mfume is a much better speaker than I am," he said. "I think I bring to this race more experience and more accomplishments."

Mr. Mfume said, "Ben is older than me, and I have more hair and mine is still black."

Mr. Cardin joined in the laughter at Mr. Mfume's joke.

Then Mr. Mfume talked about getting "special interest money" out of the political process and publicly financed campaigns, "so elections are not bought off by millionaires or billionaires."

Mr. Mfume has faced significant fundraising obstacles over his 17-month campaign, raising $1.1 million to Mr. Cardin's $5.5 million.

Mr. Steele has raised $5.2 million. As of Aug. 23, he had $3.1 million left, compared with Mr. Cardin's $1.6 million and Mr. Mfume's $307,437.

After the debate, some pastors said they appreciated the civility between Mr. Cardin and Mr. Mfume.

"I appreciate these guys treating each other with human respect, modeling before the community what it ought to be about," said the Rev. John K. Jenkins Sr., pastor of First Baptist Church of Glenarden.

But Mr. Weaver said he saw "very little difference" between the two candidates.

"If we had had two candidates that had very divergent views, I don't think that's an unhealthy thing, because then people could see that they have a very distinct choice," he said.

Democrats' Best Hopes Lie In Suburban The Northeast, Midwest (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 9, 2006

NORRISTOWN, Pa. - Lois Murphy is a Democrat eager to oust a Republican congressman and help her party take back control of the U.S. House of Representatives.

She's been here before. She fell short two years ago, but this time she swears it's different. She might be right.

She's in a good position to oust two-term Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach. It could be an isolated win, or, as Democrats hope, it could be part of a realignment of seats in the suburban Northeast back to the Democrats, who long dominated the region's politics.

There are 435 elections for House seats this fall, but only a few dozen are competitive, and they're almost all in the Northeast and Midwest. Many of them are held by moderate Republicans in places, such as suburban Philadelphia, that went for Democratic presidential candidates Al Gore and John Kerry, as well as local Democrats such as Gov. Ed Rendell.

Now, thanks in part to voters' anger at the war in Iraq and disapproval of President Bush, Democrats have an opportunity in these districts to take advantage of a shift away from the national Republican Party that was already occurring.

"It's a very different environment," Murphy said. "It's a very different mood."

Even before Murphy came along, the suburban districts were growing less enamored of Republican rule in Washington. Prosperous, largely white and white-collar, the suburbs are fiscally conservative and socially liberal.

"The voters in the suburbs here are thoughtful, educated, independent thinkers," said Murphy, a former abortion-rights lawyer. "For a number of years, some Republicans have been drifting away over social issues, religion and state, science and environmental protection. Those issues have been accumulating. ... It's been a trend that was already in place but has accelerated in the last year."

This 6th District of Pennsylvania, while still closely divided, seems to be leaning toward the Democrats. It went for Gore by a razor's edge in 2000 and for Kerry by 51-49 percent in 2004.

Next door, the state's 7th Congressional District went for Gore by 51-47 percent and for Kerry by 53-47. Republican Rep. Curt Weldon won easily there, but he faces a strong challenge now from Democrat Joseph Sestak, a retired vice admiral.

The nearby 8th District went for Gore by 51-46 percent and for Kerry by 51-48. Freshman Republican Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick won easily last time when he stepped in at the last minute to replace a retiring congressman and faced token opposition from a weak Democrat. This time, he has a tough opponent in Patrick Murphy, an Iraq veteran who won a Bronze Star.

All three are close contests, according to independent analysts Stuart Rothenberg of the Rothenberg Political Report, Charles Cook of the Cook Political Report and Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0061353

In the 6th District, Gerlach is no right-wing ideologue. He's voted against oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and against banning gay marriage, while voting to ban so-called partial-birth abortion. The National Journal, a respected Washington weekly, in 2004 put him in the middle on social issues and only slightly to the right on economic issues.

Yet Murphy might have the edge over him this time.

At this point two years ago, she trailed Gerlach in her own polling by 19 points and in campaign cash by $300,000. She closed strong, but lost, 51-49 percent.

Now, aides noted, she leads in the same poll by 1 point and has a cash advantage of $100,000 over Gerlach.

Election Day is Nov. 7.

Edwards Runs Tough Race Against Wynn (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Rep. Albert R. Wynn (D-Md.) has not faced formidable opposition since he was elected in 1992. He has trounced challengers, returning to office with no less than 80 percent of the vote in a primary or general election.

But Wynn is facing the political challenge of his career in Tuesday's Democratic primary against Donna Edwards, a lawyer and community activist who has mounted a vigorous and well-organized campaign to represent Maryland's 4th Congressional District.

Edwards drew little attention when she filed campaign papers in April to run against Wynn, but she has raised her profile in part with the help of Internet bloggers, who support her positions on the environment, campaign finance reform and Iraq. Edwards opposes the war; Wynn voted for the resolution authorizing it.

Connecticut businessman Ned Lamont's Democratic primary defeat of longtime incumbent Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman -- a vocal supporter of the Iraq war -- boosted enthusiasm about Edwards's campaign among bloggers. She continued to hammer Wynn on his vote to go to war in Iraq, calling the seven-term incumbent "Maryland's Joe Lieberman."

Wynn says he was misled by the Bush administration and notes that he was not the only Democrat who was. He has apologized for the vote and now believes the troops should be withdrawn.

"My opponent will say, 'Knowing what I know now, I wouldn't have voted for [the war],' " said Edwards during a recent NAACP candidates forum. "Well, sorry is just too late."

Wynn has spent little time campaigning in past elections but has increased his number of public appearances in his district, which includes parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties. And he said he is "reaching deep into the playbook" as the campaign goes into the final stretch.

"We take this campaign very seriously," Wynn said. "But let's not make it seem like I'm campaigning against the second coming of Huey Long."

Edwards is a newcomer to Maryland politics. She has worked on Capitol Hill as a lobbyist for groups such as the Center for a New Democracy, where she was the executive director. On a national level, she has pushed for funding for domestic violence victims and reforming the campaign finance system. Locally, she and a community activist group fought against the building of National Harbor, a multibillion dollar resort along the Potomac River, until developers agreed to add a residential component to the project. She has received endorsements from Progressive Democrats of America, the Sierra Club and the National Organization for Women's political action committee.

"I'm not in this as a joke, and I'm not in this to make a statement," Edwards recently told a group of residents during a meet-and-greet at a Mitchellville home. "I'm in this to win it."

Edwards supports a withdrawal from Iraq but has declined to say what the timetable should be. She wants to raise the minimum wage and thinks the country's energy policy should be weaned off of fossil fuels.

But the cornerstone of her campaign is portraying Wynn as out of step with the district's voters.

She points out that Wynn broke ranks with the party to vote in favor of the Bush administration's energy bill in 2003, which authorized tax breaks for energy producers. Wynn also supported the repeal of the estate tax, which would benefit the wealthiest Americans.

These votes, Edwards says, betray the constituents in the solidly Democratic district that runs from Clarksburg in Montgomery to Fort Washington in Prince George's.

Wynn says Edwards, who worked in his law office when she first got out of law school, has mischaracterized his record.

His campaign literature touts the backing of about 40 left-leaning groups, including the AFL-CIO and Planned Parenthood, as evidence that he remains a true Democrat, despite Edwards's attempts to cast him otherwise.

"I consistently vote with pro-choice, I consistently vote with labor unions," Wynn said during a recent interview. "This is a bunch of rubbish of the worst sort."

DOJ_NMG_0061354

He makes no apologies for his vote on the Republican-sponsored energy bill. "I'm happy to stand behind the energy bill," he said, noting that the legislation included a $3 billion increase in energy assistance for low-income residents. "I'm more concerned about getting money for low-income residents. She's more concerned about having a partisan fight."

Wynn said he supports repealing the estate tax because business owners in his district and wealthy first-generation African Americans across the country requested it and because he believes people should be taxed when they are alive.

But he is not used to having to explain his position. In the past, he has faced opponents such as Republican John Kimble, who once said he was running because "the salary seems good." Kimble perhaps was best known for offering to pose nude in Playgirl magazine in a stunt to raise campaign money, and he recruited Wynn's ex-wife to do a radio ad six years ago.

Wynn described the contest with Edwards, who has support from Barbra Streisand, Danny Glover and Gloria Steinem, as "the liberal elite versus the pragmatic Democrat."

Although many political observers applaud Edwards's aggressive campaign, they say she has little chance of defeating the seven-term incumbent.

"She's put together a very energetic campaign," said Matthew A. Crenson, a political science professor at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. "But he's firmly entrenched."

Edwards said that when she became disillusioned with Wynn's record, she began asking elected officials about running against him. "No one would do it," said Edwards, who has not campaigned for office since high school. "They said, 'He can't be beaten, he has a machine.' "

Wynn continues to wave signs on busy intersections in Prince George's and Montgomery, and Edwards continues to try to penetrate Wynn's popularity, holding meet-the-candidate events in living rooms and basements across the district.

Nakia Nicholson, a teacher and Wynn supporter who recently attended one of Edwards's events, left impressed.

"I think she's a very knowledgeable, very capable candidate," Nicholson said.

But was she swayed?

"I'm in the middle right now," she said.

Governor Apologizes For Ethnic Comments (LAT)

By Robert Salladay And Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

Schwarzenegger says reading his remarks on 'hot' Latinos made him uncomfortable.

SACRAMENTO — Saying he cringed after reading his own words, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized Friday for characterizing a Latina lawmaker as hotblooded because of her ethnicity.

The governor said he was disturbed by published reports of a casual conversation with top aides at a private meeting in his Capitol office last spring, recorded by a staff member preparing a speech for him. He apologized for the remarks at a news conference in Santa Monica with Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City), the subject of his comments, smiling as she stood next to him.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by these comments, I just want to say I'm sorry. I apologize," Schwarzenegger said.

"The fact is that if I would hear these kind of comments in my house, by my kids, I would be upset," Schwarzenegger said. "It's one thing when you say things, but it's another thing when you read it in the paper. It made me cringe. It made me feel uncomfortable."

The Times obtained a copy of the audio recording and published the governor's remarks on its website Thursday evening and in the newspaper Friday.

On the six-minute recording, Schwarzenegger discusses Garcia with his Democratic chief of staff, Susan Kennedy. Their conversation, consisting mostly of casual banter, veered away from talk about two Republican legislative leaders to Garcia and her ethnic identity.

"She maybe is Puerto Rican or the same thing as Cuban. I mean, they are all very hot," the governor said. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

And he recalled a Cuban-born bodybuilder who, he said, "was like that."

Garcia, who has been campaigning for Schwarzenegger as one of his highest profile Latina supporters, said there was no need for apologies, because she refers to herself as hotblooded. The governor attended a fundraiser for Garcia's reelection campaign Thursday.

"I am not mad that he recognizes that I am passionate about the issues," she said, echoing comments she made to The Times on Thursday, "and I am not mad that he allows me to tell him exactly what I think, and what's on the mind of people in my community. So again, there is no need to apologize."

DOJ_NMG_0061355

Assembly Republican leader George Plescia (R-San Diego), whom Kennedy said on the recording looked like a startled deer, also said no apology was necessary, although both the governor and Kennedy called him to express regret. He said he was not offended.

Plescia said his office was planning to make T-shirts with the phrase "Wild Bunch" on them for every member of the Legislature's GOP caucus — a reference to Schwarzenegger's characterization of Republican lawmakers on the recording.

"Some of us have thought of wearing it like a badge of honor," Plescia said.

On the recording, Schwarzenegger muses about Plescia's ability to "control that wild bunch upstairs," and describes the chamber's Republicans as an "unruly bunch of guys and girls."

Schwarzenegger said at the news conference that he had called several Latino and African American community leaders to discuss his taped remarks with them, although he did not name them. They understood that the remarks were part of an "off-the-record conversation, and it was not meant to be in any negative way," he said.

Schwarzenegger said the conversation had been taped, as some of his meetings are, "because I have a certain way of speaking" and because it helps his speechwriters get the "texture" of his accent.

"So I don't sound like any other politician speaking, I always sound like Arnold," he said, noting that his speechwriter was new on the job at the time.

The governor's apology did not mollify his opponents. State Treasurer Phil Angelides, the Democrat who is challenging his reelection bid this year, issued a statement saying Schwarzenegger "has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state."

"His comments reflect a disturbing pattern of behavior," the statement said. "The governor has a responsibility to conduct himself with dignity."

Rep. Hilda L. Solis (D-El Monte) said she thought the comments were disrespectful because they portrayed Latinas as objects, not individuals with differing personalities.

"What is really sad is we're always trying to defy these stereotypes, especially Latino women in important positions," Solis said. "This doesn't help us. People just want to brush us off and depict us in a negative manner."

Schwarzenegger did not refer to his earlier remarks in a brief speech later Friday morning at the opening ceremonies of the Los Angeles County Fair in Pomona. During a leisurely stroll through the rows of hot dog and cotton candy stands, he obliged requests to recite lines from "The Terminator," autographed checkbooks and maps of the fair, and took one teenager's cellphone to say hello to the young man's friend on the other end.

Many of his greeters included blacks and Latinos, few of whom said they were disturbed by Schwarzenegger's comments about ethnicity and personality.

"It's probably true," said Frank Rodriguez, a stove assembly technician from La Puente who described himself as being of Mexican descent. "There's a lot more things to be offended about. He has a right to say what he wants, just like we do. If it was just anybody else on the street — if I said it, if you said it — nobody would care."

Vincent Kirby, a retired computer assembler from La Puente who said he is still deciding whether to vote again for Schwarzenegger, said the comments weren't likely to sway him one way or another.

"But as governor," said Kirby, 53, who said his ancestors included Spaniards, American Indians and Cajuns, "to really keep his face and his character and his charisma up, he should really avoid stuff like that."

*

robert.salladay@latimes.com; michael.finnegan@latimes.com

Times staff writer Maeve Reston contributed to this report.

Schwarzenegger Apologizes For Ethnic Group Remarks (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 8 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized Friday for saying in a closed-door meeting in March that Cubans and Puerto Ricans were naturally passionate because of their combination of “black blood” and “Latino blood.”

The comments were captured on tapes during a speechwriting session between Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican seeking re-election, and his chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, when they spoke of their shared affection for Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia’s legislative style.

“I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot,” the governor says on the recording. “They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it.”

The Los Angeles Times, which obtained a tape of the remarks, reported about them on Friday.

Early Friday, Mr. Schwarzenegger’s Democratic opponent, Phil Angelides, released a statement chastising the governor.

DOJ_NMG_0061356

“Once again, Governor Schwarzenegger has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state,” Mr. Angelides said.

But Ms. Garcia, a Republican and an ally of Mr. Schwarzenegger, responded in kind.

“The only embarrassment in California today is Phil Angelides’s sad and predictably partisan statement,” she said in a statement distributed by the Schwarzenegger campaign.

Soon, black and Hispanic lawmakers issued their own news releases, some saying they did not care for Mr. Schwarzenegger’s remarks, others saying there was nothing wrong with them.

Mr. Schwarzenegger called a news conference in Los Angeles with Ms. Garcia at his side to make the standard political apology.

“To anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I apologize,” he said.

“I called several Latino leaders,” Mr. Schwarzenegger said. “It was very clear that all of them understood that this was an off-the-record conversation, and they all said to me we are not preoccupied with these kind of things.”

Ms. Garcia praised the governor for recognizing “that I am passionate about the issues.”

Schwarzenegger Says He Is Sorry (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized yesterday for declaring during a closed-door meeting that Cubans and Puerto Ricans are "hot" because of their combination of "black" and "Latino blood."

The action hero-turned-governor acknowledged that the tape-recorded comments made him "cringe" when he read them in yesterday's editions of the Los Angeles Times.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I'm sorry, I apologize," Schwarzenegger said, adding that if he heard his children make similar comments, "I would be upset."

Schwarzenegger was captured making casual remarks about fellow Republicans on a six-minute tape recorded during a March 3 speechwriting session with his advisers. The Los Angeles Times obtained the tape, placed a link to it on its Web site and put the story about Schwarzenegger's remarks on its front page.

On the tape, Schwarzenegger and chief of staff Susan Kennedy, who is a member of the Democratic Party, praise state Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City) and speculate about her ethnicity.

"I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot," the governor says on the recording. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

The pair spoke affectionately about Garcia in the context of their attempts to induce recalcitrant Republican lawmakers to go along with a series of massive bond proposals to rebuild California's crumbling infrastructure that Schwarzenegger was attempting to hash out with the legislature. Californians will vote on the package, the biggest in the state's history, in November; Schwarzenegger is also running for reelection.

Garcia, who is Puerto Rican and the only Latina Republican in the assembly, appeared with Schwarzenegger yesterday and said she was not offended by the governor's comments. Garcia earlier told the Times that she refers to herself a "hot-blooded Latina."

"I love the governor because he is a straight talker just like I am," she said.

Another subject of the tape, Republican Assemblyman Kevin McCarthy, who was referred to as "Bakersfield boy," said he thought the tape was funny.

Schwarzenegger's opponent, Democratic nominee Phil Angelides, criticized the governor. "Once again, Governor Schwarzenegger has used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians and embarrassed our state," Angelides said in a statement released by his campaign. "His comments reflect a disturbing pattern of behavior. The Governor has a responsibility to conduct himself with dignity."

Garcia criticized Angelides, who trails Schwarzenegger by 13 points in the latest statewide poll, for trying to make political hay from the remarks. "The only embarrassment in California today is Phil Angelides' sad and predictably partisan statement," she said.

It is clear in listening to the tape that the governor and his aides knew they were being recorded, most probably by aide Gary Delsohn, a former Sacramento Bee reporter who was present at the meeting and is now the governor's chief speechwriter.

At one point, Schwarzenegger calls Kennedy a "major, major champion."

"Got that on tape?" Kennedy responds.

"It's on tape," Delsohn answers.

DOJ_NMG_0061357

The comments on the tape are not the first time Schwarzenegger has sparked controversy or that the Los Angeles Times has put it on its front page.

In late August, Schwarzenegger settled a libel lawsuit with former late-night British TV personality Anna Richardson, who claimed she was groped by the Hollywood actor during a 2000 interview and defamed by his aides during his 2003 campaign for governor. Richardson's allegations and those of several other women were the subject of a front page Los Angeles Times article that ran days before Schwarzenegger's election in an unprecedented recall against his predecessor, Democrat Gray Davis.

"Just like the first L.A. Times story, I don't think this one is going to have any effect on the election," said Allan Hoffenblum, a Republican strategist. "Arnold is so well known among voters. No one thinks he's a bigot. He's just being Arnold."

Nonetheless, Hoffenblum said Schwarzenegger knows that the Latino vote in California is crucial for his reelection prospects. However, there was little sign yesterday that Latino leaders had taken offense.

A spokesman for Fabian NuÃ±ez, speaker of the Assembly and a co-chair of Angelides's campaign, said Schwarzenegger's relations with the Hispanic community had always been good. "These are hardly Nixon's Watergate tapes," spokesman Richard Stapler said.

Schwarzenegger Regrets 'Very Hot' Remark (AP-Y)

By Michael R. Blood

AP, September 9, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger apologized Friday for saying in a closed-door meeting that the mixture of Hispanic and black blood gives Puerto Ricans and Cubans "very hot" personalities.

The Republican governor said he cringed when he read his own words in the Los Angeles Times story on Friday and added that the comments, referring to a GOP legislator, were not "meant to be in any negative way." Some critics were outraged, but even some Democrats said his remarks appeared to be more playful than disparaging.

"Anyone out there that feels offended by those comments, I just want to say I'm sorry, I apologize," Schwarzenegger told reporters outside a seaside hotel in Santa Monica.

The statements about Hispanics and blacks were captured on a six-minute tape made during a March 3 speechwriting session between Schwarzenegger and his advisers. On it, Schwarzenegger and chief of staff Susan Kennedy speak affectionately of state Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia and speculate about her nationality.

"I mean Cuban, Puerto-Rican, they are all very hot," the governor says on the recording. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

Schwarzenegger, in a tight re-election race, has displayed a more restrained, statesmanlike demeanor while all but retiring his trademark Hollywood swagger. But the newly disclosed remarks challenge that carefully managed image and provide a reminder of his history of off-the-cuff — and sometimes off-color — remarks.

He once called California legislators "girlie men" and talked of kicking nurses' "butts," the kind of comments he has sought to avoid during his re-election year.

Garcia, who is Puerto Rican, appeared with Schwarzenegger on Friday and said she was not offended by the governor's comments. Garcia earlier told the Times that she often calls herself a "hot-blooded Latina."

Schwarzenegger also said he called leaders from ethnic groups, who he said were not upset.

The Democrat who wants to unseat him, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, said the governor "used language that is deeply offensive to all Californians."

U.S. Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Oakland, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, said Schwarzenegger's "racist comments were disgusting," while Esteban Torres, chairman of the National Latino Media Council, called the remarks "an enormous slip of the Schwarzenegger tongue."

But Assemblyman Mervyn Dymally, a Democrat who chairs the state Legislative Black Caucus, called the remarks "usual political banter. We do this all the time. In this case, it just happened to be taped."

"These are hardly Nixon's Watergate tapes," said Richard Stapler, a spokesman for state Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, a Democrat.

Schwarzenegger aides routinely tape his speechwriting sessions so the writers can keep a record of his thoughts and speaking patterns.

The newspaper did not say how the tape was obtained. The participants suggest during the meeting that they know they are being recorded.

Major Iranian Bank Is Blocked From Using U.S. Financial System (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0061358

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration said it has blocked a major Iranian bank's access to the U.S. financial system, the latest step in Washington's growing attempt to isolate Iran.

Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said Bank Saderat, one of Iran's largest state-owned banks, no longer will be able to use the U.S. financial system. In a speech before the American Enterprise Institute, Mr. Levey said Bank Saderat had helped transfer hundreds of millions of dollars to terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah and Hamas.

The quest to cut off Iran's support to Hezbollah gained urgency this summer when the Shiite Muslim militia and Israel engaged in intense fighting in Lebanon and Hezbollah unleashed hundreds of rockets into Israel. The size of Hezbollah's arsenal raised alarm at the level of Iranian support for the group.

At the same time, the U.S. is eager to show that Iran can be cut off economically in the run-up to United Nations Security Council debates this fall that will focus on ways to impose economic sanctions for Tehran's refusal to give up its nuclear program's uranium-enrichment work.

The move is part of a broader Bush administration effort to hamper Iran's efforts to aid terrorism and acquire sophisticated weapons, by convincing other governments and financial institutions world-wide to stop doing business with Iranian-controlled companies.

"This is an appropriate leveraging of U.S. economic sanctions by authorities to make it more difficult for Iran to use the common international financial infrastructure to engage in buying materials for its nuclear program, to support terrorist activities and to do other bad stuff that jeopardizes security," says Jonathan Winer, a former State Department official in the Clinton administration and now a partner at law firm Alston & Bird LLP.

While Iranian financial institutions can't directly access the U.S. financial system, they can touch it indirectly by working through foreign banks. These so-called "U-turn transactions" allow U.S. banks to process payments involving Iran if the money transfer begins and ends with a non-Iranian foreign bank. Friday's move will prohibit Bank Saderat from participating in transfers involving U.S. banks.That, in turn, will pressure foreign banks to stop dealing with Bank Saderat.

U.S. Moves To Isolate Iranian Banks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

The Bush administration has stepped up a broad effort to choke off Iran's ability to finance militant groups and acquire weapons technology by cutting off suspect banks and firms from the international banking system, U.S. officials said yesterday.

The initiative has gathered steam in recent weeks, even as the U.S.-led effort to bring sanctions against Iran for its nuclear activities has slowed at the U.N. Security Council. Officials have especially focused on Iran's financing of the radical Shiite militant group Hezbollah in the aftermath of Israel's war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon this summer.

The Treasury Department said yesterday it had cut off one of Iran's largest state-owned banks from the U.S. financial system, accusing Bank Saderat of funneling $50 million to a Hezbollah-controlled firm since 2001. The bank -- which has about 3,400 branch offices across the Middle East and elsewhere -- has also been used by Iran to transfer money to Hamas, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, the Treasury Department said.

Iranian banks are already barred from doing business directly with U.S. banks, but U.S. banks are permitted to process payments involving Iran that begin and end with a non-Iranian foreign bank, in what are called "U-turn" transactions. Treasury's action will end such indirect access for Bank Saderat.

On Thursday, Treasury separately targeted two Lebanon-based financial institutions that officials said acted as Hezbollah's unofficial treasury, helping secure loans and finance business deals for the organization, among other things.

Stuart Levey, the Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said he will go to Europe next week to enlist support from governments and financial institutions for severing Iran from the international financial system. Other Treasury and State Department officials are traveling across Asia and the Middle East to make similar pitches.

"This is certainly an example of the variety of different levers that are available not only to the United States, but other countries as well about how to bring about a change in behavior in the Iranian regime," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, referring to the action against Bank Saderat.

"Our actions this week are a sign of the costs that Iran's leaders will impose on the Iranian people if the leadership chooses to remain on its current path of defiance," Levey said yesterday in a speech to the American Enterprise Institute. "The regime will end up isolating Iran from the world community, with reputable financial institutions becoming increasingly unwilling to handle Iran's business."

DOJ_NMG_0061359

Levey noted that earlier this year the Swiss bank UBS ended its dealings with Iran, while two other banks, HSBC and Credit Suisse, sharply curtailed their business.

"The next steps may involve sacrifice, but I think that people are beginning to recognize that the costs we face now pale in comparison to those we might face in the future if Iran does not change course," he said.

Levey said Treasury has had tremendous success against North Korea, which has suffered since Treasury a year ago accused a bank in Macao of being a conduit for North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering. A number of financial institutions around the world immediately stopped doing business with North Korea, Levey said, warning that all financial institutions should consider abandoning dealings with North Korean companies. "The line between North Korea's licit and illicit money is nearly invisible," he said.

North Korea has refused to return to multilateral disarmament talks, citing the Treasury action.

U.S. Cracks Down On Iranian Bank (AP-Y)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, September 9, 2006

The Bush administration, stepping up the pressure on Tehran, moved Friday to sever a big Iranian state-owned bank from the U.S. financial system.

Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said the government's action is against Bank Saderat, which the United States contends is used by Iran to transfer money to terrorist groups, including Hezbollah.

While Iranian financial institutions are barred from directly accessing the U.S. financial system, they are permitted to do so indirectly through a bank in another country. The United States is closing down that avenue for Bank Saderat, a U.S. Treasury official explained. The action, which involved a change in regulations, doesn't apply to other Iranian banks, the official said.

"Today we have cut off one of the largest Iranian state-owned banks, Bank Saderat, from the U.S. financial system," Levey said.

It marked the administration's latest effort to turn up the heat on Iran.

The United States wants the U.N. to impose sanctions against Iran unless the country stops enriching uranium, a key step in making nuclear weapons.

Friday's action also is the latest step to financially clamp down on Hezbollah, which the United States says is bankrolled in large part by Iran.

The U.S. calls Lebanon-based Hezbollah a terrorist group that is suspected of involvement in terrorist attacks worldwide. The U.S. also blamed Hezbollah for triggering recent bloodshed in the Middle East involving Lebanon, Israel and the terrorist organization.

Levey said that since 2001 a Hezbollah-controlled organization, which he did not identify, received $50 million directly from Iran through Bank Saderat.

"Hezbollah has used Bank Saderat to transfer funds, sometimes in the millions of dollars, to support the activities of other terrorist organizations such as Hamas in Gaza," Levey said. "We will no longer allow a bank like Saderat to do business in the American financial system, even indirectly."

Levey will be traveling to Europe, where he'll talk to government officials and business people about persuading banks and other financial institutions to stop doing business with Iran. Some banks are already rethinking their relationships with the country, he said.

"Earlier this year, the Swiss bank UBS cut off all dealing with Iran," Levey said. "HSBC and Credit Suisse have also limited their exposure to Iranian business."

It is a difficult decision for banks to make given Iran's standing in the global economy, including its position as a major oil supplier, Levey acknowledged in an interview with The Associated Press last week.

"The next steps may involve sacrifice, but I think that people are beginning to recognize that the costs we face now pale in comparision to those we might face in the future if Iran does not change course," Levey said Friday.

U.N. Is Moving To Punish Iran, U.S. Envoy Says (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 8 — The United States wants the major powers to begin talks next week on a draft United Nations resolution against Iran if it does not halt its enrichment of uranium, a senior American official said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0061360

“We are heading toward the U.N. Security Council to consider a sanctions regime,” R. Nicholas Burns, the United States under secretary of state for political affairs, said in a speech at the American Academy in Berlin after meeting with diplomats from Britain, France and Germany. He also met separately with representatives of China, Russia, Japan, Italy and Canada.

Mr. Burns said that the meeting with the European diplomats, held Thursday, was “the first time we sat together to discuss what type of sanctions” to impose on Iran. He said talks with them and the diplomats from Russia and China would resume Monday by conference call, and then shift to the United Nations.

“The American view is that following these discussions on Monday, and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution,” he said, adding that sanctions would be “directed at the Iranian government and the nuclear industry” as well as its nuclear research program.

The sanctions proposal would consist of two phases, said a senior diplomat familiar with the talks. The first would aim to limit international travel by Iranian nuclear experts and freeze their assets outside Iran. If the enrichment program continued, the diplomat said, the United States would urge that the travel ban and freeze on assets be extended to top government officials.

He said he hoped a draft resolution would be ready when the General Assembly convenes Sept. 18.

Javier Solana, the European Union’s foreign policy chief, is to meet Saturday with Ali Larijani, Iran’s nuclear negotiator.

U.S. Expects Iran Sanctions Within Weeks (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

The United States expects a Security Council agreement on U.N. sanctions against Iran within weeks unless Tehran agrees at the last minute to freeze uranium enrichment, a senior State Department official said Friday.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns also dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-power coalition pushing Tehran to give up enrichment.

Speaking a day after those countries ended confidential discussions in Berlin, Burns said further talks were needed on how harshly to penalize Tehran for its refusal to freeze enrichment, as demanded by the Security Council. But he said a lot of progress was made.

Outlining the U.S. view of the timetable on Iran in the coming weeks, Burns said the six nations would further consult by phone on Monday and hoped to present a unified approach on sanctions to their foreign ministers by the time the U.N. General Assembly opens Tuesday.

"It's fair to say we have ... a lot more work to do," he told guests at an event staged by The American Academy in Berlin. "But I believe we will be successful in passing the sanctions resolution shortly" in the Security Council, he added.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution" on sanctions, he said.

Thursday's meeting in Berlin came amid efforts by key European nations to enlist world support in pressuring Iran to give up uranium enrichment.

In a confidential document obtained by The Associated Press and sent to dozens of capitals last week, Britain, France and Germany warned that Tehran's stalling tactics on whether it was ready to meet terms for new nuclear talks were an attempt "to split the international community."

But there were indications that France, a key U.S. ally in pushing for firm U.N. action against Iran, might be wavering.

While Iran has expressed a desire for negotiations, the six nations have insisted that Iran suspend enrichment before talks begin. The six countries — Germany plus Security Council powers Britain, France, China, Russia and the U.S. — have offered Iran a package of economic, political and strategic rewards to comply with the demand.

But French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy on Thursday appeared to suggest that demand was negotiable, saying: "The question is to know at what moment this suspension takes place compared to negotiations."

Burns dismissed suggestions of a split, saying all five permanent Security Council members insist negotiations should not start until Iran suspends enrichment.

"I have not heard from any government from this group that we should change the basic offer, that hasn't changed," he said, adding: "No one mentioned anything like this" during Thursday's meeting.

"The Iranians are in a very tough position," Burns said. "At first they thought, let's divide the United States from the EU-3 and that didn't succeed. The Iranians are obviously trying to divide Russia and China from the rest of us, and that hasn't succeeded."

Still, a diplomat familiar with the U.S. stance said Burns was worried about the French statement, which would weaken what has been a unified stance between the four Western countries in the six-nation coalition for a need to move to sanctions if Iran remains defiant.

DOJ_NMG_0061361

Mohammed Khatami, the two-term former Iranian president, suggested that not only France but Russia and China — which have been skeptical about sanctions — were no longer insisting that an enrichment freeze had to precede negotiations.

"As far as I know, Russia, China and France are interested in pursuing the dialogue even without preconditions," he said Thursday in Washington.

Burns spoke on the eve of a crucial meeting between senior EU envoy Javier Solana and Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator. An Iranian official told the AP the talks were set for Vienna, with Larijani scheduled to arrive Friday evening.

The talks are considered a final attempt to find common ground to start negotiations between Iran and the six powers.

As the Americans and their allies worked at the Berlin meeting to overcome Russian and Chinese opposition to sanctions, the European document appealed to other countries for support.

The 1 1/2-page paper labeled "In Confidence" summarizes Iran's response to incentives package. The six powers have also asked Iran to consider a long-term moratorium on the technology, which can be misused to make nuclear arms.

Iran, which insists its nuclear program is meant only to produce fuel, refused suspend enrichment by an Aug. 31 deadline set by the Security Council. Its Aug. 22 response to the rewards offer has been kept confidential. But the United States and its allies have described it as unsatisfactory, primarily because of Tehran's refusal to consider freezing enrichment.

"The Iranian goal obviously is to split the international community," says the document, drawn up by Britain, France and Germany. While not specifically threatening U.N. sanctions, it says the Security Council will have to consider "further steps" if Tehran continues to defy the council.

Diplomats familiar with the document said it was drawn up to inform other nations of the substance of Iran's counteroffer and share the Western view that it was inadequate.

"The reply is along the lines of previous Iranian statements in that typically it neither accepts nor rejects outright" the six-nation proposal, said the document.

U.S. Confident Of Sanctions On Tehran (WT/AP)

By George Jahn

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

BERLIN -- The United States expects a U.N. Security Council agreement on sanctions against Iran within weeks unless Tehran agrees to freeze uranium enrichment, a senior State Department official said yesterday.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns also dismissed suggestions of cracks in the six-nation coalition pushing Tehran to give up enrichment.

Speaking a day after those countries ended confidential discussions in Berlin, Mr. Burns said further talks were needed on how harshly to penalize Tehran for its refusal to freeze enrichment, as demanded by the Security Council. But he said a lot of progress had been made.

In Washington, former Iranian President Mohammed Khatami told a group of American Muslims that they should take the lead in condemning terrorist attacks like the one on September 11, as well the wave of "Islamophobia" and distorted images of Islam that followed the attacks.

"We Muslims should condemn these atrocities even more strongly," he said, speaking through an interpreter.

"Warmongers, those who kill and suppress and those who commit acts of terror, if they identify themselves with Islam," they are lying, he said.

Mr. Khatami, president of Iran from 1997 to 2005, spoke at a dinner hosted by the Council on American-Islamic Relations, the country's largest Muslim civil liberties group, as part of a three-day visit to Washington. He is the highest ranking Iranian official, current or former, to visit the United States since the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

The ex-president is scheduled to conclude his two-week, five-city American tour with a speech at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government in Boston tomorrow.

Outlining the U.S. view of the timetable on Iran in the coming weeks, Mr. Burns said the six nations would further consult by phone on Monday and hoped to present a unified approach on sanctions to their foreign ministers by the time the U.N. General Assembly opens Tuesday.

"It's fair to say we have ... a lot more work to do," he told guests at an event hosted by the American Academy in Berlin. "But I believe we will be successful in passing the sanctions resolution shortly" in the Security Council, he added.

"The American view is that following these discussions on Monday and perhaps some others early next week, we should move this to the Security Council and draft a resolution" on sanctions, he said.

Thursday's meeting in Berlin came amid efforts by key European nations to enlist world support in pressuring Iran to give up uranium enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0061362

While Iran has expressed a desire for negotiations, the six nations have signed off on a proposal that Iran suspend enrichment before talks begin. The six countries -- Germany plus Security Council powers Britain, France, China, Russia and the United States -- have offered Iran a package of economic, political and strategic rewards to comply with the demand.

But French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy on Thursday appeared to suggest that demand was negotiable, saying: "The question is to know at what moment this suspension takes place compared to negotiations."

Mr. Burns dismissed suggestions of a split, saying all five permanent Security Council members insist negotiations should not start until Iran suspends enrichment.

"I have not heard from any government from this group that we should change the basic offer; that hasn't changed," he said, adding: "No one mentioned anything like this" during Thursday's meeting.

"The Iranians are in a very tough position," Mr. Burns said. "At first they thought, let's divide the United States from the EU-3 and that didn't succeed. The Iranians are obviously trying to divide Russia and China from the rest of us, and that hasn't succeeded."

Mr. Burns spoke on the eve of a crucial meeting between senior EU envoy Javier Solana and Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator. An Iranian official said the talks were set for Vienna, Austria.

The talks are considered a final attempt to find common ground to start negotiations between Iran and the six powers.

Khatami Blasts Wave Of 'Islamophobia' (AP-Y)

By William C. Mann

AP, September 9, 2006

Iran's former president decried a wave of "Islamophobia" that he said is being spread in the United States by fear and hatred of Islam in response to terror perpetrated by Muslims.

"In the crime of 9/11, two crimes were committed," Mohammad Khatami said. "One was killing innocent people. The second crime was masking this crime in the name of Islam."

Under smothering security, with dozens of uniformed police and plainclothes American security personnel provided by the State Department, Khatami spoke Friday night at an event sponsored by the Council on American-Islamic Relations called "The Dialogue of Civilizations: Five Years After 9/11."

Khatami is visiting the United States for two weeks, coming to this Washington suburb after two days in the nation's capital. Unlike at an appearance Thursday night in the Washington National Cathedral, no protesters were evident outside the hotel where he spoke. Multiple marked and unmarked security vehicles were outside, and a segment of Jefferson Davis Highway, a main Arlington artery, was shut down while he was there. At least one helicopter swooped repeatedly over the area.

Khatami, the most senior Iranian to visit Washington in a quarter-century, spoke in front of American and Iranian flags, draped in each other's folds.

The talk broke no new ground for Khatami, considered a reformist during his two terms as president that ended last year. He was among the first foreign leaders to condemn the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. His visit to the United States drew criticism from some politicians and others because of the bitter contention now under way between Iran and the United States over actions of his successor, Mahmoud Ahmedinejad

He told his audience through an interpreter that in conditions that have followed the Sept. 11 attacks, American Muslims should show their countrymen by example that they, not terrorists, represent Islam.

"Demonstrate to others that whatever is said about Islam in the media is not correct" and combat the "wave of Islamophobia and hatred of Islam that we unfortunately are experiencing today," he said.

He laid out three goals for Muslims: "Your responsibility and our responsibility is to be first a good citizen in whatever country you live; to try for yourself and your children to move up the ladder of social achievement and education; and third is to fight the vague Islamophobia that has been created by those who don't have the best interests of Islam at heart."

He said "killers who go among others and kill others in acts of terror, if they identify themselves with Islam, they are lying. You Muslims who live in the United States should be representatives of enlightenment and don't allow those who create this Islamophobia" to speak for the religion.

A Cleric Steeped In Ways Of Power (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TEHRAN, Sept. 3 — As Iran defies the West over its nuclear program, the public face of the nation has become the outspoken president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. But it is the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who by most accounts has been the primary architect of Iran's combative foreign policy, and the force behind the president's own power.

DOJ_NMG_0061363

Cloaked in religious robes, with a black turban signaling that he is a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad, Ayatollah Khamenei delivers the same blistering anti-American, anti-British, anti-Israeli message as the president.

His political evolution charts his own rise to power. As the Friday Prayer leader nearly two decades ago, he questioned the absolute power of Iran's supreme leader, saying Islamic law and the Constitution must come first. Today, he has emerged as an aggressive defender of his own right to have the final say in all matters of state and religion — a power he has not been afraid to exercise.

Indeed, political analysts, clerics and former government officials here said they believed that he had pushed for a more confrontational approach with the West because he grew disillusioned with the so-called confidence-building policy pursued by the reformist government of Mohammad Khatami.

They said he also sought to consolidate his power by building a political base among Iran's more fundamentalist circles, which are suspicious of the West. Along the way, he succeeded in sidelining most of those with independent authority, such as the former two-term president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, who pushed to select Ayatollah Khamenei as supreme leader.

"He wanted to preserve his power and he has been quite successful," said Mohsen Kadivar, a senior reformist cleric in Tehran. "His power is stronger today. Everyone who is in power is to obey him, completely. But his authority, which comes from people's support, has not increased."

Ayatollah Khamenei's political evolution from the traditionalist right to the more fundamentalist camp was described in interviews with present and former state officials, clerics who worked with him before and after the revolution, Western diplomats in Tehran and political analysts. Virtually all insisted on anonymity, fearing retribution if they spoke publicly. They all cautioned that they held only pieces of the puzzle.

The supreme leader is such a sensitive subject here that the government press office declined to submit a request to visit his office, or speak with his administrative staff.

When Mr. Ahmadinejad was elected last year, many analysts and present and former officials said he was Ayatollah Khamenei's candidate. But when the president came out with his aggressive comments — about nuclear energy and Israel in particular — many wondered aloud if the leader's candidate was speaking without the consent of his prime patron. It is still impossible to know whether, for example, the president asked for permission before sending letters to world leaders, including President Bush.

But Ayatollah Khamenei (pronounced kha-meh-neh-ee) erased some of that confusion late last month, when he made statements siding with the president against the Guardian Council, which oversees all government decisions, and Parliament. In a news conference last month, Mr. Ahmadinejad acknowledged that Ayatollah Khamenei had advised his administration to try to broaden its circle of advisers and reach out to more "intellectuals."

When Ayatollah Khamenei was chosen 17 years ago to succeed Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the father of the Islamic Republic, he was finishing his second term as president, a relatively weak job then because there was also a prime minister.

The ayatollah, a midlevel cleric without a strong political base, was chosen in part because he was not seen as a threat to other powerful clerics or politicians, political analysts in Tehran said. In fact, for his first six years as leader, it was President Rafsanjani who ran the state, according to people who worked with both men.

Over time, Ayatollah Khamenei created a system that many political analysts and Western diplomats here say is less a theocracy and more an autocracy — with loyalty to the leader the prerequisite for influence.

Ayatollah Khamenei has strong ties to the Basij volunteer morality squads and the Revolutionary Guards, and has won the allegiance of some powerful seminaries in the religious center of Qum by giving them state funds. He also has strong allies in the Guardian Council and the Assembly of Experts, which technically exercises oversight of the leader.

While Iran's elected officials are subjected to public scrutiny and criticism, the supreme leader is not. He is more than a head of state; he is a symbol of two core elements of the Islamic Republic's official identity — revolution and religion. As a result, assessing the leader is a red line in Iran, one few people are willing to cross, at least publicly.

The Constitution gives the supreme leader near total control of the state, though officials like to emphasize that he is selected by the Assembly of Experts, which is elected by the public. The leader appoints all military and security commanders, he has the power to declare war and must confirm the election of the president. He appoints the head of the judiciary, more than half the members of the Guardian Council and the head of state television.

Still, Iran is not a country ruled by decree. There are multiple power centers and competing agendas, requiring that major decisions be made after consultation and compromise.

As Ayatollah Khamenei has consolidated power, he has defined Iran's agenda. He supports Iran's right to pursue nuclear energy, rails against the failure of "liberal democracy" and often talks about the "usurper Zionist regime" — just as President Ahmadinejad does.

Here is what the supreme leader said at a conference in Tehran in April:

DOJ_NMG_0061364

"The bitter and venomous taste of Western liberal democracy, which the United States has hypocritically been trying to portray through its propaganda as a healing remedy, has hurt the body and soul of the Islamic Ummah and burned the hearts of Muslims."

Ayatollah Khamenei appears to have gravitated closer to the fundamentalists. But he has always held conservative values. In a 1996 interview with the hard-line journal Sobh, for example, he wrote that children should not be allowed to play music. "Teaching music is not in accordance with the Islamic establishment, and teaching music to schoolchildren brings corruption," he said.

In early power struggles over the scope of the supreme leader's authority, however, he spoke out in support of limits. In the early years of President Khatami's reformist rule, he tolerated some popular changes relaxing social restrictions and allowing more freedom of the press.

But he appears to have worked steadily to undermine Mr. Khatami, and those efforts accelerated after he sensed that the reform movement was challenging his authority. One former high-ranking reformer who remains friendly with Ayatollah Khamenei said that the biggest mistake the reformers made was to challenge the power of the supreme leader.

The former official, who is still involved in politics and said he meets regularly with Ayatollah Khamenei, said many of the supreme leader's decisions were based on political calculations aimed at preserving his power. "He reacted to efforts by radicals among the reformers to weaken him," the former official said.

When Ayatollah Khomeini died in 1989, the country's leaders had talked about creating a council to replace him. The logic was twofold: there was a sense that no one could command the same authority and respect as Ayatollah Khomeini, and other officials did not want to cede power to a new leader, people familiar with the decision process said.

Mr. Rafsanjani, then the speaker of Parliament, was one of Iran's most powerful men. He pressed for a new supreme leader, saying it was essential to have one person in that post — and he pushed through the selection of Ayatollah Khamenei.

"Rafsanjani definitely played a role in making him leader," said Mahmoud Vaezi, a former deputy foreign minister who now sits on the Expediency Council, which arbitrates disputes between the elected and appointed arms of government.

But in time, the supreme leader figured out how to project his authority. He changed his dress, from elegant clerical robes to the more conservative, simple and traditional religious garb hidden beneath a flowing black cape. He also draped around his neck a kaffiyeh, the checkered scarf that is a symbol of resistance.

"Nobody should forget that as the leader, he is a revolutionary and a religious man," said Mehdi Karoubi, a cleric and former speaker of Parliament who was among the early followers of Ayatollah Khomeini. "In his public comments he has to reflect those realities."

The leader's consolidation of power appeared to reach its height on the day of the new president's inauguration ceremony last year, when Mr. Ahmadinejad made a very public gesture of obedience by gently leaning over to kiss his hand.

Still, Ayatollah Khamenei is known to consult widely before making a final decision. And he has made efforts to appear inclusive, reaching beyond his base. Recently, for example, he created a new strategic foreign policy committee and put a former official from Mr. Khatami's reform government in charge, although the official is related to the leader.

Many Iranians who know him describe the ayatollah as a man who loves the arts, writes poetry and is a voracious reader. And most confine themselves to safe generalities: "He is a very kind, sincere, joyful person," said Muhammad Ali Besherati, a former interior minister.

Ayatollah Khamenei was born in 1939 in Mashhad, a holy city in northeastern Iran. His father was a cleric, and according to his own biography, an ascetic who lived a life of few comforts. He was a follower of Ayatollah Khomeini and is said to have been a strong supporter of the students who stormed the United States Embassy in 1979 and held the staff hostage for 444 days. He was first elected president in 1981 and was re-elected to a second term in 1985.

In important early battles over the scope of the supreme leader's power, Ayatollah Khamenei apparently took a more moderate stance than his predecessor. In December 1987, he first spoke out in favor of limits on that power in a conflict between Parliament and the Guardian Council, which sought to nullify a labor law Ayatollah Khomeini had backed, saying it conflicted with Shariah, or Islamic law.

Mr. Khamenei, speaking at Friday Prayer, suggested that the Constitution had to be observed by everyone and that laws had to respect Shariah. Mr. Khomeini rebuffed him, stating that the supreme leader could overrule even Islamic law.

In 1989, Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa authorizing the murder of Salman Rushdie for his book "The Satanic Verses." At the time, Mr. Khamenei was the leader of the Friday Prayer sermon, a post that allowed him to address the nation.

"Islam is the religion of blessing and kindness," he was quoted as saying in the Feb. 15, 1989, edition of the newspaper Kayhan. "And anyone who repents of what he has done, no matter how serious the sin, he ought to be optimistic of being forgiven by God."

He was again rebuffed by Ayatollah Khomeini, who issued a scathing public rebuttal.

DOJ_NMG_0061365

Israel Ends Its Blockade Of Lebanon's Coastline (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 8 — Israel lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon on Friday, releasing its last major chokehold on the country since war broke out in July.

Fishing boats, their crews hoping to salvage what was left of the season before winter set in, chugged out to sea while water skiers and wind surfers skimmed the waves without worry for the first time in nearly two months.

More important for the Lebanese economy, ships loaded with cars, food and oil steamed toward Beirut. Trade routes to the country were cut in mid-July during the opening days of the war, and Israel had maintained the blockade even after a cease-fire was declared in mid-August. The embargo has cost the country hundreds of millions of dollars in lost trade.

Israel said it had turned over responsibility for patrolling the Lebanese coast to Italian warships, which would help the Lebanese Navy enforce a United Nations-mandated arms embargo against Hezbollah.

"The naval blockade has ended," said David Baker, an official in the office of the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert. "The international forces have taken their positions."

Many experts here believe that Hezbollah still has plenty of weapons, and they doubt that it would try to import more arms now in any case. Few Lebanese, meanwhile, believe the multinational naval presence can do much to stop any banned shipments that do come. Hezbollah's already strong political influence in Lebanon has grown in the wake of the war.

Under the United Nations-brokered agreement that ended the blockade, the interim naval force is to remain six nautical miles from the coast and carry out searches of vessels only at the request of the Lebanese Navy. The multinational naval force is not authorized to act on its own.

The blockade was to have been lifted Thursday, but the action was delayed by confusion over who was to lead the naval force until German ships arrive to take over the task. France, which has had two ships in place since the conflict began, was initially expected to take the lead, but that role was shifted to the Italians, who have four ships offshore.

The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon said it had already established a naval operations center to coordinate all operational details.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy, and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their businesses," read a statement issued by Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, chief of the United Nations force.

The number of troops committed to the force continued to rise, with Italy saying that it would soon deploy more troops to southern Lebanon. The first of 900 French troops are expected to begin arriving there Saturday, and 500 Lebanon-bound troops left Spain by ship on Friday.

Italy's foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, said in Tel Aviv that the number of peacekeepers in southern Lebanon could reach 5,000 by the end of next week.

"It will be possible to have an agreement on the withdrawal of Israeli troops in the next 10 days," he told reporters.

A spokesman for the United Nations force said that peacekeepers from Guyana, part of the earlier United Nations presence, had begun patrolling in the central and western sectors of southern Lebanon, while Indian peacekeepers were patrolling in the southeast.

He said the force had turned over three sectors north of Naqura to the Lebanese Army. Agence France-Presse reported that troops from Lebanon's Sixth Brigade, supported by tanks, entered 10 villages in the region on Friday.

Israel sent thousands of troops into southern Lebanon during the war, and they have been steadily withdrawing, though some remain in the border area.

...

But the Israeli news media reported Friday that military officials hope to complete the withdrawal before the Jewish New Year, which begins Sept. 22.

In another development, Mr. Olmert said that if Lebanon fulfilled its obligations under the United Nations resolution that ended the fighting, then Israel would be willing to discuss Shabaa Farms, a disputed piece of land near where the borders of Syria, Lebanon and Israel converge.

Israel captured Shabaa Farms from Syria as part of the Golan Heights in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. However, Lebanon now claims the 10-square-mile swath of land, which overlooks Israel's Hula Valley.

When Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000, the United Nations, which marked the border with Israel, did not put Shabaa Farms in Lebanon. The land has been a point of contention since then, and is often mentioned by Hezbollah as a continued Israeli occupation of Lebanese territory.

Resistance to Israeli occupation is the principal reason Hezbollah gives for keeping its arms.

DOJ_NMG_0061366

Mr. Olmert's remarks, made Thursday night at a meeting with the visiting Russian foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, suggested that Hezbollah would have to disarm before any negotiations took place.

Israel failed to make Hezbollah do that by force in the recent fighting, however, and there is currently no political power inside Lebanon strong enough to compel the group to give up its weapons.

Israel Lifts Lebanese Sea Blockade (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

Move Ends Restrictions Imposed at Outbreak of War With Hezbollah

BEIRUT, Sept. 8 -- Israel lifted its eight-week-old maritime blockade of Lebanon on Friday, the United Nations announced, and within hours a gleaming white ship pulled into Beirut harbor carrying a load of appliances.

The reopening of sea lanes to Lebanon, which the United Nations said took place in the early afternoon, came one day after Israel lifted its blockade of air traffic, completing the end to suffocating restrictions imposed when war broke out between Israel and the Hezbollah militia on July 12.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy, and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their businesses," said Gen. Alain Pellegrini, the commander of U.N. forces in Lebanon.

The head of the Beirut International Chamber of Navigation, Elie Zakhour, told reporters that six cargo ships were bound for the Lebanese capital carrying cars and containers of other goods. The lineup reflected Beirut's role as a regional hub for imports and exports, a major component of the Lebanese economy that withered under restrictions even after fighting ended on Aug. 14.

Israel said it imposed the blockade to prevent arms shipments to Hezbollah, the militant Shiite Muslim movement that battled Israeli forces for 33 days in the rugged hills along the Lebanon-Israel border. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert relaxed the restrictions only on assurances from the United Nations that European ships and soldiers would join Lebanese forces in making sure Hezbollah could not receive supplies from abroad.

For now, Israeli patrol boats are turning over surveillance duties to Italian ships in the Mediterranean off Lebanon, Israeli and U.N. officials said. French and Greek navy ships have also promised to help patrol the area for an interim period. In the long term, the German navy has shouldered responsibility for working with the Lebanese military to guarantee that no arms reach Hezbollah.

Olmert announced Wednesday that he would lift the air and sea blockade Thursday evening. Unrestricted commercial airline flights to Beirut resumed as expected, but the sea blockade was maintained while Israeli officials sought additional assurances from the United Nations. More coordination took place Friday morning, and the commander of an Italian task force assumed responsibility for the patrols Friday afternoon, a U.N. spokesman said.

"It is our understanding that the international force is operational, and the Israelis turned it over to the Italians as of 1300 hours," or 1 p.m. local time, said Alexander Ivanko, a spokesman for Pellegrini.

Israeli officials said the airline flights were allowed to resume because German officials were on duty at Beirut's Rafiq al-Hariri International Airport monitoring airfreight traffic. But the Lebanese minister for public works and transportation, Mohammed Safadi, said that the Germans were providing only technical assistance and that customs matters were the responsibility of Lebanese authorities. Similarly, he said, the Italian ships would be assigned to help Lebanese authorities monitor sea shipments.

A senior Lebanese official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Hezbollah insisted that any European sea patrols or customs help be under the aegis of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, or UNIFIL. As a result, the Italian ships have been baptized "the maritime UNIFIL." In any case, he said, Hezbollah officials are not worried about resupplying since their weapons come mainly from Iran via Syria, and smuggling is an old tradition along the long, porous Lebanon-Syria border.

With that in mind, Israel had demanded that German soldiers join Lebanese army and Internal Security Forces personnel along the border. But Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, reflecting Hezbollah's concerns, refused, saying the Germans would provide only equipment and training to the Lebanese.

Meanwhile, Israeli officials were quoted in news reports as saying that Israeli soldiers who were still inside Lebanon would probably withdraw within about two weeks. The Italian foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, said the number of foreign UNIFIL troops in the region would reach 5,000 by next week, which has been a benchmark for completing the Israeli withdrawal.

Spain's parliament approved the dispatch of 1,000 Spanish troops to further reinforce the U.N. peacekeeping contingent, according to news agency reports from Madrid. The force, which had stood at 2,000, has climbed above 3,000 with the arrival last week of about 900 Italian troops, out of a pledged 3,000, and several hundred French troops, out of a pledged 2,000. Under the U.N. Security Council resolution that ended the fighting, the force is scheduled to reach 15,000, along with a deployment of 15,000 Lebanese army troops.

DOJ_NMG_0061367

Correspondent Scott Wilson in Jerusalem contributed to this report.

Israel Lifts Naval Blockade On Lebanon (FT)

By Andrew England And Harvey Morris

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Israel lifted its two-month blockade of Lebanese ports on Friday, ending its ban on ships and boats entering or leaving the country, as United Nations-backed naval forces began patrols of the Lebanese coast.

The blockade had originally been scheduled to end on Thursday but Israel demanded that the UN forces be in place to prevent weapons from being smuggled into Lebanon, before it withdrew.

Israel finally lifted its eight-week air blockade of Lebanon on Thursday, removing an important barrier to the country's postwar reconstruction.

But at the last minute Jerusalem announced it was delaying removing the sea embargo, saying it first wanted international naval vessels to begin monitoring Lebanon's coastline.

Mark Regev, Israeli foreign ministry spokesman, said: "Unfortunately, the international presence is not yet ready to enforce the sea embargo. When the internationals are ready to enforce the arms embargo on the sea, we will be ready to lift the blockade."

A Lebanese official said the government had been in contact with the United Nations and was told there were "logistical issues", but it expected the embargo to be lifted soon.

Lebanon said the blockade was costing the nation tens of millions of dollars a day and restricted the import of goods - many of which would come through the port - hampering efforts to reconstruct the country following Israel's bombardment, which destroyed thousands of buildings, as well as roads, bridges and factories.

Israel imposed the blockade after the conflict between Israel and Hizbollah erupted on July 12. The fighting ended with an August 14 UN-brokered ceasefire but Israel refused to lift the embargo until it was satisfied enough foreign forces were deployed to prevent Hizbollah rearming.

After a flurry of diplomatic activity and international pressure, it was agreed that French, Italian, Greek and British ships could patrol Lebanon's coast until a German task force arrives. Italian and French ships are already off Lebanon's coast but details of the naval force and its mandate still had to be worked out.

In Israel, the families of the two soldiers whose July 12 capture by Hizbollah triggered the fighting, complained that removing the blockade weakened Jerusalem's negotiating leverage to secure their freedom.

At Beirut's port and airport, staff were hoping for a resumption of normal business.

The loss of business has been huge. Normally, the airport would expect 15,000 to 16,000 arrivals daily in the peak summer months of July and August, and 120 flights. That was expected to increase by 20 per cent this year. But instead the airport found itself the target of Israeli bombs, damaging its three runways and taxiways, said Hamdi Chaouk, director general of civil aviation.

Mr Chaouk told the Financial Times that all but one hole had been repaired and he was confident that business would shortly reach normal levels, describing the airport as the "gate of Lebanon".

"It's a big issue, especially the airport, it's like telling people their country is closed and there are no communications with the rest of the world," he said. "It's like you have taken a sick person out of the emergency room."

He added that airport security was at international standards, saying there would be no foreign monitoring at the airport. "The Germans, British and Americans; everybody came here and found there was nothing to be done," he said.

Israel Lifts Sea Blockade Of Lebanon (AP)

By Hussein Dakroub

AP, September 9, 2006

Israel lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon on Friday, ending the country's two months of isolation as the task of preventing the entry of Hezbollah weapons falls to international warships patrolling offshore.

In a further boost to peace efforts, Israel also said it plans to pull the last of its troops out of Lebanon within two weeks.

The sea blockade's end, which came a day after Israel dropped its restrictions on air travel into Lebanon, lifts a barrier that has stifled Lebanon and cost the country tens of millions of dollars as it tries to rebuild from the devastating 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their business," Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon, said.

Even before the formal announcement, a Lebanese cargo ship docked at Beirut's port, carrying industrial raw materials, ceramic tiles and appliances — the first commercial ship to land since the war began July 12.

DOJ_NMG_0061368

Lebanon's resumption of control over its sea and skies was the latest boost in implementing the U.N.-brokered cease-fire that began Aug. 14.

The focus now shifts to the complicated process of withdrawing Israeli troops from southern Lebanon and replacing them with 15,000 Lebanese soldiers and a similar number of U.N. peacekeepers who are to maintain a border buffer zone free of Hezbollah weapons.

Israel has been gradually pulling out its soldiers — whose number peaked at 30,000 at the war's end — as international replacements move into place.

The Israeli army would not say exactly how many of its soldiers remain, citing security reasons, but a spokeswoman said the military held only about 25 percent of the ground in southern Lebanon that it did previously.

When the fighting ended, Israeli soldiers were present in a strip along the length of the Lebanon-Israel border and in a corridor of territory leading nearly 18 miles north to the Litani River.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has been pressing Israel to pull out all its soldiers once 5,000 U.N. peacekeepers are on the ground by mid-September. About 3,250 U.N. soldiers are already in Lebanon.

On Thursday, Israeli security officials said the target was to have Israel's remaining troops out by the Jewish New Year, which begins the evening of Sept. 22.

Hezbollah fighters have been lying low, with armed guerrillas rarely seen in towns and villages of the south. In one rare sighting, some witnesses said they saw Hezbollah fighters on motorbikes inspecting a recently evacuated Israeli position.

The U.N. resolution that set up the cease-fire calls for the eventual disarmament of Hezbollah's Shiite guerrillas, but the peacekeeping force does not have a mandate to search out weapons and take them.

That job is up to the Lebanese army, Annan says, but Lebanon has not said whether it will do so. It appeared the peacekeepers will aim to ensure that guerrillas are not seen in public with weapons and that no new arms are moved in.

Pellegrini said the rules of engagement — under which U.N. troops are allowed to shoot — were being explained to contributing states and to forces on the ground.

"It will be a robust Chapter 6, with an effective use of force," he said, referring to the section of the U.N. Charter that allows troops to enforce peace rather than simply monitor it.

The new U.N. peacekeepers can shoot not only in self defense, but also to fulfill missions, such as arresting suspects who break the peace in south Lebanon and preventing attacks, Pellegrini said.

"But we will only operate in support of the Lebanese army," he told The Associated Press.

The withdrawal and deployment process is a delicate one. U.N. peacekeepers are effectively the go-betweens, checking with Israelis to ensure they have pulled out of each area before Lebanese soldiers move in, to ensure there is no friction between them.

"We'd much rather avoid them," a Lebanese officer said Friday as peacekeepers farther down the road announced they had received clearance for hundreds of Lebanese soldiers to proceed into a corner of southwest Lebanon.

Dozens of camouflaged Lebanese military trucks with a few vintage jeeps and armored vehicles lined a busy coast road in Mansouri, about 10 miles north of the border with Israel. The trucks were stacked with chairs, kitchen utensils and water supplies as the troops move into another area from which the Lebanese army has been absent for decades.

Hezbollah held control in the south for years, effectively running a state within a state, but the new deployment of Lebanese soldiers and U.N. troops reins in its domination.

With the lifting of the sea blockade, U.N. troops now face their first test in preventing weapons getting to Hezbollah, which is believed to get its arsenal from Iran and Syria. Lebanese troops are in place on the border with Syria to prevent smuggling.

A combined task force of French, Italian and Greek warships began patrolling Lebanon's Mediterranean coast just after noon Friday, a mission it will carry out for about two months until a longer-term force of German vessels moves in.

"The Italian-led task force will continue to enforce the international embargo against the supply of armaments to Hezbollah," Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said, announcing the end of the Israeli blockade.

French military officials said a dozen vessels could take part in the initial operation, patrolling six miles off the coast while Lebanese military vessels operate closer to shore.

International officials are also helping Lebanese authorities at ports, land border crossings and Beirut's airport, keeping an eye out to ensure no arms slip through.

Associated Press writers Alfred de Montesquiou in Mansouri, Lebanon, and Amy Teibel in Jerusalem contributed to this report.

Israel Lifts Sea Blockade Of Beirut (WT/AP)

By Hussein Dakroub

DOJ_NMG_0061369

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

BEIRUT -- Israel lifted its sea blockade of Lebanon yesterday, ending the country's two months of isolation as the task of preventing the entry of Hezbollah weapons fell to international warships patrolling offshore.

In a further boost to peace efforts, Israel also said it plans to pull the last of its troops out of Lebanon within two weeks.

The sea blockade's end, which came a day after Israel dropped its restrictions on air travel into Lebanon, lifts a barrier that has stifled Lebanon and cost the country tens of millions of dollars as it tries to rebuild from the devastating 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"The blockade has seriously undermined the Lebanese economy and it is high time for it to end so as to allow the people to get back to their business," said Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

Even before the formal announcement, a Lebanese cargo ship moored at Beirut's port, carrying industrial raw materials, ceramic tiles and appliances -- the first commercial ship to land since the war began July 12.

Lebanon's resumption of control over its waters and skies was the latest boost in implementing the U.N.-brokered cease-fire that began Aug. 14.

The focus now shifts to the complicated process of withdrawing Israeli troops from southern Lebanon and replacing them with 15,000 Lebanese soldiers and a similar number of U.N. peacekeepers who are to maintain a border buffer zone free of Hezbollah weapons.

Israel has been gradually pulling out its soldiers -- whose number peaked at 30,000 at the war's end -- as international replacements move into place.

The Israeli army would not say exactly how many of its soldiers remain, citing security reasons, but a spokeswoman said the military held only about 25 percent of the ground in southern Lebanon that it did previously.

When the fighting ended, Israeli soldiers were present in a strip along the length of the Lebanon-Israel border and in a corridor of territory leading nearly 18 miles north to the Litani River.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has been pressing Israel to pull out all its soldiers after 5,000 U.N. peacekeepers are on the ground by mid-September. About 3,250 U.N. soldiers are already in Lebanon.

On Thursday, Israeli security officials said the goal is to have Israel's remaining troops out by the Jewish New Year, which begins the evening of Sept. 22.

Hezbollah fighters have been lying low, with armed guerrillas rarely seen in towns and villages in the south. In one rare sighting, some witnesses said they saw Hezbollah fighters on motorbikes inspecting a recently evacuated Israeli position.

The U.N. resolution that set up the cease-fire calls for the eventual disarmament of Hezbollah's Shi'ite guerrillas, but the peacekeeping force does not have a mandate to seek out weapons and take them.

The new U.N. peacekeepers can shoot not only in self-defense, but also to fulfill missions, such as arresting suspects who break the peace in south Lebanon and in preventing attacks, Gen. Pellegrini said.

"But we will only operate in support of the Lebanese army," he said.

Dozens of camouflaged Lebanese military trucks with a few vintage jeeps and armored vehicles lined a busy coast road in Mansouri, about 10 miles north of the border with Israel. The trucks were stacked with chairs, kitchen utensils and water supplies as the troops move into another area from which the Lebanese army has been absent for decades.

Hezbollah held control in the south for years, effectively running a state within a state, but the new deployment of Lebanese soldiers and U.N. troops may check its domination.

With the lifting of the sea blockade, U.N. troops now face their first test in preventing weapons from getting to Hezbollah, which is believed to get its arsenal from Iran and Syria. Lebanese troops are in place on the border with Syria to prevent smuggling.

A combined task force of French, Italian and Greek warships began patrolling Lebanon's Mediterranean coast just after noontime yesterday, a mission it will carry out for about two months until a longer-term force of German vessels moves in.

Lebanon Emerges From War More Divided Than Ever (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

On the morning of July 12, hours after Hizbollah captured two Israeli soldiers, officials from the Shia militant group came to the Beirut office of Fouad Siniora, prime minister, to tell him not to worry – Israel's response would be mild.

Mr Siniora reminded them of the harsh retaliation to an earlier capture of an Israeli soldier in the Gaza Strip. The Hizbollah officials said Lebanon was not Gaza.

"You misread the situation," said Mr Siniora, according to an official familiar with the meeting. "They'll destroy us."

DOJ_NMG_0061370

Israel began to pound Lebanon day and night. Mr Siniora's prediction had become Lebanon's frightening reality. A career banker accidentally thrust last year into the top job after the killing of the former prime minister Rafiq Hariri, the man he had long served as finance minister, the 63-year-old Mr Siniora was trapped.

He was under attack by Israel. The US had refused to call for an early ceasefire. Facing an imposed war, the government had no control over Hizbollah, and its ability to influence it was further constrained by tense relations with Syria and Iran, Hizbollah's two backers.

Tearful at times but resolute at others, Mr Siniora worked with Nabih Berri, the powerful Shia speaker of parliament and mediator with Hizbollah, to steer Lebanon through the 34-day crisis. He focused on averting sectarian conflict and keeping a fractious government (in which Hizbollah is a minority partner) together.

He balanced all concerned parties' demands but managed to win concessions, not least Hizbollah's consent to the deployment of the Lebanese army and an expanded UN peacekeeping force near the border with Israel, where the militant group had been the sole power.

The work was hard, but managing the postwar period could prove more daunting.

After projecting a common front during the war, Lebanon has emerged politically divided, socially polarised and with an economy in tatters.

Economists put the total cost of direct and indirect damage to the economy at at least $9bn (£4.8bn, €7bn), or nearly half the country's GDP. The biggest blow, they say, is the loss of confidence in an economy with $39bn in debt and a reliance on investment and tourism flows from the Arab world. Some companies are already announcing lay-offs. Others say they may not be able to pay back their bank loans.

Hizbollah, difficult to rein in before the war, now appears more defiant. The group and its allies, including the Christian leader General Michel Aoun, started calling for a change of government as soon as the fighting stopped.

Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah chief, has said the postwar challenges require a government of national unity that brings in a key Christian element like the Aoun movement.

For Walid Jumblatt, leader of Lebanon's Druze minority and a Hizbollah opponent, however, these calls amount to a "political takeover" in the aftermath of what he considered to have been a "military coup" by Hizbollah on July 12. He fears the group will link the handover of two Israeli soldiers to the Lebanese government, as demanded by Israel, to its calls for a new government.

Meanwhile Hizbollah's rush to mollify a Shia community devastated by the conflict with the efficient handout of cash and reconstruction assistance has exposed the government's tardiness.

The pro-western Sunni and Christian parliamentary majority that backs Mr Siniora has appeared paralysed and his fractious cabinet unco-ordinated.

Though furious at Hizbollah for sparking the war, the Sunni bloc that leads the majority has avoided open criticism of the group to avoid provoking Shia-Sunni tensions.

Perhaps most disturbing for the government is that Hizbollah's claimed victory against Israeli troops has emboldened Syria. The alleged role of Damascus in the Hariri assassination is under investigation by a UN commission. Syria denies any involvement.

Since Mr Nasrallah declared that he would not have ordered the July 12 attack had he known what its devastating impact would be, some Shia voices have expressed rare dissatisfaction with the group. And the parliamentary majority says that with time and help from the world community Hizbollah's power could be curbed.

"Their rockets were not a deterrent for Israeli bombings and their weapons now cannot be used because their own community has seen the result," says Samir Franjie, an MP from the parliamentary majority.

But there are no restrictions on Hizbollah outside the 20km buffer zone created by the UN ceasefire. And, as Timor Goksel, a former Unifil official who now teaches at the American University of Beirut, says, "they [Hizbollah] are adaptable and there is a very lucrative arms market where you they can buy weapons and the delivery is guaranteed."

But Mr Siniora, whose popularity has been rising, is pressing ahead. He insists there will be no change of government. He is emphasising the need for a resolution of the Shebaa farms dispute, the small occupied border land that Hizbollah says should be liberated before the fate of its armed wing is decided. He has also tried to seize back the reconstruction initiative from Hizbollah, announcing compensation for destroyed homes and winning international commitments for $940m in early recovery aid.

Aides say Mr Siniora remains characteristically optimistic.

"The government is working on enlarging the room of manoeuvre it has on the basis of consensus with all Lebanese," says an official. "There are a lot of obstacles and doubts that it will work. But what is the alternative?"

DOJ_NMG_0061371

Explosions Hit Indian Mosque, Stoking Fear Of Further Violence (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta And Hari Kumar

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

NEW DELHI, Sept. 8 — A series of explosions struck in and near the largest mosque in a flashpoint textile town in western India on Friday, killing more than two dozen people, wounding more than 100 and raising the specter of renewed sectarian clashes.

The police said there were three explosions, two inside the mosque compound and one nearby, in Malegaon, a city of about 500,000 with a history of Hindu-Muslim violence, about 160 miles north of Mumbai, the financial capital.

The mosque is also home to one of the largest Muslim cemeteries in the area, local residents said, and the blasts struck shortly after unusually crowded Friday Prayers, as worshipers prepared graves for honoring the dead on the Shab-e-Barat holiday.

Speaking to reporters here in the capital, Home Minister Shivraj Patil called the explosions a "terrorist" attack designed to provoke a clash between "different sections of society."

The country has suffered a spate of terrorist attacks in recent years, including the July 7 commuter train bombings in Mumbai, which the authorities have blamed on Islamist militants setting up so-called sleeper cells across the country.

The bombings on Friday were unusual in that they seemed to target a heavily Muslim area. No one claimed responsibility and the authorities declined to speculate on who could be responsible.

The attacks came three days after what now sounds like a prophetic warning from the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, about the many-headed specter of violence threatening his country. The threats range from Maoist guerrillas in the rural heartland to ethnic separatists in the northeast to Muslim militants challenging Indian rule in contested Kashmir and groups affiliated with global terrorist outfits.

"We confront a wide array of complex internal security problems and threats," Mr. Singh told a meeting of chief ministers on Tuesday here in the capital. He called for improving the intelligence apparatus and training police to better counter terrorist groups. He also pressed for the need to "assuage feelings of insecurity among our minorities, especially Muslims."

In the last year alone, India has witnessed a series of attacks on civilian targets, including at busy markets in Delhi, a Hindu temple in eastern Varanasi, and against tourists in Kashmir. The only other attack on an explicitly Muslim site was a January explosion inside a mosque in Delhi.

The Indian home secretary, V. K. Duggal, said in a televised press conference that one of the blasts resulted from explosives tied to a bicycle. Television footage showed a grisly parade of men carrying the wounded in their arms, or on hand carts used to ply goods to market.

Anil Kumbhare, a police superintendent in Malegaon, said Friday that 29 people had died.

...

Additional police officers were sent to Malegaon to guard against a potential outbreak of Hindu-Muslim violence. Immediately after the blasts, television footage showed angry crowds chasing police officers and politicians.

Bombings Kill 31, Injure 125 In Mainly Muslim City In India (WP)

By Muneeza Naqvi

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

NEW DELHI, Sept. 8 -- At least two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded Friday in the town of Malegaon in the western Indian state of Maharashtra, killing 31 people and injuring 125 more, most of them Muslim worshipers leaving a mosque after Friday afternoon prayers.

The first bomb went off in a graveyard, and the second on a crowded street a short distance away, officials in the local police control room said.

Thousands of people were out on the streets Friday to mark Shab-e-Barat, also called the night of atonement or forgiveness, a Muslim religious event in which people offer prayers for the souls of dead relatives in graveyards.

"It is a terrorist act. It is done by people who don't want peace," said Vilasrao Deshmukh, the state's chief minister, according to the Associated Press. There was no immediate assertion of responsibility, but some officials called the attacks an attempt to resume India's long history of communal violence between Hindus and Muslims.

In July, a series of bombs detonated on commuter trains in Mumbai, also known as Bombay, killing 182 people and wounding more than 800, most of them Hindus. Police later arrested several Muslim men in connection with those attacks.

Malegaon, a predominantly Muslim city whose economy is dominated by textile production, is located about 160 miles northeast of Mumbai. It has been the scene of communal fighting in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0061372

Television footage on Friday showed chaos as hundreds of people, mostly men in white skullcaps, rushed around in panic after the explosions. There were scenes of people carrying the bodies of the dead and injured. Doctors worked on bloodied survivors brought in on stretchers. People seeking loved ones viewed bodies laid out on the ground, covered by white shrouds.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh condemned the blasts, appealing in a statement for "peace and communal harmony." He was consulting with officials from the central government and the local state.

National security forces, including personnel from the anti-riot Rapid Action Force, were being sent to Malegaon, according to the Press Trust of India.

Police said groups gathered around the town and shouted slogans against the local authorities. A curfew was imposed in an attempt to prevent further violence.

India Bombings Kill 31, Injure 100 (AP-Y)

By Aftab Khan

AP, September 9, 2006

Two bombs rigged to bicycles exploded in throngs of Muslims as they left Friday prayers at a mosque in this western Indian city, killing 31 people and wounding 100.

A top official called the blasts "a terrorist act," and authorities — fearing revenge attacks across the country's fragile religious divides — clamped a curfew on Malegaon and put security forces on alert.

The curfew was lifted Saturday morning, but thousands of police and paramilitary soldiers watched over hundreds of Muslims worshippers as they offered prayers in Malegaon. Inside the city's hospitals, relatives of victims wept as they watched bodies being readied for funerals.

Malegaon, a center of India's textile industry about 180 miles northeast of Mumbai, has long been the scene of violence between Hindus and Muslims. The city of about 500,000 people is 75 percent Muslim.

No one has claimed responsibility for the attacks, which happened near one of the city's main mosques on a Muslim festival day. Officials aggressively deployed teams of police to sensitive parts of the state.

"Law and order is under control," P.S. Pasricha, Maharashtra state's director-general of police, told The Associated Press. "There's a high alert across the state."

The bombings were intended to set off wider violence, officials said.

"It is a terrorist act. It is done by people who don't want peace," Maharashtra Chief Minister Vilasrao Deshmukh told a news conference in Mumbai, the state capital. Of the 100 people wounded, he said, 56 were seriously hurt.

Pasricha told reporters "the motive appears to be to create panic and make Hindus and Muslims fight with each other."

Both bombs were rigged to bicycles, said Deshmukh. "We found packets with the explosives attached to these bicycles," he said.

The explosions came as Muslims celebrated the festival of Shabe Barat, or the Night of Fortune, when they hold night-long prayers seeking divine blessings, exchange sweets with neighbors and relatives, and set off fireworks.

At least some of those killed were beggars who came to the mosque because worshippers are known for their generosity on festival days, said Raees Rizvi, a Malegaon social worker.

"People were stunned. There was blood all over," said a shaken Nadeem Shaikh, who was outside the mosque, "Children tried to run out and many were trampled. Many beggars waiting outside for alms were also killed."

An 8-year old child, his head bandaged, lay moaning on a hospital bed. "He had gone with other boys to pray. We came running to the hospital as soon as we heard about the blast," said Fahim Khan, the boy's elder brother.

The office of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh said he "appealed for peace and communal harmony and has urged all citizens across the country to remain calm."

India has suffered through a series of terror bombings over the past year, most recently attacks on commuter trains in Mumbai in July that left more than 200 people dead. Those bombings were blamed on Pakistan-based Muslim militants.

Earlier this week, Singh warned that India may be facing even bloodier attacks.

"Reports also suggest that terrorist modules and 'sleeper cells' exist in some of our urban areas, all of which highlight the seriousness of the threat," Singh told India's state chief ministers during a conference on internal security.

"The situation is tense," said Nashik Superintendent of Police Rajvardhan, who uses only one name. Nashik is about 60 miles from Malegaon.

Malegaon has been the scene of religious violence in the past, with riots between Hindus and Muslims occurring most recently in 2001, when 15 people were killed.

The U.S. Ambassador to India, David C. Mulford, deplored Friday's bombings.

DOJ_NMG_0061373

"There can be no justification for such heinous acts," he said in a statement. "The United States stands with India in its fight against terrorism."

India's bloodiest religious violence in recent years came in 2002, in the western state of Gujarat, and was set off by a train fire that killed 60 Hindus returning from a religious pilgrimage.

Muslims were blamed for the fire, and more than 1,000 people, most of them Muslim, were killed by Hindu mobs. India is about 74 percent Hindu and 12 percent Muslim.

Human rights groups have accused the state government, led by the Hindu-nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party — the party which then also controlled the national government — of doing little to stop the violence.

The Bharatiya Janata Party lost power in the national Parliament in 2004.

Saudi Religious Police Outlaw Cat, Dog Sales (WT/AP)

By Donna Abu-nasr

The Washington Times, September 9, 2006

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia -- Saudi Arabia's religious police, normally tasked with chiding women to cover themselves and ensuring men attend mosque prayers, are turning to a new target: cats and dogs.

The police have issued a decree banning the sale of the pets, seen as a sign of Western influence.

The prohibition on dogs may be less of a surprise because conservative Muslims despise dogs as unclean. But the cat ban befuddled many, since Islamic tradition holds that the Prophet Muhammad loved cats.

The religious police, known as the Muttawa, enforce Saudi Arabia's strict Islamic code. Its members prowl streets and malls, ensuring unmarried men and women do not mix, confronting women they feel are not properly covered or urging men to go to prayers.

But the government also gives the Muttawa wide leeway to enforce any rules they deem necessary to uphold the social order.

The decree -- which applies to the Red Sea port city of Jidda and the holy city of Mecca -- bans the sale of cats and dogs because "some youths have been buying them and parading them in public," according to a memo from the Municipal Affairs Ministry to Jidda's city government.

The memo urges city authorities to help enforce the ban.

Pet owning is not common in the Arab world, though dogs are kept for hunting and guarding. In large cities around the Middle East, stray dogs often wander the streets.

However, in the past few decades, owning dogs or cats has become a fashion statement among Saudis. Showing off a Doberman, pit bull or fancy breed of feline has became a status symbol.

Conservatives decry the trend as a Western influence, just like the fast food, shorts, jeans and pop music that have become more common in the kingdom, which is ruled by the puritanical Wahhabi interpretation of Islam.

"One bad habit spreading among our youths is the acquisition of dogs and showing them off in the streets and malls," wrote Aleetha al-Jihani in a letter to Al-Madina newspaper. "This is blind emulation of the infidels."

The decree has not been enforced yet, according to several pet shop owners and veterinary clinics in Jidda. It applies only to selling dogs and cats, and there was no sign the Muttawa would confiscate pets.

The ban distressed cat and dog lovers.

"I was shocked when I heard about it," said Fahd al-Mutairi, who owns 35 cats. "What was even more shocking was to hear that the ban came from an authority that has nothing to do with such an issue.

"I would understand if it came from the Health Ministry or anybody charged with ensuring pets coming from outside do not carry diseases," added the 23-year-old flower shop owner.

No other Arab country restricts pet ownership. But in Iran, ruled by Shi'ite clerics, religious police sometimes harass people seen outside with their dogs. Last year, Iranian police told people not to bring their dogs out in public, but the order was never backed up by law and dog owners widely ignored it.

The inclusion of cats in the Saudi ban puzzled many because there's no scorn for them, as there is for dogs in Islamic tradition.

One of the prophet's closest companions was given the name Abu Huraira, Arabic for "the father of the kitten," because he always carried a kitten and took care of it.

A number of hadiths -- traditional stories of the prophet -- show Muhammad encouraging people to treat cats well.

Once, he let a cat drink from the water he was going to use for his ablutions before prayers. Another time, Muhammad said a woman who kept a cat locked up without feeding it would go to hell.

DOJ_NMG_0061374

Dogs -- considered dirty and dangerous -- are less lucky. According to one hadith, Muhammad said a Muslim loses credit for one good deed each day he keeps a dog and even said dogs should be killed unless used for hunting or protection.

Still, in another instance, he said that a prostitute who carried water in her slipper to a thirsty dog would go to heaven, her sins forgiven because of her kindness.

"All these things considered, it is obviously not against our religion or our tradition to have dogs and cats as pets," columnist Abeer Mishkhas wrote in the Arab News.

"I sincerely hope [authorities] will leave the cats and dogs alone and concentrate on what should be their real business," she added.

China Names New Envoy To N. Korea (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

BEIJING, Sept. 8 -- China has appointed an outspoken career diplomat with extensive knowledge of the United States as its new ambassador to North Korea, the official New China News Agency said.

Analysts said the appointment of Liu Xiaoming, 50, suggests officials in Beijing are reassessing their relationship with Pyongyang and trying to find a new way to press discussions among China, North Korea and the United States.

"He is young and capable, a new-generation diplomat who is outspoken and sees things with a sharp eye," said Yang Chengxu, a Chinese expert on arms control and a senior research fellow with the China Institute of International Studies. "One of his biggest advantages is his knowledge of the United States."

The appointment of Liu, a former ambassador to Egypt, was announced late Thursday. He will succeed Wu Donghe, who has served as ambassador since 2001.

The choice is unlikely to affect the current deadlock in six-party talks over North Korea's nuclear program, but it shows that China is thinking about its relations with North Korea in a more comprehensive manner, said Shi Yinhong, professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing.

"This comes as China increases the frequency of communication with the U.S. The Diplomatic Affairs Ministry is very cautious in choosing the ambassador, and Liu's experience will be helpful in enhancing the triangle communications among China, North Korea and the U.S.," Shi said.

Liu has held posts at the Chinese Embassy in Washington and at the Foreign Ministry in Beijing.

Yonhap, the South Korean news agency, reported last weekend that China is preparing to invite North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to Beijing to warn against further provocation, but a spokesman for China's Foreign Ministry said this week that he was unaware of any arrangements for such a visit.

Russia Opens Weapons Destruction Plant (AP)

By Judith Ingram

AP, September 9, 2006

Engineers covered in head-to-toe protective gear inserted a neutralizing solution Friday into bombs filled with a nerve agent, officially starting the work of Russia's first plant for destroying the deadly chemicals.

The opening of the Maradykovsky plant accelerates Russia's campaign to eliminate the world's largest arsenal of the toxins.

The plant, 450 miles northeast of Moscow, holds 6,900 tons of nerve agents stored in aerial bombs and missile warheads — more than 17 percent of Russia's stockpile.

Dignitaries, townspeople and journalists gathered Friday for the opening ceremony on a makeshift stage outside the plant, which is ringed by three barbed-wire fences. Several miles away, a sign proclaimed the road to the plant a closed zone.

"Today's event demonstrates Russia's efforts to strictly fulfill its international commitments and shows that Russia has the political will to see through to the end the process of chemical disarmament," said Viktor Kholstov, deputy head of the Federal Industry Agency, which is in charge of the effort.

The destruction facility, on the site of one of Russia's seven former chemical weapons production plants, will become a focal point of the push to meet an April 2007 target for Russia to destroy 20 percent of its stockpile.

To date, Russia has eliminated just 3 percent, as opposed to 39 percent destroyed by the United States, which is home to the second-largest stockpile.

Besides the Maradykovsky plant, Russia has two other chemical weapon destruction facilities, both built with generous foreign funding. The Maradykovsky plant is the only one for destroying nerve agents as opposed to blister agents.

DOJ_NMG_0061375

Construction of another plant that was to have been the biggest — Shchuchye, with chemical weapons stored in millions of artillery shells — has bogged down in disputes between Russia and the United States, the main funder.

The delays at that plant have pushed Maradykovsky onto the front line. It is the sole site to be funded 100 percent by Russia.

"The Russians a couple of years ago made a critical decision that if they were to have any chance of meeting Chemical Weapons Convention deadlines, they had to go to the easier, bulk agent sites," said Paul Walker, a weapons expert at Global Green USA, the Washington-based affiliate of former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's Green Cross International environmental organization.

"I think also from a reason of national pride, they really wanted to do one site themselves and have it be successful."

Friday's ceremony had a strong dose of patriotism, opening and closing with an army band playing the national anthem. President Vladimir Putin's envoy to the Volga River region, Alexander Konovalev, said the plant "is a demonstration of the growing economic might of the Russian government."

Disarmament officials gave credit to Switzerland, which recently announced it is spending some $2 million on an electricity grid for the plant.

The bombs at Maradykovsky hold VX, soman and sarin, as well as a less deadly mixture of lewisite and mustard gas. Technicians will open each bomb, drain out some agent if necessary, insert a neutralizing reagent, close up the bomb and let it sit for 80-110 days to let the chemical processes take place, said Gennady Bezrukov, chief engineer of the Federal Chemical Weapons Storage and Destruction Administration.

When it is running at full strength, the plant will be able to neutralize 96 weapons a day, Bezrukov said.

Green Cross representative Tamara Ashikmina said she was satisfied that authorities were providing sufficient safety for the population and the environment. But the local population still has concerns, she said.

"Of course the population is anxious, because guests come and go but they have to live here," said Ashikmina, head of the chemistry department at Vyatka State University in nearby Kirov.

The closest town to the plant — Mirny, where 3,500 people live — and the surrounding region of 50,000 have been promised a new apartment building, a central heating system and electricity and sewage systems as part of a legal requirement that 10 percent of the cost of the weapons destruction process go to investments in the local community.

New apartment houses have been built for plant medics and other workers in nearby Orichi, and the town has a new school — allowing the existing one to stop teaching children in two shifts a day.

The state has also funded an ecological monitoring laboratory that carries out daily checks of air, water, flora and fauna in an area of more than 310 square miles surrounding the site.

Russia signed the Chemical Weapons Convention in 1997, the year it was created, pledging to eliminate its arsenal within 10 years. However, it won international agreement to prolong the deadline until 2012 because of a lack of funds.

Walker said that neither Russia nor the U.S. was anywhere near on track to meet that extended deadline. The U.S. is expected to complete destruction of its chemical weapons by 2020, he said.

With Little Authority, African Union Force Struggles With Its Mission In Darfur (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

TAWILA, Sudan, Sept. 8 — At the airstrip next to the headquarters of the African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur in El Fasher, the first job of the day for the workers who keep the mission's helicopters running is to check how much jet fuel is missing.

Some days it is just dozens of gallons. Sometimes it is hundreds.

At sundown, African Union soldiers must turn over control of the airstrip to the Sudanese government, whose troops guard the airfield all night. In the morning, the fuel is gone, according to senior African Union officials and airfield workers.

The missing fuel and the struggle over who controls the main military airstrip in Darfur lays bare just how little autonomy the African Union force actually has as it struggles to keep a fragile peace in this war-wracked region, where the government and its allied militias are fighting rebels seeking greater autonomy.

The African Union force, with its poor equipment and tiny contingent of 7,000 troops, had hoped to turn over command to a larger, better-equipped United Nations-led force at the end of the month. The Security Council has approved the step.

But the government has refused, as it continues to press an offensive against some rebel factions. It has instead proposed keeping the African Union force in place, and from interviews with dozens of officers and soldiers at camps in Darfur, it is easy to see why.

DOJ_NMG_0061376

African Union officers repeatedly spoke of the frustrations of what has become an impossible mission — to oversee a peace deal most of the militants in this brutal conflict have signed and to monitor a cease-fire that hardly anyone respects. Most spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly about African Union activities.

"We are frustrated and feeling so useless," said one major from southern Africa based in Kebkabiya, a government-controlled town that is home to thousands of people displaced by the conflict. "We are not able to move freely and do our work. Sometimes I wonder if there is any reason for us to be here at all."

But as weak as the African Union force is, nearly all agree it is better than none at all. Frantic diplomatic negotiations are now taking place to make sure some kind of peacekeeping force remains in Darfur, where hundreds of thousands of people have died and 2.5 million have been pushed from their homes in the fighting.

The African Union force is almost out of money, and its sponsors, mainly the United States and Europe, have said that they will pay no more. The force says it will leave after its mandate expires Sept. 30.

Sudan has offered to pay the force's budget with money raised by the Arab League and Sudan itself. But that would give the government even more leverage over the force, and senior African Union officials have dismissed the idea as unacceptable.

More than being underfunded, however, the peacekeepers here lack the ability to stand up to the Sudanese government, according to senior officers, analysts and diplomats.

"The African Union has never been a big nuisance and nor was it a big threat," said J. Stephen Morrison, director of the Africa program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"The Sudanese always had an A.U. that was split in its opinion and never had the rules of engagement or the capacity to push them around," he added. "So it was vulnerable to being manipulated and weakened along the way."

Those are problems that any new United Nations force would undoubtedly want to fix. But Sudan has argued that a United Nations force will undermine the country's sovereignty by transferring too much authority to outsiders. A lack of authority is precisely what many African Union officers here lamented.

"A peacekeeping force must assert its authority, so when I arrived and saw that a party to the conflict had control of the airstrip I knew this mission was in trouble," said one senior African Union military official who has served in peacekeeping missions in Europe, Africa and Asia.

"If the only airstrip you have is freely not accessible, then you know who has the authority, and it is not you," he said.

Gen. Collins Ihekire, the Nigerian who commands the African Union forces in Darfur, acknowledged in an interview that the force has not had always has the freedom and support it needs to carry out even its limited mission.

"We have not always had the ability to move as freely as we would like," he said, "but we are not here to force a confrontation with anyone. We are here as monitors of a cease-fire, not to make war."

In the past week, as the showdown over an international force has mounted, African soldiers have curtailed their already limited patrols, often at the insistence of Sudanese officers stationed in their bases as monitors of a tattered cease-fire agreement.

A short patrol Tuesday to visit outlying villages and areas frequented by nomads on their annual migration route near Kebkabiya was a case in point. According to its mandate, the African Union is supposed to be able to move freely throughout Darfur without any impediments, such as the travel permits required for aid workers and journalists wanting to visit the region.

But in practice, the movements of the African Union have been hampered by government officials. A Sudanese Army captain assigned to the Kebkabiya base tried to prevent a patrol from visiting villages in the area, relenting only when the Cameroonian major who was leading the patrol firmly insisted that it go ahead.

On the patrol, the Sudanese captain repeatedly told villagers not to speak to visiting journalists and not to allow the journalists to take photographs.

Such interference is a violation of the African force's independence, but the policy of the force has been to avoid confrontation rather than testing the limits of its mandate.

The African Union was always meant to be a short-term solution to stanch bloodshed and allow aid workers to operate in Darfur while negotiations for a political solution took place, Mr. Morrison said.

"There were no other options, and they stepped into the breach and they did it with limited capacity," Mr. Morrison said. "They acquitted themselves pretty well, and they showed courage and didn't shy away from ugliness and risk. But it wasn't sustainable."

The peace agreement signed between one of the rebel factions and the Arab-dominated government in May was supposed to be that political solution, but some of the non-Arab rebel factions have rejected it, as have millions of Darfur residents.

But the government, insisting it has reached a political settlement with those willing to make peace, has started a military offensive against the rebel alliance that refused to sign, bombing villages they control.

DOJ_NMG_0061377

This is a violation of the new peace agreement, according to African Union officials, but its troops watch helplessly as the Antonov bombers and attack helicopters take off from the El Fasher airstrip.

Still, whatever its shortcomings, shoring up the African Union without a commitment on the United Nations force may be the only option left, short of abandoning Darfur without any peacekeepers at all, said Eltayeb Hag Ateya, director of the Peace Research Institute at the University of Khartoum.

"Clearly the short-term solution is to support the African Union force," Mr. Ateya said. "We need to think practically and put politics aside to find peace."

In Darfur, Terror From The Air (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 8 -- Yagoub Mustafa, 45, could not easily mimic the "whoop whoop whoop, boom! boom! boom!" of two helicopter gunships that fired rockets into the huts in his Darfur village. He tried to make the noises, but they were not loud enough, or terrifying enough.

But the horror he experienced that July afternoon, while he crouched low under a tree with his sobbing sons, daughters and nephews pressed against him, was more easily expressed: Mustafa thought they all were going to die, he said. And as he offered soothing words to the children, he begged for rescue in a silent prayer.

Please God help us. We need your mercy.

Three years into a war in the Darfur region of western Sudan, thousands of villagers have been victimized by government troops and proxy militiamen who killed, raped and looted. Now the government is intensifying an air war featuring Soviet-era Antonov planes jury-rigged into bombers and Mi-24 helicopter gunships turned against mud-and-thatch huts. New waves of shellshocked villagers have left their homes and trekked for days to bulging relief camps.

For Mustafa, whose eyes are set deeply into a face the color of aged teak, the air attack did what years of sporadic raids by government-backed Janjaweed militiamen had failed to do. They made him leave his home in Bellala Gorf, about 45 miles northwest of El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur state.

"They came very low," Mustafa said, his voice low and rumbly from decades of breathing hot desert dust. "I was afraid. I just hid."

The war started when rebels in this impoverished and neglected region attacked government installations in Darfur in 2003. The government responded by sending in regular army troops, employing air power and arming a militia, called the Janjaweed, whose fighters traveled by horse and camel and attacked rebels and civilians.

A peace deal was reached in May in Nigeria, but two of the three main rebel groups refused to sign. The government is sending thousands of troops and police officers to Darfur in what U.N. officials have called a violation of the peace plan.

In the past two months, the government also has resumed air attacks against civilians in areas where the rebels remain popular.

"Hundreds are still dying amid ongoing violence, and thousands are being forcibly displaced," said a statement issued Friday in Geneva by Antonio Guterres, the U.N. high commissioner for refugees. "If things do not improve, we are heading for a major catastrophe."

There is little evidence that things are about to improve in Darfur.

A 7,000-member African Union mission here, a limited but crucial buffer against the government forces, is due to depart by the end of the month, though discussions continue about a possible extension. The U.N. Security Council approved a plan last week to send in a U.N. force three times the size of the African Union mission, but Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, has rejected it.

Aid groups, African Union officials, analysts and rebels say that as the conflict is intensifying, the number of displaced people is growing. Many here say the worst of the conflict is still to come, as the government seeks to drive the rebels into submission by terrorizing their civilian supporters. War and disease in Darfur have killed as many as 450,000 people and driven more than 2 million from their homes.

The recent expansion of air attacks has familiarized Darfur civilians with the sights and sounds of military aircraft.

There is the white Antonov bomber that lumbers past, high in the sky, audible but not deafening. A long, high whistle is followed by tremendous boom. The hole left in the reddish Darfur sand is round and about three feet across. Generally, several bombs are dropped in a pass, and then the Antonov comes by again and, sometimes, again.

The aiming is crude, and rarely do the bombs land anywhere near the middle of a village. Also, they rarely seem to kill. What the bombs do, say those who have been near where they hit, is terrify with the force of their blasts and their seeming randomness.

DOJ_NMG_0061378

Abubakar Ibrahim Hassan, a long-faced man in a white robe and knit cap who appeared to be in his sixties, said the Antonovs flew over Bellala Gorf several times that day in July. Residents fled their huts for trees at the edge of the village.

"We knew the fire would come and kill everybody," he said.

But far more frightening are the Mi-24s. The helicopters can be outfitted with machine guns, bombs and rockets designed to blast through heavy armor. Villagers in Bellala Gorf described the Mi-24s firing munitions that left a distinctive trench-like pattern, about 10 feet long and three feet across, the signature of rockets fired from close to the ground.

Residents also described two Mi-24s painted in green camouflage. Several villagers said the helicopters hovered so low that it seemed they could have reached up and touched the aircraft.

Instead, they fled, tried to hide in the sand or cringed in their huts.

Ali Hadi Osman, 41, lay as still as he could, spread-eagle in the dust, he said, hoping the helicopter pilots would not see him. He stayed like that until long after they had flown away.

"If there's any movement," Osman reasoned, "they will come back."

Residents said they knew of no deaths from the air raid on Ballala Gorf, though 17 huts were destroyed in a burst of sand and black smoke. The attack was one in a series of incidents around the town of Korma over several days in early July. Amnesty International counted 72 deaths. Mass graves also have been reported in the villages around Korma.

Korma and surrounding villages now are reportedly nearly empty of their populations.

After Mustafa's terrifying encounter with the helicopter gunships, which came within 100 feet of his family's hideout beneath the trees, he decided to leave with his wife and six children.

"We are looking for peace," Mustafa said. "We want our children to go to school, to get a health clinic, good water and a good place to live."

It will happen, Mustafa said, only if the United Nations comes. The African Union force, even if it stays, is not able to protect civilians, he said.

Mustafa and his family left in the night, with their battered pots and pans and bags of flour loaded on the family's three donkeys. Together, the 11 of them -- eight people and three pack animals -- walked four days to a camp near El Fasher. They have lived there ever since and are unsure when, if ever, they will return home.

American Journalist Held In Sudan To Be Freed (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 9, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 8 -- Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Paul Salopek said from a Sudanese prison Friday night that the government would soon release him and two Chadian colleagues after a 34-day confinement on charges of espionage and producing "false news."

President Omar Hassan al-Bashir agreed to release Salopek after meeting with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) in Khartoum, Sudan's capital. The three men are expected to be freed Saturday, Richardson's office said in a statement.

Salopek, a foreign correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, was arrested Aug. 6 while working on a story for National Geographic magazine about the Sahel region that runs along the southern edge of the Sahara.

Richardson traveled to Sudan with Salopek's wife, Linda Lynch, and Chicago Tribune Editor Ann Marie Lipinski. National Geographic Editor in Chief Chris Johns met the group in Khartoum. Salopek and his wife have a home in New Mexico.

Salopek, 44, will return to the United States with Richardson, though the details of their trip have not yet been finalized. Also being freed are Salopek's Chadian interpreter, Suleiman Abakar Moussa, and his driver, Idriss Abdulraham Anu.

"All three of us, Mr. Idriss, Mr. Suleiman, are all gratified," Salopek said by phone from prison here in El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur state.

Salopek, a veteran foreign correspondent with extensive experience in Africa, and his two colleagues crossed into the Darfur region of western Sudan without visas. Many journalists have made similar journeys over the past several years, taking advantage of Sudan's porous border with Chad to cover a conflict in a country that often restricts journalists.

Salopek was captured by a rebel group that had begun working with the government. He was later transferred to government custody and charged with the visa violation and the potentially more serious allegations of spying and writing "false news." He was scheduled to go on trial Sunday and faced two years in prison if convicted.

Salopek said he hoped his experience would not prevent other journalists from coming to Sudan to cover Darfur, where a three-year-old war is accelerating and a humanitarian crisis has grown more dire.

"We just hope and plan the story will continue to be covered," he said. "I probably will stay on the other side of the border, in Chad."

DOJ_NMG_0061379

Richardson's office said in the statement that the governor was invited to Sudan to discuss the case in large part because of his long relationship with Bashir and Sudan's ambassador to the United States, Khidir Haroun Ahmed. Richardson is a former member of Congress and ambassador to the United Nations.

"The successful end to this unfortunate episode is a victory for journalism and a free press," Richardson said in the statement. "Most important, these three men will return home safely to be with their families, friends and colleagues who were relentless in their appeals to have them freed."

Sudan Agrees To Free U.S. Reporter Accused Of Spying (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 8 — The Sudanese government agreed to release a well-known American journalist, Paul Salopek, and two Chadians who were arrested and charged with espionage and with illegally crossing the border from Chad last month.

The journalist and his colleagues, an interpreter and a driver, were to be released Saturday on "humanitarian grounds," after Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico met with Sudan's president, Omar al-Bashir.

Mr. Richardson flew to Sudan on Friday at the invitation of the Sudanese government. Mr. Salopek and his wife, Linda Lynch, have a home in New Mexico.

Mr. Salopek, a foreign correspondent for The Chicago Tribune who has won two Pulitzer Prizes, was detained by a militant group allied to the Sudanese government in the western province of Darfur on Aug. 6. His driver, Idriss Abdulraham Anu, and his interpreter, Suleiman Abakar Moussa, both Chadians, were also detained.

The group turned them over to the government, which charged the men with spying. The arrests came amid tensions over a proposed United Nations peacekeeping force in Darfur that the Sudanese government has refused to accept, despite a Security Council resolution calling for its deployment.

The government has cracked down on protests, and a chill was sent through Sudan's news media with the beheading of a Sudanese newspaper editor after he published articles about the Prophet Muhammad that some Islamists considered blasphemous.

Mr. Salopek, on a scheduled leave of absence from The Tribune, was on assignment for National Geographic magazine, reporting an article about the life, culture and politics of the Sahel, the vast semidesert belt that spans Africa just below the Sahara.

He had not planned to visit Darfur, where a grim conflict between non-Arab rebels and the Arab-dominated government has left hundreds of thousands of people dead and pushed 2.5 million from their homes. But after reporting along the Chad-Sudan border, he decided to visit a village where some refugees from Darfur were returning and rebuilding their lives.

Mr. Salopek is known for his intense approach to reporting, often asking to work alongside the people he is writing about — fishermen, farmers, laborers, hunters. He once worked at a gas station outside Chicago to report on an article about America's addiction to oil.

Even while in captivity with the government rebel group last month, he managed to spend a day with village women planting crops, noting how their straight lines of seeds would swerve when one of the women told a joke about sex.

Speaking by telephone soon after learning that he would be freed, Mr. Salopek said he was relieved that he and his colleagues would be able to leave their cell soon.

He said that he plans to continue reporting for the article that he had begun when he was detained, picking up where he left off on a journey of months across Africa.

"I have every intention of resuming this assignment," he said. "I will be back in Africa."

Blair And Brown Reach Deal Over May 4 (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Tony Blair and Gordon Brown have reached an understanding that the prime minister will resign on May 4, paving the way for a new Labour leader to take office in mid-June.

After Mr Blair was on Thursday forced into a historic and humiliating public pledge to quit within 12 months, Downing Street refused to give any precise date on when the prime minister will depart Number 10.

However, allies of the chancellor said there was now a broad understanding between the two men that Mr Blair will announce next February that he intends to quit as party leader on May 4, 2007 - one day after the Scottish and Welsh regional elections.

DOJ_NMG_0061380

On Friday, Charles Clarke, former home secretary, weighed into the leadership row saying Mr Brown's behaviour had been "absolutely stupid ". In a piece in the Evening Standard he said the chancellor should have distanced himself from the rebels who demanded the prime minister's resignation.

His departure will pave the way for a six week Labour leadership election, which will see Mr Blair's successor - almost certain to be Mr Brown - installed by mid-June.

Little more than a week after insisting he would give no timetable for his exit from Number 10, Mr Blair used a visit to a north London school to confirm that this month's Labour conference would be his last as prime minister.

Thursday's U-turn has undermined Mr Blair's authority and may trigger a renewed bout of speculation over whether he possesses the political momentum to last until next summer.

His commitment to go by then was aimed at heading off demands from Labour MPs that he should quit immediately. It also amounted to a major victory for Mr Brown. After years of acrimony between the two over when the prime minister will stand down, Mr Brown has finally secured a public pledge on when Mr Blair will quit.

However, relations between the two remained uneasy on Thursday night. Mr Blair's allies said Mr Brown had been badly damaged by this week's events, amid claims - denied by the chancellor's camp - that he orchestrated an attempted coup against Mr Blair.

"Gordon has got quite a bit of work to do to settle people's minds at the end of this week," said a senior Downing Street figure. "He has appeared too aggressive and looks too much like a control freak who does not want a debate on Labour's future."

Mr Blair will spell out his ambitions for his remaining months in office in a speech to Labour activists on Saturday. But pressures for him to depart quickly could intensify, especially if Labour looks like it is heading for serious defeat in the Welsh and Scottish assembly elections on May 3.

Doug Henderson, an MP close to Mr Brown, was among several who still insisted Mr Blair should quit immediately. However, Mr Brown's allies said Mr Henderson's comments did not have their approval.

Criticism Follows Blair's Likely Successor Even As He Begins Discussing Policy Plans (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 8 — One day after Prime Minister Tony Blair said he would resign within a year, his rival and would-be successor, Gordon Brown, began on Friday to lay out a broad policy agenda, pledging that Britain would remain "shoulder to shoulder" with the United States against terrorism.

But a rancorous new debate erupted in the Labor Party, threatening to upend the uneasy truce that followed a week of feuding between the men over the timing of Mr. Blair's departure.

In the new uproar, a former senior minister, Charles Clarke, called Mr. Brown's recent behavior stupid.

In an interview in Friday's Evening Standard, Mr. Clarke, the former home secretary dismissed by Mr. Blair this year, said many Laborites had been angered by a photograph of Mr. Brown grinning as he was driven from a meeting with Mr. Blair.

"A lot of people are very upset and cross about that," Mr. Clarke said. "It was absolutely stupid — a stupid, stupid thing to do."

He also said Mr. Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer, should have distanced himself from Labor rebels demanding Mr. Blair's ouster. "He could have done that with a click of his fingers," Mr. Clarke said.

By way of a response, Harriet Harman, the constitutional affairs minister, said, "I really think that everybody should shut up now" before the party could be torn apart.

The signs of restlessness suggested that some legislators were not satisfied with Mr. Blair's refusal to be pinned down on a firm departure date. Some people in Mr. Brown's camp now expect that to be early next May.

But whenever it is, some legislators said the duel had damaged Mr. Brown's prospects as an unchallenged successor.

Tony Wright, an independent-minded Labor legislator who has criticized the party's rebellion, said in an interview: "In the spring, Mr. Blair will say he is going. In the early summer he will go, and we will have a new leader. But it is less clear than it was two weeks ago that the next leader will be Gordon Brown. There is the suspicion that he cemented discontent within the party."

Mr. Brown's strong support of the United States in the campaign against terrorism seemed to offer some continuity with Mr. Blair, but it was also fraught with potential hazards because many Labor legislators are disenchanted by the prime minister's alliance with the White House and its Middle East policies.

Mr. Wright called Mr. Brown a "firm Atlanticist," but said the issue was tricky, because Mr. Blair's decision to align himself so closely with the United States forms the core of his problems with many Labor legislators.

"I don't think there is any great problem or alternative to most of his domestic agenda," Mr. Wright said. "But there is a deep antipathy to the Bush administration."

DOJ_NMG_0061381

Mr. Brown has not been granting interviews, but in an article in The Sun, a top-selling tabloid, he recalled the events of Sept. 11, 2001, and said, “In a few days I will visit New York and reaffirm to the American people that Britain — under the courageous leadership of Tony Blair — stands now, as then, shoulder to shoulder with them.”

While there have been questions about Mr. Brown’s attitudes toward Britain’s military deployment, Mr. Brown wrote, “Britain can take pride that our heroic armed forces are leading in the global fight we must wage against terrorism.”

He took a strong line against both terrorism at home and military commitments overseas, and said he guaranteed that “we will continue to spend whatever it takes to meet the new security demands we face and our military commitments abroad.”

Mr. Brown also told The Sun that he would support police demands for a period of detention of terrorism suspects without charge longer than the current 28 days. The police have been seeking a 90-day period.

Like Mr. Blair, however, he urged a broader campaign to counter the radical Islam that has spread among some British Muslims.

“As well as supporting our police, security services and armed forces in the front line of the war on terror at home and abroad, we also need to mobilize the power of argument and ideas to expose and defeat the ideology of hate,” he said.

In a separate speech in Edinburgh on Friday he tried to pre-empt criticism that, as a Scot, he might represent narrow, regional interests. “I stand here today again to speak up for Britain and Britishness,” he said.

Legislators in Scotland and Wales, along with local councilors in England, face elections next May that are seen as a bellwether of Labor fortunes. The vote is a crucial factor in the calculations of when Mr. Blair might step down, in the view of his critics, to enhance the party’s electoral prospects.

Infighting Still Dividing Blair's Party (AP)

By Beth Gardiner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2006

Bitter infighting flared in Tony Blair's Labour Party on Friday as a former Cabinet official criticized the prime minister's likely successor.

Blair tried to placate his party's restive lawmakers by promising Thursday to resign within a year, but the harsh comments by Charles Clarke, formerly Britain's top law and order official, demonstrated the fragility of the truce.

Blair and Treasury chief Gordon Brown, widely expected to be the next prime minister, appeared to have reached a private understanding on the handover of power. But a sharp attack on Brown by Clarke — a Blair ally until the prime minister fired him in May — made clear the peaceful interval that party bigwigs had hoped for was unlikely to materialize.

Clarke harshly chastised Brown for the way he handled this week's party turmoil and said his succession as prime minister was not guaranteed. He said the grin on Brown's face as he emerged from Blair's 10 Downing St. office after handover talks with the prime minister had been provocative and poorly judged.

"A lot of people are very upset and cross about that. It was absolutely stupid, a stupid, stupid thing to do," Clarke said.

Clarke said Brown also should have acted more decisively against eight junior government officials whose protest resignations on Wednesday forced Blair's announcement.

"What he should have done was come out strongly and distance himself from them," he said. "He could have done that with a click of his fingers."

In comments to be published in Saturday's editions of the Telegraph newspaper, Clarke said Brown is a "a very self-confident, intelligent, cultured politician," but difficult to work with.

"It's a controlling thing — he thinks he has to control everything," Clarke was quoted as saying. "He is totally, totally uncollegiate. Can he change? That's the question. Can he delegate?"

Brown's allies have insisted he was not behind the anti-Blair plotting.

Senior party figures have publicly backed Brown as the next Labour leader — and therefore prime minister — to try to prevent the eventual handover of power from highlighting intraparty divisions and throwing national elections expected in 2009 to a resurgent Conservative Party.

It was not clear what motivated Clarke's attack. Although he was long seen as a Blair ally, that relationship has grown chilly since his firing so his comments may not have been sanctioned by the prime minister's camp.

Blair's spokesman declined to comment on Clarke's remarks.

Blair "thinks the country wants the government to get on with the business of governing and that's what he'll be doing," the spokesman said, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with government policy.

Whatever Clarke's intent, his remarks made clear the amount of bitterness that has built up in the party during months of argument over the length of Blair's tenure.

DOJ_NMG_0061382

Ruth Kelly, the communities secretary and a close Blair ally, said Clarke's statement was wrong and warned that continued sniping would be deeply damaging.

"I am sure there are others who share his view but what I would say is that I don't think that represents the center of gravity in the Labour Party, nor does it represent the majority view in the Cabinet," she told British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

She said the party needed a period of calm. "We have a duty ... to really refrain now for a period from this sort of intense political infighting," she said.

Blair had long resisted setting out a timetable for his departure as prime minister, fearing it would instantly drain his authority.

But he reluctantly announced Thursday that he would be gone by this time next year, when it became clear that was the only chance of ending days of damaging public turmoil. He refused to set a precise date for his resignation.

"I would have preferred to do this in my own way," Blair said Thursday, conceding that the Labour Party's annual conference this month would be his last.

Labour heavyweights had hoped that would be enough to calm the party after eight lawmakers quit their junior government posts Wednesday rather than remove their names from a letter demanding Blair's departure.

Anger over Blair's handling of last month's Middle East fighting and anxiety over the party's slide in the polls had fueled impatience in the party for him to leave quickly, or at least to say when he planned to go.

The low-level revolt raised fears that Labour's eventual change of command would be rancorous and messy — reminiscent of Margaret Thatcher's abrupt, involuntary departure from office in 1990 at the hand of rebels in her Conservative Party — rather than the "stable, orderly transition" that Blair has long promised.

The key question is whether the prime minister's new exit strategy will satisfy the party.

Early signals were that it would buy Blair time — but not much. He is eager to reach the 10-year anniversary of his 1997 assumption of office, which would be in May.

Speculation focused on May as the moment for his departure but his spokesman has said widespread guesses about a specific date were "just plain wrong."

Blairites Rejoice In Attack On Brown (FT)

By Ben Hall And James Blitz

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Downing Street officials on Friday expressed private delight over a broadside fired at Gordon Brown by Charles Clarke, the former Home Secretary, saying the attack had rightly exposed features of the chancellor's character.

Tony Blair's official spokesman was careful not to comment on the outburst in which Mr Clarke accused the chancellor of "absolutely stupid" behaviour during the crisis that engulfed the government this week.

But in a sign that Mr Clarke's attack has emboldened the Blair camp, other figures close to the prime minister expressed pleasure that questions were being raised about Mr Brown's behaviour. The private view reflects tensions between the camps in spite of the understanding on Mr Blair's departure date.

According to one Downing Street figure, relations between the two men remain sore after a serious stand-off at a meeting in Number 10 on Wednesday. Mr Blair, in the presence of officials from both camps, accused the chancellor of plotting a coup against him.

"Tony lost his rag, demanding to know what Gordon was up to, whether he was trying to topple him," said a Blair ally who was at the meeting. "Gordon sat there in silence, like a sullen teenager. That is what we have been putting up with for so long."

There were other signs on Friday that Number 10 was feeling emboldened by the attack on the chancellor. A senior figure said Mr Blair is to encourage a "fundamental and open debate" about public spending priorities over the next year in a bid to prevent Mr Brown dictating policy.

Britain's Political Enigma (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, September 9, 2006

Gordon Brown has taken a critical step to becoming Britain's prime minister. For years, Mr Brown – the dour 55-year-old Scot who is finance minister – has never disguised his burning desire to succeed Tony Blair as leader of the ruling Labour party. This week, Mr Brown, chancellor of the exchequer, finally got something he long sought: a public assurance from Mr Blair that he will quit Downing Street by next May.

DOJ_NMG_0061383

Mr Blair's assurance came in one of the most tumultuous weeks in recent British politics. It is a week that has badly – probably fatally – damaged Mr Blair. The prime minister had wanted to keep his departure plans vague. But after a revolt by Labour MPs, he was finally forced to surrender a rough timetable for his departure.

Perhaps more remarkably, the week's events have also damaged Mr Brown. For years, he has been a consummate political operator, the dead certain successor to Mr Blair. He almost certainly still is. But on Friday Charles Clarke, a former interior minister, voiced the suspicion of many Labour MPs that Mr Blair has been the victim of a grubby coup orchestrated by his finance minister. Mr Clarke attacked Mr Brown's behaviour this week as "absolutely stupid" – adding that he must now "prove his fitness" to succeed Mr Blair.

People outside the UK will probably be more struck by Mr Blair's political demise than Mr Brown's ascent. Even after a decade in office, Mr Blair remains one of the most arresting figures on the international stage. In the US, he enjoys mythical status as the sole sure ally of President George W. Bush in the war on terror. In Europe, Mr Blair is regarded as the one person who has firmly shifted a party of the left to the centre ground. By contrast, Mr Brown – outside international financial circles – enjoys none of this allure.

Yet this is to underestimate Gordon Brown. He deserves no less credit than Mr Blair for founding "New Labour" and making it a powerful electoral machine. Even more significant, Mr Brown is the architect of the government's economic success – implementing reforms that have brought a decade of uninterrupted growth, low unemployment and interest rates. This, above all, is why his bid to succeed Mr Blair is unstoppable.

Even so, within Labour there is a nagging doubt, an ambivalence, about what kind of leader Mr Brown would be. Mr Clarke on Friday became the first senior politician to voice publicly what the ambivalence is about: Mr Brown's dark side, his sullen temperament. "Part of the problem," said Mr Clarke, "is that he lacks confidence. He is nervous. That could all change when the burden of waiting for the job is lifted and I think it probably will. But the problem is, nobody really knows."

As politicians – indeed as human beings – it is hard to imagine two people more unlike each other than Mr Blair and Mr Brown. The current prime minister is intuitive, a charmer, one who connects with fellow politicians and the electorate. Mr Brown is broody, deliberative, an academic manqué whose powerful charm in private is not felt by the wider public.

Their working styles are different, too. Mr Blair acts on instinct, he has intimations about events. He knew within minutes of the September 11 attacks that the world had been gripped by a powerful new form of terrorism. Mr Brown, by contrast, rarely takes a big decision without painstaking study and reflection. Sometimes, this can be an advantage. But some wonder how well he would make the shift to prime minister, where the incumbent must respond daily to random events.

Above all – and this is central to the impending handover – Mr Brown appears to many Britons to be more left-leaning than Mr Blair. The prime minister has long been seen as a Conservative in disguise ("Tory Blair"). At home, he has overhauled Britain's health and education system, introducing choice for consumers. Mr Brown, by contrast, is seen as a more traditional Labour man, close to trade union leaders and wedded to big government and state intervention.

For Britain's Conservatives, now resurgent under David Cameron, this is the core attack on Mr Brown. Mr Cameron argues that once Mr Blair has gone, he – the Conservative leader – will become Mr Blair's rightful heir. Mr Brown, meanwhile, will marginalise Labour and take it back to the left. This argument is too crude, however. At home, Mr Brown resents the suggestion that he is not a reformer or moderniser. He has faced down union demands for big public sector wage rises. He is deeply committed to the promotion of business and enterprise. What is still uncertain is whether he will have anything like Mr Blair's zeal to entrench choice and diversity in state hospitals and schools.

"He has to do this and I think he will," says a dispassionate observer. "The moment he veers away from the reforms Blair has sought to implement, Cameron will press home the argument that the Tories are Blair's heirs."

On international policy, too, Mr Brown might not signal as much of a change as some believe. Mr Blair has developed a powerful political relationship with the White House, believing the UK can have no influence unless it hugs America close. Mr Brown will not get so close to Mr Bush in the final stages of his presidency. Yet Mr Brown is intellectually far more fascinated than Mr Blair has ever been by American politics, enterprise and culture – ensuring these have a deep influence on his policy.

On Europe, the two men's instincts are clearly different. Mr Brown's dominant concern has been with Europe's structural economic problems and rigid labour markets. This makes him far more sceptical than Mr Blair about attempts to deepen political integration. But Mr Brown is aware, too, that Britain's Conservatives undermine their own credibility by indulging in visceral Europhobia. So he will want to underscore Conservative extremism by forging close links with European leaders.

Can Mr Brown possibly be stopped from winning power? Mr Clarke's attack has thrown a sharp spotlight on whether Mr Brown will be challenged in next year's leadership election. A handful of leading Labour figures close to Mr Blair loathe Mr Brown and share concerns about his character and politics. They may yet organise a challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0061384

Yet Mr Brown should manage to head this off. He has bided his time as the leader-in-waiting for so long that he is unlikely to make a mistake now. The broad mass of the Labour party – the trade unions, the young generation of cabinet ministers – is firmly behind him. Yet he still has some work to do – to prove he really does have some of Tony Blair's versatility and humanity.

The Ditch Blair Project (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

PREMATURE POLITICAL OBITUARIES are nothing new, but it isn't every day that a politician writes his own. This week, British Prime Minister Tony Blair did just that — although he left out the precise time of "death," hinting that he would step down within one year in favor of Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon

Brown. Now journalists are chiming in with their own advance eulogies, many of which identify Blair's fatal affliction as his support for President Bush's foreign policy.

It's not that simple. Yes, Blair has been savaged for supporting not only the war in Iraq but also a pro-Israel position in the recent war in Lebanon. Critics deride him as "Bush's poodle," but that's a doubly unfair epitaph for Blair's tenure at 10 Downing Street.

First, his hawkish position on Iraq involves more than parroting Bush. It reflects his own conviction that democracies like Britain and the United States should intervene abroad when necessary to plant democracy (one goal of the invasion of Iraq) or to rescue the victims of ethnic cleansing (as in the Balkans). Quite unlike Bush, Blair considers these missions to go hand in hand with leadership on global warming, debt reduction in the Third World and aggressively reducing poverty worldwide. Blair has been the most articulate spokesman for what appears to be a political breed in retreat — the liberal internationalist.

A political obituary for Blair that fixates myopically on Iraq or on U.S.-British relations gives short shrift to Blair's accomplishments at home, notably his shepherding of the Labor Party back to power after 18 years in the wilderness. Blair led the party to victory three times — the last time despite the baggage of the Iraq war — because he recognized the need to liberate what he called New Labor from the ideological straitjacket of the "loony left." Blair became an evangelist for a Third Way between the doctrinaire socialism of "old Labor" and the too-rugged individualism championed by Margaret Thatcher. The Third Way preached that a party of the left could be pro-business and open to innovation without forsaking the poor and the marginalized.

A similar gospel was preached successfully by a U.S. president whose tenure overlapped with Blair's — not Bush but the Great Triangulator, Bill Clinton. That so many in Britain and the United States have forgotten the Blair-Clinton partnership is a reminder that Blair has been prime minister for a long time and probably should move on. Just don't call him "poodle."

U.S. Paid 10 Journalists For Anti-Castro Reports (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 9, 2006

MIAMI, Sept. 8 — The Bush administration's Office of Cuba Broadcasting paid 10 journalists here to provide commentary on Radio and TV Martí, which transmit to Cuba government broadcasts critical of Fidel Castro, a spokesman for the office said Friday.

The group included three journalists at El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language sister newspaper of The Miami Herald, which fired them Thursday after learning of the relationship. Pablo Alfonso, who reports on Cuba for El Nuevo Herald, received the largest payment, almost $175,000 since 2001.

Other journalists have been found to accept money from the Bush administration, including Armstrong Williams, a commentator and talk-show host who received $240,000 to promote its education initiatives. But while the Castro regime has long alleged that some Cuban-American reporters in Miami were paid by the government, the revelation on Friday, reported in The Miami Herald, was the first evidence of that.

In addition to Mr. Alfonso, the journalists who received payment include Wilfredo Cancio Isla, who writes for El Nuevo Herald and received about $15,000 since 2001; Olga Connor, a freelance reporter for the newspaper who received about $71,000; and Juan Manuel Cao, a reporter for Channel 41 who got $11,000 this year from TV Martí, according to The Miami Herald, which learned of the payments through a Freedom of Information Request.

When Mr. Cao followed Mr. Castro to Argentina this summer and asked him why Cuba was not letting one of its political dissidents leave, Mr. Castro called him a "mercenary" and asked who was paying him.

Mr. Cao refused to comment Friday except to say on Channel 41 that he believed the Cuban government knew in advance about the article in The Miami Herald. Most of the other journalists could not be reached. Ninoska Perez-Castellón, a commentator on the popular Radio Mambí station here, said she had received a total of $1,550 from the government to do 10 episodes of a documentary-style show on TV Martí called "Atrévete a Soñar," or "Dare to Dream," and saw nothing wrong with it. Her employer has always known about the arrangement, she added.

DOJ_NMG_0061385

"Being Cuban," Ms. Perez-Castellón said, "there's nothing wrong with working on programs that are on a mission to inform the people of Cuba. It's no secret we do that. My face has always been on the shows."

But Al Tompkins, who teaches ethics at the Poynter Institute for Media Studies in St. Petersburg, called it a conflict of interest for journalists to accept payment from any government agency.

"It's all about credibility and independence," Mr. Tompkins said. "If you consider yourself a journalist, then it seems to me it's an obvious conflict of interest to take government dollars."

Lincoln Diaz-Balart, a Republican congressman and one of Miami's most stridently anti-Castro voices, said he believed editors at El Nuevo Herald and The Miami Herald had known that the three writers for El Nuevo had worked for the Office of Cuba Broadcasting. He pointed to articles from both papers in 2002 that describe Mr. Alfonso as a moderator for a program on Radio Martí and Ms. Connor as a paid commentator for the station.

But Robert Beatty, vice president for public affairs at the Miami Herald Media Company, said the editor of El Nuevo, Humberto Castello, learned only on Thursday. The Herald, long owned by Knight Ridder, was acquired in March by the McClatchy Company.

Mr. Beatty said that Jesús Diaz, publisher of The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald, had decided to fire Mr. Alfonso and Mr. Cancio and to sever ties with Ms. Connor, a freelance journalist who wrote about Cuban culture.

"Journalism's ethical guidelines are neither subjective nor selectively enforced," Mr. Beatty said. "Where conduct of this sort is brought to our attention, we act decisively."

Mr. Cancio said Friday evening that his supervisors had known and approved of his appearances on Radio and TV Mambí, during which he said he always expressed his own opinions and not the government's.

"It is for these reasons that I deny any conflict of interest in my professional behavior," he said, "and I believe my termination to be an unfair and disproportionate decision made in bad faith."

Pedro Roig, director of the Office of Cuba Broadcasting, could not be reached for comment. But he told The Miami Herald that hiring Cuban-American journalists was part of a broader mission to improve the stations' quality.

Joe O'Connell, a spokesman for the government's International Broadcasting Bureau, which oversees the Office of Cuba Broadcasting as well as Voice of America and Radio Free Europe, said the bureau did background checks on journalists who contributed to its programming but had no ethics code for them.

After Mr. Williams admitted in 2005 to accepting money from the Federal Education Department through a public relations company, federal auditors said the Bush administration had violated the law by disseminating "covert propaganda."

A few months later, The Los Angeles Times reported that the Pentagon had paid millions of dollars to another public relations firm to plant propaganda in the Iraqi news media and pay friendly Iraqi journalists monthly stipends.

Government spending on Radio and TV Martí — $37 million this year — has long been the subject of criticism because the broadcasts appear to reach only a minute number of Cubans. The Cuban government jams the signals. This year, the Bush administration spent $10 million on a new plane designed to transmit TV Martí more effectively.

Latin America (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2006

When delegates from 116 countries gather for next week's Nonaligned Movement summit in Havana, the question uppermost in their minds will be whether their ailing host, Fidel Castro, is making his final bow on the world's stage.

For the past month, Mr. Castro, 80 years old, has been on the mend from surgery following intestinal bleeding, having temporarily handed power to his younger brother Raul, Cuba's 75-year-old defense minister. But there are precious few details about the health of Cuba's president-for-life, a matter that is considered a state secret.

Some U.S. officials surmise that Mr. Castro is suffering from a fatal stomach cancer, although they won't say so publicly. Earlier this week, Havana, which denies Mr. Castro has cancer, released a letter written by Mr. Castro that said he had lost 41 pounds in 37 days but was now recuperating at a "satisfactory rhythm." Mr. Castro has said he will receive dignitaries at the conference although there is no word on whether he will actually attend. Cubans on both sides of the Florida Straits will be watching his appearance closely for clues of his prognosis.

If the event does amount to Mr. Castro's unofficial farewell from the global stage, Venezuela's fiery president, Hugo Chávez, stands ready to claim the title of heir apparent to his revolutionary mantle. He will be a visible presence at the conference.

DOJ_NMG_0061386

Analysts expect the fiercely anti-American Mr. Chávez to use the gathering to lobby votes to win a seat for Venezuela in the 15-member United Nation's Security Council in elections scheduled for October. A victory for Mr. Chávez, who backs Iran's bid to develop a nuclear program, would be a headache for the U.S. Iran's leader, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, also plans to attend the conference.

To win a Security Council seat, Mr. Chávez has been traveling the globe and generously spreading oil money to win allies. In turn, the U.S. has been exerting pressure behind the scenes to win support for its candidate, Guatemala.

Next week marks the second time that Mr. Castro has played host to the Nonaligned Movement. It was founded at the height of the Cold War in 1961 by Yugoslavia and other nations that wanted to create a counterweight of countries not aligned with either the U.S or the Soviet Union. The organization, most of whose members are developing nations in Asia, Latin America and Africa, has had a difficult time maintaining relevancy since the Cold War ended, but that hasn't stopped delegates from going to a conference every three years in some part of the globe.

Mexico's Election Doubts May Linger (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Top electoral officials and judges are feeding doubts about the outcome of Mexico's presidential vote by declining to release details about a recount of 4 million ballots and by moving quickly to destroy all 41 million ballots, legal experts said Friday.

The seven judges of the Federal Electoral Tribunal declared conservative candidate Felipe Calderon president-elect on Tuesday. But the tribunal's 300-page ruling on the vote left some experts shaking their heads.

John M. Ackerman, a law professor at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, said the judges had made no effort to investigate possible financing improprieties and other charges made by leftist candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. The ruling also failed to cite any legal precedents in its refusal to have the election annulled, Ackerman said.

The court opened ballot boxes and recounted 4 million votes, but only to determine whether there was evidence of outright fraud — and declared that they had found none. The recount tallies were not released.

"The tribunal is explicitly preventing us from seeing what actually happened in the partial recount," Ackerman said. "The result of all this is that we don't have certainty."

A Federal Electoral Tribunal spokesman said the judges would not comment on the ruling. He said no further information would be released on the recount.

On Thursday, the Federal Electoral Institute, or IFE, which organizes elections, denied a request by Ackerman and others to have access to the ballots.

By law, ballots here are destroyed after an election is certified, but the law does not stipulate when.

Irma Sandoval, director of the National Autonomous University's Laboratory for the Study and Analysis of Corruption and Transparency in Mexico, said the ballot request was made through the fledgling public records act, which grants access to documents not covered by privacy and national security restrictions.

"The IFE denied our request because, they said, the ballots are not documents," Sandoval said. "The ballots are printed by the government. But the IFE said that at the moment a citizen marks the ballot, it's no longer a document. It's a very metaphysical argument."

Writers Elena Poniatowska and Carlos Monsivais, who supported Lopez Obrador's presidential bid, joined the petition seeking access to the ballots.

Sandoval said she and others were considering an appeal to the Supreme Court to keep the IFE from destroying the ballots.

The IFE's rejection of the request led Sandoval to compare this election to 1988, when the outgoing government burned ballots rather than allow a recount that might have proved leftist candidate Cuauhtemoc Cardenas' allegations of fraud in his loss to ruling party nominee Carlos Salinas de Gortari.

"All of the reforms we've had since 1988 have been designed to bring the left back into the electoral process, and now the left is on the street," Sandoval said. "If the IFE proceeds with the rushed and premature destruction of the ballots, then the comparisons to 1988 will be more than apt."

Lorenzo Cordova, a law professor at the National Autonomous University, said that although the election was flawed, it was mostly a success. On election day, he said, all of the political parties praised the way the IFE conducted the vote.

"The errors of the IFE were in communication," Cordova said, after the narrow margin between Calderon and Lopez Obrador became clear. "They didn't know how to face a politically delicate situation in the way they released information in the days after the election. They created a lot of doubts."

DOJ_NMG_0061387

Cordova said he opposed granting public access to the ballots because there was no guarantee a "citizen recount" would follow established standards. But he said the election had shown the need for new reforms, including improved regulation of the media and private financing of campaigns.

Mexico Arrests Major Cocaine Suspect (AP)

By Julie Watson

AP, September 9, 2006

Mexican authorities have arrested a reputed major figure in one of Colombia's largest and most feared drug cartels responsible for nearly half of the cocaine smuggled into the United States, U.S. officials said Friday.

Jaime Maya Duran was arrested Wednesday by agents of Mexico's attorney general's office in Mexico City and flown immediately to New York, where he is under indictment on drug trafficking and money laundering charges, the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, said in a news release.

Maya Duran's arrest "shows the determination of U.S. and Mexican law enforcement authorities to pursue the most dangerous criminals, including those who thought they were untouchable," U.S. Ambassador in Mexico Tony Garza said in a statement.

Officials at the attorney general's office in Mexico said they had no immediate comment.

A Colombian citizen, Maya Duran and three other key lieutenants allegedly took over the Norte Valle cartel, based in Cartago, Colombia, after the ring's suspected leader, Luis Hernando Gomez Bustamante, was jailed in Cuba for attempting to enter the country with a false passport two years ago.

The ICE said the cartel is Colombia's largest and most feared, and allegedly exported more than 1.2 million pounds of cocaine to the United States between 1990 and 2004.

Maya Duran allegedly arranged the logistics of drug shipments to the United States and Europe, according to the U.S. State Department.

U.S. officials posted a $5 million reward in his arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0061388

Block, Jonathan

From: Block, Jonathan
Sent: Monday, September 11, 2006 12:41 PM
To: Block, Jonathan
Subject: Sunday Show Transcripts
Attachments: SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS 9.10.doc

Attached, please find the Sunday show transcripts from September 10, 2006.

Jonathan
202-616-0503 (Work)
202-353-5328 (Mobile)

SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS
9/10/06

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Good morning. This is a special edition of MEET THE PRESS, marking the fifth anniversary of September 11. And joining us for the first time in three years is the vice president of the United States, Dick Cheney.

Welcome back.

VICE PRES. DICK CHENEY: Morning, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Vice President, today—tomorrow marks the fifth anniversary of September 11, and in many ways marks the beginning of the war on terrorism. Three years ago the secretary of defense, Donald Rumsfeld, wondered out loud, are we creating or recruiting more terrorists than we are killing? What do you think, five years later? Are there more terrorists now than there were five years ago?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: It's hard to say, Tim, and hard to put a precise number on it. It's, it's changing and evolving to some extent. We've done enormous damage to al-Qaeda, to the leadership of al-Qaeda. We've captured and killed hundreds of, of their senior people. By the same token, you've got one of the organizations, al-Qaeda organizations, out there now that have only a remote connection to the, to the center. The, the groups, for example, that the Brits have uncovered recently. These are second-generation immigrants to the UK. These are not people living in the Middle East or who have grown up in terror training camps in Afghanistan the way the original group did. So it is changing and evolving. On the other hand, I think we both have made—would say I think we've made significant progress.

MR. RUSSERT: It's interesting. Here's what the American people said in a recent poll. Is the U.S. involvement in Iraq or Afghanistan creating more terrorists or eliminating terrorists? And look at that. Overwhelmingly, 54 percent, clear majority, believe we are creating more terrorists.

TEXT:

U.S. INVOLVEMENT IN IRAQ AND AFGHANISTAN

CREATING MORE TERRORISTS 54%

ELIMINATING TERRORISTS 15%

The New York Times CBS/Poll

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I, I, I can't buy that. I mean, I think you've got to look what's happening in Afghanistan and Iraq in terms of the—where we were five years ago and where we are today. I mean, take Afghanistan. Afghanistan was governed by the Taliban, one of the worst regimes in modern times, terribly dictatorial, terribly discriminatory towards women. There were training camps in Afghanistan training thousands of al-Qaeda terrorists. All of those training camps today are shut down. The Taliban are no longer in power. There's a democratically elected president, a democratically elected parliament and a new constitution and American-trained Afghan security forces and NATO now actively in the fight against the remnants of the Taliban. We are much better off today because Afghanistan is not the safe haven for terror that it was on 9/11.

MR. RUSSERT: But in Afghanistan, the—one of the British commanders there, Richards, said that 70 percent of the Afghan people are undecided, that we only have until the end of the year to secure that country, that the Taliban is back, that the opium crop has increased 60 percent. We have not secured Afghanistan.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We are still in the fight in Afghanistan and we're likely to be for some considerable period of time. But, you know, come back to the basic proposition with respect to the, the struggle that's under way there in terms of the Taliban. We have had significant activity this summer in southern Afghanistan as NATO moved in and replaced U.S. forces. The Taliban wanted to challenge those. There was the belief that in fact the NATO wouldn't fight as aggressively as U.S. forces would, and so they've made a major effort in that regard. But just in the last 48 hours we've killed 130-some Taliban in, in southern Afghanistan.

In terms of the question of people being on the fence, that, in part, is the reflection of, of the reality of life in that part of the world and the uncertainty in the minds of a lot of people about whether or not the United States will, in fact, stay in the fight. It's one of the major battles that we're going to have here at home as well this year. The basic proposition for our adversaries—and we ought to take a minute and focus on it—they, they want to re-create the old caliphate that stretched from Spain all the way around to Southeast Asia. They want to topple the regimes that are there today, they want to kick the U.S. out of that part of the world, destroy Israel, equip themselves with weapons of mass destructions, etc. In the course of doing that, their strategy for doing that is to break our will. They can't beat us in a stand-up fight, they never have, but they're absolutely convinced they can break our will. The American people don't have the stomach for the fight.

So you look at situation today in Afghanistan or even in Iraq, and you've got people who have doubts. They want to know whether or not if they stick their heads up, the United States, in fact, is going to be there to complete the mission. And those doubts are encouraged, obviously, when they see the kind of debate that we've had in the United States, suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion, validates the strategy of the terrorists.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me stay on Afghanistan, because the front page of The Washington Post today, bin Laden, the trail is stone cold, according to intelligence officials. Do you agree with that?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I don't. I, I, I haven't read the article, I saw the headline. And, you know, there's the, the on again/off again approach, is the U.S. really serious about bin Laden?

We are serious, we've stayed actively and aggressively involved in the hunt for bin Laden from the very beginning. There's been no...

MR. RUSSERT: But this stuff here is real important. This article says that in 2002, the U.S. pulled its Special Operation forces out of Afghanistan and, and really did lower down the volume in seeking—in going after Osama, which is at the exact time that President Bush said, "I don't spend much time on him," talking about bin Laden.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: He's not the only source of the problem, obviously, Tim. If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda, with Zawahiri and the others. But bin Laden has been a top priority for us from the very beginning, he continues to be a top priority today. That hasn't changed. The president and I get periodic reports on our efforts in that regard. There's been no lessening of our interest or of our activity with...

MR. RUSSERT: Pakistan has now a peace pact with the terrorists in the area where we think bin Laden is, creating what Richard Clarke, the former White House adviser on terrorism, calls a "sanctuary." And reports from the RAND Corporation that the Pakistan CIA, the ISI, are in...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: ISID.

MR. RUSSERT: Yeah, are in cahoots with the Taliban. So if the Pakistanis aren't willing to seek bin Laden, and have a peace pact with the terrorists, where are we?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I don't buy the premature question, Tim. I, I think it's wrong and I think the sources you've quoted are wrong. The fact is we've captured and killed more al-Qaeda in Pakistan than any place else in the world in the last five years. President Musharraf has been a great ally. There was, prior to 9/11, a close relationship between the Pakistan intelligence services and the Taliban. Pakistan was one of only three nations that recognized, diplomatically recognized the government of Afghanistan at that particular time. But the fact is Musharraf has put his neck on the line in order to be effective in going after the extremist elements including al-Qaeda and including the Taliban in Pakistan. There have been three attempts on his life, two of those by al-Qaeda over the course of the last three years. This is a man who has demonstrated great courage under very difficult political circumstances and has been a great ally for the United States.

So there's no question in that area along the Afghan/Pakistan border is something of a no man's land, it has been for centuries. It's extraordinarily rough territory. People there who move back and forth across the border, they were smuggling goods before there was concern about, about terrorism. But we need to continue to work the problem. Musharraf just visited Karzai in, in Kabul this past week, they're both going to be here during the course of the U.N. General Assembly meetings over the course of the next few weeks. We worked that area very hard, and the Paks have been great allies in that effort.

MR. RUSSERT: Many people look at Afghanistan and say, "Oh, we're—if we had not been distracted by Iraq, we could have secured Afghanistan, we—it would not be a narco state," which it, it's on the verge of becoming, with 60 percent increase in opium, "and we took our eye off the ball."

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I disagree. There were narcotics being produced, heroin being grown in, in Afghanistan for centuries. It's been the major source of supply because of the nature of the, the area for heroin going to Europe long before the United States got involved in Afghanistan, or long before we got involved in Iraq. That's not a new development. The fact is that we have made major progress in Afghanistan. We've still got a lot to do.

You start with a country that is one of the poorest in the world, that's been racked by decades of civil war and conflict—it was occupied by the Soviets, and then fought over by the Soviets and the mujahideen for years—that badly needed what we have, in fact, provided. We took down the Taliban regime, liberated 25 million people, created a democratic government with a president and a constitution and a new parliament. I was there for the swearing in of, of the Karzai administration, as well as for the new parliament. It is major progress. Is it over? No, it's not over. Is it easy? Of course it's not easy. It's always going to be difficult in that part of the world.

The key here, and, and this is the key in, in a lot of what we do in that part of the world, is to get the locals into the fight. And we've done that, I think, very effectively in Afghanistan. And the U.S. will continue to be involved there, but we've also got great support from our allies. NATO's very heavily engaged now in Afghanistan, in the fight against the Taliban, to secure that nation for its people.

MR. RUSSERT: It is Iraq, however, that the president has said is the central front in the war on terror. This is what he said...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: It is now.

MR. RUSSERT: This is what he said on August 31, 2006. Let's watch it for the record.

(Videotape, August 31, 2006):

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: Iraq is the central front in the war on terror.

(End of videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: And yet if you ask the American people, is the war in Iraq a part of the war on terror, this is what they now say: 46 yes, 53 percent, a majority, say it is not part of the war on terror.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, I beg to differ. Let's walk through it. Look at where we are in Iraq today. I do think we've made major progress. Five years ago, Saddam Hussein was in power in Iraq. Iraq was a major state sponsor of terror. Saddam Hussein was providing payments, bonuses to the families of suicide bombers. He had a history of starting two wars, he had produced and used weapons of mass destruction. It was one of the worst regimes in modern times. We moved aggressively against Saddam Hussein.

Today, you've got Saddam in jail, where he's being prosecuted for having butchered thousands of people; you've got a democratically elected government; there have been three nationwide elections; there has been a new constitution written; we've got almost 300,000 Iraqis now trained and equipped in the security forces. And we are—that's significant progress by anybody's standards. It's still difficult, it's still, obviously, major, major work to do ahead of us. But the fact is, the world is much better off today with Saddam Hussein out of power.

Think where we'd be if he was still there. He'd be sitting on top of a big pile of cash, because he'd have 65 and $70 oil; he would by now have taken down the sanctions because he had already, with the corrupted Oil for Food program, nearly destroyed them when he was still in power; he would be a major state sponsor of terror. We also would have a situation where he would have resumed his WMD programs. That was one of the conclusions of the Duelfer Report. So to suggest that somehow the world's not better off by having Saddam in jail, I mean, is just dead wrong.

MR. RUSSERT: But Mr. Vice President, the primary rationale giving—given for the war in Iraq was Saddam had weapons of mass destruction. You—on August of 2002, this is what you told the VFW. Let's just watch it.

(Videotape, August 26, 2002):

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Simply stated, there is no doubt that Saddam Hussein now has weapons of mass destruction.

(End of videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: In fact, there is grave doubt, because they did not exist along the lines that you described, the president described, and others described. Based on what you know now, that Saddam did not have the weapons of mass destruction that were described, would you still have gone into Iraq?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Yes, Tim, because what the reports also showed, while he did not have stockpiles—clearly the intelligence that said he did was wrong. That was the intelligence all of us saw, that was the intelligence all of us believed, it was—when, when George Tenet sat in the Oval Office and the president of the United States asked him directly, he said, "George, how good is the case against Saddam on weapons of mass destruction?" the director of the CIA said, "It's a slam dunk, Mr. President, it's a slam dunk." That was the intelligence that was provided to us at the time, and based upon which we made a choice.

MR. RUSSERT: So if the CIA said to you at that time, "Saddam does not have weapons of mass destruction, his chemical and biological have been degraded, he has no nuclear program under way," you'd still invade Iraq?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Because, again, look at the Duelfer Report and what it said. No stockpiles, but they also said he has the capability. He'd done it before. He had produced chemical weapons before and used them. He had produced biological weapons. He had a robust nuclear program in '91. All of this is true, said by Duelfer, facts. Also said that as soon as the sanctions are lifted, they expect Saddam to be back in business.

MR. RUSSERT: But the rationale was he had it. A growing threat. All the while, North Korea, which had one or two potential bombs in 2000 when you came into office, now has double or triple that amount. So again, you took your eye off of North Korea to focus on Iraq.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Let's, let's, let's go back to the beginning here. Five years ago, Tim, you and I did this show, the Sunday after 9/11. And we learned a lot from 9/11. We saw, in spite of the hundreds of billions of dollars we'd spent on national security in the years up to 9/11, on that morning, 19 men with box cutters and airline tickets came into the country and killed 3,000 people. We had to take that and, and also the fact of their interest of weapons of mass destruction and recognize, at that time, it was the threat then and it's the threat today that drives much of our thinking, that the real threat is the possibility of a cell of al-Qaeda in the midst of one of our own cities with a nuclear weapon, or a biological agent. In that case, you'd be dealing—for example, if on 9/11 they'd had a nuke instead of an airplane, you'd have been looking at a casualty toll that would rival all the deaths in all the wars fought by Americans in 230 years. That's the threat we have to deal with, and that drove our thinking in the aftermath of 9/11 and does today.

Now, what Saddam represented was somebody who had for 12 years defied the international community, violated 16 U.N. Security Council resolutions, started two wars, produced and used weapons of mass destruction and was deemed by the intelligence community to have resumed his WMD programs when he kicked out the inspectors. Everybody believed it. Bill Clinton believed it, the CIA clearly believed it. And without question, it was a major proposition. But I also emphasize while they found no stockpiles, there was no question in the minds of Mr. Duelfer and others in that survey group that Saddam did in fact have the capability and that as soon as the sanctions were ended—and they were badly eroded—he would be back in business again.

MR. RUSSERT: But let's look at what you told me on that morning of September 16, 2001, when I asked you about Saddam Hussein. Let's watch.

(Videotape, September 16, 2001):

VICE PRES. CHENEY: At this stage, the focus is over here on al-Qaeda and the most recent events in New York. Saddam Hussein is bottled up at this point.

MR. RUSSERT: Do we have any evidence linking Saddam Hussein or Iraqis to this operation?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No.

(End of videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: You said Saddam Hussein was bottled up.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Mm-hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: And he was not linked in any way to September 11.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: To 9/11.

MR. RUSSERT: And now we have the Select Committee on Intelligence coming out with a report on Friday, it says here, "A declassified report released [Friday] by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence revealed that U.S. intelligence analysts were strongly disputing the alleged links between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda while senior Bush administration officials were publicly asserting those links to justify invading Iraq."

You said here that it was pretty well confirmed that Atta may have had a meeting in Prague, that that was credible. All the while, according to the Senate Intelligence Committee in January and in June and in September, the CIA was saying that wasn't the case. And then the president...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, let me, let me—on that—well, go ahead.

MR. RUSSERT: No, go ahead.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No, I want a, I want a chance to jump on that.

MR. RUSSERT: OK, but, but you said it was pretty well confirmed that it was credible and now the Senate Intelligence Committee says not true, The CIA was waving you off.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No.

MR. RUSSERT: Any suggestion there was a meeting with Mohamed Atta, one of the hijackers, with Iraqi officials?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No. The sequence, Tim, was, when you and I talked that morning, we had not received any reporting with respect to Mohamed Atta going to Prague. Just a few days after you and I did that show, the CIA, CIA produced an intelligence report from the Czech Intelligence Service that said Mohammad Atta, leader of the hijackers, had been in Prague in April of '01 and had met with the senior Iraqi intelligence official in Prague. That was the first report we had that he'd been to Prague and met with Iraqis. Later on, some period of time after that, the CIA produced another report based on a photographer—on a photograph that was taken in Prague of a man they claim 70 percent probability was Mohammad Atta on another occasion. This was the reporting we received from the CIA when I responded to your question and said it had been pretty well confirmed that he'd been in Prague. The—later on, they were unable to confirm it. Later on, they backed off of it.

But what I told you was exactly what we were receiving at the time. It never said, and I don't believe I ever said, specifically, that it linked the Iraqis to 9/11. It specifically said he had been in Prague, Mohamed Atta had been in Prague and we didn't know...

MR. RUSSERT: Well, I asked you, I said, "is there a connection between Saddam and 9/11 on September '03" and you said "we don't know."

VICE PRES. CHENEY: (Unintelligible). That's right.

MR. RUSSERT: So you raised that possibility.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: It was raised by the CIA who passed on the report from the Czech Intelligence Service.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. Now the president has been asked, "What did Iraq have to do with the attack on the World Trade Center?" and he said "nothing." Do you agree with that?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I do. So it's not...

MR. RUSSERT: So it's case, case closed.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We've never been able to confirm any connection between Iraq and 9/11.

MR. RUSSERT: And the meeting with Atta did not occur?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We don't know. I mean, we've never been able to, to, to link it, and the FBI and CIA have worked it aggressively. I would say, at this point, nobody has been able to confirm...

MR. RUSSERT: Then why, in the lead-up to the war, was there the constant linkage between Iraq and al-Qaeda?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: That's a different issue. Now, there's a question of whether or not al-Qaeda, or whether or not Iraq was involved in 9/11. There's a separate—apart from that's the issue of whether or not there was a historic relationship between Iraq and al-Qaeda. The basis for that is probably best captured in George Tenet's testimony before the Senate Intel Commission, an open session, where he said specifically that there was a pattern of relationship that went back at least a decade between Iraq and al-Qaeda.

MR. RUSSERT: But the president said they were working in concert, giving the strong suggestion to the American people that they were involved in September 11th.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No. There are, there are two totally different propositions here, and people have consistently tried to confuse them. And it's important, I think—there's a third proposition, as well, too, and that is Iraq's traditional position as a strong sponsor of terror.

So you've got Iraq and 9/11, no evidence that there's a connection. You've got Iraq and al-Qaeda, testimony from the director of CIA that there was indeed a relationship, Zarqawi in Baghdad, etc. Then the third...

MR. RUSSERT: The committee said that there was no relationship. In fact...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, I haven't seen the report; I haven't had a chance to read it yet, but the fact is...

MR. RUSSERT: But Mr. Vice President, the bottom line is...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We know, we know that Zarqawi, running a terrorist camp in Afghanistan prior to 9/11, after we went in to 9/11, then fled and went to Baghdad and set up operations in Baghdad in the spring of '02 and was there from then, basically, until basically the time we launched into Iraq.

MR. RUSSERT: The bottom line is, the rationale given the American people was that Saddam had weapons of mass destruction and he could give those weapons of mass destruction to al-Qaeda and we could have another September 11. And now we read that there is no evidence, according to the Senate Intelligence Committee, of that relationship. You've said there's no involvement. The president says there's no involvement.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No, Tim, no involvement in what respect?

MR. RUSSERT: In September 11, OK. The CIA said, leading up to the war, that the possibility of Saddam using weapons of mass destruction was "low." It appears that there was a deliberate attempt made by the administration to link al-Qaeda in Iraq in the minds of the American people and use it as a rationale to go into Iraq.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Tim, I guess—I don't—I'm not sure what part you don't understand here. In September—or in 1990, the State Department designated Iraq as a state sponsor of terror. Abu Nidal, famous terrorist, had sanctuary in, in Baghdad for years. Zarqawi was in Baghdad after we took Afghanistan and before we went into Iraq. You had the facility up at Kermal, poisons facility, ran by Ansar Islam, an affiliate of al-Qaeda. You had the fact that Saddam Hussein, for example, provided payments to the families of suicide bombers of $25,000 on a regular basis. This was a state sponsor of terror. He had a relationship with terror groups. No question about it. Nobody denies that.

The evidence we also had at the time was that he had a relationship with al-Qaeda. And that was George Tenet's testimony, the director of the CIA, in front of the Senate Intelligence Committee. We also have a—had knowledge of the fact that he had produced and used weapons of mass destruction and we know, as well, that while he did not have any production under way at the time, that he's clearly retained the capability, and the expectation from the experts was as soon as the sanctions were lifted he'd be back in business again.

Now this was the place where, probably, there was a greater prospect of a connection between terrorists on the one hand and a terrorist-sponsoring state and weapons of mass destruction than any place else. You talk about Iran, North Korea, they're problems, too, but they hadn't been through 12 years of sanctions and resolutions by the U.N. Security Council and ignored them with impunity.

MR. RUSSERT: The American people have now pretty much made their views of the war known. We asked them, "The Iraq war, is it worth it?" And look at this: 39 percent say worth it, 59 percent—nearly six in 10--say not worth it. The president has said we will stay the course...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Mm-hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: ...complete the mission, finish the job. How do you define victory? And why have the American people turned against the war?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, Tim, I think people obviously are frustrated, because of the difficulty, because of the cost, because of the casualties, but you cannot look at Iraq in isolation. You have to look at it within the context of the broader, global war on terror. Remember what we've been involved in here. We've been involved in Afghanistan, take down the Taliban, stand up to the regime, etc. Pakistan, we've gone in and worked closely with Musharraf to take down al-Qaeda. Saudi Arabia, same thing. In all of those cases, it's been a matter of getting the locals into the fight to prevail over al-Qaeda and al-Qaeda-related tyrants.

Now comes Iraq. Now we've got people saying, "Gee, get out of Iraq. You ought to pack it in and go home. It's unrelated." Now you've got hundreds of thousands, millions of people out there who have staked their fate in some extent on the United States. Think of all those people who turned out in the face of assassins and car bombers to vote. Think of the hundreds of thousands of folks who've signed on to the security forces of Iraq and Afghanistan. Think of Musharraf who puts his neck on the line every day he goes to work, when there've been attempts on his life because of his support for our position. And they look over here and they see the United States that's made a commitment to the Iraqis, that's gone in and taken down the old regime, worked to set up a democracy, worked to set up security forces, and all of a sudden we say it's too tough, we're going home. What's Karzai going to think up in Kabul? Is he going to have any confidence at all that he can trust the United States, that in fact we're there to get the job done? What about Musharraf? Or is Musharraf and those people you're talking about who are on the fence in Afghanistan and elsewhere going to say, "My gosh, the United States hasn't got the stomach for the fight. Bin Laden's right, al-Qaeda's right, the United States has lost its will and will not complete the mission," and it will damage our capabilities and all of those other war fronts, if you will, in the global war on terror.

MR. RUSSERT: But the alternative view is that this has been a fundamental set of misjudgment, there were no weapons of mass destruction, there was no linkage of Iraq to September 11 and that there's a, there's a disconnect between rhetoric and reality. I want to go back to May 30, 2005, when you said to the American people and to the world, "I think the level of activity [in Iraq] that we see today, from a military standpoint, I think will clearly decline. I think they're in the last throes, if you will, of the insurgency."

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: Since that time, Mr. Vice President, look at this. Between the beginning of the war and May 30 when you made that statement, we had 1,656 deaths in Iraq. There are now a thousand more American servicemen. There are 7,500 more wounded and injured. There are 20,000 more dead Iraqis. Wasn't it a flat-out mistake to say we were in the last throes of the insurgency?

TEXT:

U.S. MILITARY

CASUALTIES IN IRAQ

	DEATHS	WOUNDED
MARCH 19, 2003-	1,656	12,516
MAY 30, 2005
TOTAL	2,655	19,945

Source: Associated Press/Department of Defense

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I think there's no question, Tim, that the insurgency's gone on longer and been more difficult that I had anticipated. I'll be the first to admit that. But I also think when we look back on this period of time 10 years from now—and this is the context in which I made that statement last year—that 2005 will have been the turning point. Because that's the point at which the Iraqis stepped up and established their own political process, wrote a constitution, held three national elections, and basically took on the responsibility for their own fate and their future.

And as I mentioned before, in Afghanistan, in Pakistan, in Saudi Arabia, and in Iraq, the key to victory is for us to be able to get the locals into the fight. The United States can't do it all by itself. It can't be only U.S. security forces fighting in, in Iraq or Afghanistan. They've got to be willing to step up and take on the responsibility for their own fate. But they're doing it and it's absolutely essential that we complete that mission.

Now, is it tough and difficult? Absolutely. No doubt about it. You know, you regret every single casualty. I visit with the families. We spend time with the wounded when they come back. I visit with the troops every chance I get. It's the toughest thing the president has to do, but it is absolutely the right thing to do, Tim, because if we weren't there, if Saddam Hussein were still in power, the situation would be far worse than it is today.

You'd have a man who had demonstrated capacity for violence, who started two wars, who had, in fact, been involved with weapons for mass destruction, who had every intention of going back to it when the sanctions were lifted. And by this point, especially with Ahmadinejad living next door in Iran, pursuing nuclear weapons, there's no doubt in my mind that if Saddam Hussein was still in power, would have a very robust program under way to try to do exactly the same thing. The world is better off because Saddam Hussein is in jail instead of in power in Baghdad. It was the right thing to do and if we had it to do over again, we'd do exactly the same thing.

MR. RUSSERT: Exactly the same thing?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Yes, sir.

MR. RUSSERT: Leading up to the war, three days before the war, you were on this program and I asked you a question.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: And I asked you about an analysis of what could occur.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Mm-hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: Let's just watch, and we'll talk about it.

(Videotape, March 16, 2003):

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Now, I think things have gotten so bad inside Iraq from the standpoint of the Iraqi people, my belief is, we will, in fact, be greeted as liberators.

MR. RUSSERT: If your analysis is not correct, and we're not treated as liberators, but as conquerors, and the Iraqis begin to resist, particularly in Baghdad, do you think the American people are prepared for a long, costly and bloody battle with a—significant American casualties?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, I don't, I don't think it's likely to unfold that way, Tim, because I really do believe we will be greeted as liberators.

(End of videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: In fact, it did unfold that way. It has been a long, costly and bloody war.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: It has.

MR. RUSSERT: And...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, the first part, getting rid of Saddam, was not.

But clearly, the insurgency and the aftermath has been.

MR. RUSSERT: But again, wasn't your judgment overly rosy? "Greeted as liberators." Now we're not...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: You, you gave me a choice, Tim, "Will you be greeted as occupiers or liberators?" and I said we'll be greeted as liberators. And we were.

MR. RUSSERT: But I said what about a long, costly, bloody battle, and you said it's unlikely to unfold that way.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: And that's true within the context of the battle against the Saddam Hussein regime and his forces. That went very quickly. It was over in a relatively short period of time. What obviously has developed after that, the insurgency, has been long and costly and bloody, no question.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Vice President, Tommy Franks, when he landed in Iraq, had a meeting and said, "All right, stop making plans, we're going down to 30,000 troops at the end of this year in 2003." There was a view of the administration that you were going to walk in, topple the government, and that was it. And now, three and a half years later, we are in Iraq for a long, long time, with 2,500 deaths, 20,000 wounded and injured. There were some fundamental misjudgments made.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I think there's no question, but what we did not anticipate an insurgency that would last this long.

MR. RUSSERT: Three hundred billion dollars spent so far. The Congressional Budget Office says if we stay in Iraq through the end of 2009, it'll be a half trillion dollars. In all candor, could that $300 billion we've spent so far in Iraq not have been better spent securing Afghanistan, improving airline security, having technology for gels and liquids so people can get on without being nervous? Our cargo in our ports. Could that $300 billion have not been better spent securing our nation against terrorists rather than in Iraq?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, Tim, I think we've done a pretty good job of securing the nation against terrorists. You know, we're here on the fifth anniversary, and there has not been another attack on the United States. And that's not an accident, because we've done a hell of a job here at home, in terms of homeland security, in terms of the terrorist surveillance program we've put in place, in terms of the financial tracking program we put in place, and because of our detainee policy, where we, in fact, were able to interrogate captured terrorists to get the kind of intelligence that has allowed us to disrupt...

MR. RUSSERT: But could it have been better spent?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, I'm not sure that it could have been. I don't know how much better you can do than no, no attacks for the last five years.

MR. RUSSERT: But the Commission on 9/11 says that we get D's and F's.

People with...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well...

MR. RUSSERT: People with radios in police departments can't—in D.C. cannot talk to Alexandria. Four-fifths of the mayors say they can't communicate with their localities. People can't carry toothpaste and shampoo on planes. The administration cut $6 million—or tried to—out of funding to screen those kind of things...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Tim...

MR. RUSSERT: ...and—rather than spending the money in Iraq.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We have spent billions on homeland security. You can always find more you can spend funds on. But the fact of the matter is, I think we've done a pretty good job. And I don't know how you can explain five years of no attacks, five years of successful disruption of attacks, five years of, of defeating the efforts of al-Qaeda to come back and kill more Americans. You've got to give some credence to the notion that maybe somebody did something right.

I think we did. I think we did a lot right. And I think part of what we did right was to take the fight to the enemy, to treat this as a war, not a law enforcement problem, which is the way these kinds of things have been treated before we arrived; to actively and aggressively go after the state sponsors of terror, as we did, for example, in Afghanistan and Iraq; to aggressively go after those places where the terrorists might be able to lay their hands on that deadly technology they'd like to use in that next attack. So I think we got it right. Now, I can't say it's perfect, obviously, you can always look back and find things you'd like to differently or do better. But on a broad, overall strategic sweep of what we did, what we set out as our objectives, the strategy we pursued to get there, I think we've done a pretty good job.

MR. RUSSERT: But ambassador—U.S. ambassador to Iraq said it's not foreign terrorists that are the biggest threat in Iraq, it is a sectarian war, Sunnis killing Shiites, Shiites killing Sunnis. And we are now...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Remember how we got there, though. You know, the way we got to the sectarian strife in Iraq was because of Zarqawi, who was the head of al-Qaeda in Iraq...

MR. RUSSERT: But...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: ...who went and pursued a deliberate policy of attacking the Shia in order to try to foment strife between Shia and Sunni and, I must say, he had some success, obviously, with the bombing of the, of the mosque at Samarra earlier this year. Now, we got Zarqawi. He's dead. But we're still having to deal with the legacy of the al-Qaeda strategy that they put in place inside Iraq, to in fact go after the Shia and the Sunni.

MR. RUSSERT: But Mr. Vice President, the president of the United States said Hezbollah has killed more Americans than any other terrorist organization than al-Qaeda. The largest demonstration in favor of Hezbollah was in Iraq. Hundreds of thousands of Iraqis on the street supporting Hezbollah. I asked the foreign minister of Iraq, "Is Hezbollah a terrorist organization?" He said, "I can't make that judgment."

The parliament, the speaker of the parliament, Dennis Hastert of Iraq, Tip O'Neill of Iraq, said it was the Jews that were causing the violence. What are we creating in Iraq? I ask you again, what is victory? What is staying the course? What is winning?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Tim, victory in Iraq will be a situation in which there is a viable government representative of the people of Iraq, elected under their constitution. We're part way there. It'll be an Iraq that is not a threat to the United States in terms of being a safe haven for terrorists. It'll be an Iraq where al-Qaeda has been pretty well eliminated, where in fact the Iraqis are able to govern and deal with the difficult political situations, obviously, that exist inside Iraq, given their history. Those are all things that need to happen, and, but I think we're well on the way to doing it. And we're better off there because of what we've done to date. We're less likely to have a threat emerge against the United States from that corner of the world than would've been the case if Saddam were still there.

MR. RUSSERT: Have we, have we created a fundamentalist Islamic regime in Iraq?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No.

MR. RUSSERT: The prime minister of Iraq is going where tomorrow? Iran.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Mm-hmm. It's a neighbor.

MR. RUSSERT: If, if you go to southern Iran, Richard Engel, our correspondent, has been there for three years, they answer the phone in the hotels in Persian. Iran has built an airport in Najaf. They built a railroad in Najaf in Iraq. Who has more influence with Iraq? Iran or the U.S.?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, I think the U.S. does today, but there's no question but what the new government of Iraq has to get along with its neighbors. It also visits the Saudis. It also has had sessions with the other governments in the region. Their people need to work with the Turks, with the Syrians, with the Jordanians and with others. We have encouraged the states in the region to come together to help the new government in Iraq. It is a Shia government, no question about it. They've got close ties. Iran was the place where most of the leadership took refuge during the period of time when Saddam Hussein was in power, because it was the only place they could go.

But the fact of the matter is, you're a lot better off today. You don't have a government in Baghdad that's pursuing weapons of mass destruction, you don't have a government in Baghdad that is a state sponsor of terror. You don't have a government in Baghdad that is doing all those things that Saddam Hussein did for so long. So we're safer.

MR. RUSSERT: But you've also lost—you've also lost a buffer to Iran, and that's what I'm going to come back and talk about, if I could.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Mm-hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: A quick break with the vice president of the United States, Dick Cheney, right after this.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: More with Vice President Dick Cheney after this brief station break.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we're back with the vice president of the United States, Dick Cheney. Let me show you what Mr. Khatami from Iran, visiting the United States, had to say and read it to you and our viewers.

"Former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami warned that U.S. military action in the Middle East has backfired, producing greater terrorism, imperiling the future of Iraq and damaging America's long-term interests.

"But the danger of even great instability in the region will ultimately prevent the U.S. from launching military strikes against Iran over disputes about its nuclear intentions, he predicted. ...

"America will not make the" same "mistake of attacking Iran. ... Iran is not Iraq." Is he right?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, we certainly understand Iran is not Iraq. I'm not sure I would agree with much of what else he said. Obviously, we're concerned about what Iran is up to. We think their pursuit of enrichment capability that would allow them ultimately to produce nuclear weapons is fundamentally a problem for that part of the world. That's a view shared by most of our friends in the international community.

MR. RUSSERT: How do you stop them?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, we've started through the process of working with the other nations involved. The EU 3, the Russians and the Chinese, we've got resolutions for the U.N. Security Council, a tough resolution in July, that basically calls on them to give up their nuclear aspirations. And since they have not responded affirmatively to that, we're now in the process of negotiating with the U.N. Security Council members and part of that P5 process on a set of sanctions that could be approved by the United Nations and imposed on Iran.

MR. RUSSERT: Will we do anything to stop the Iranians from having a nuclear bomb?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We have said repeatedly that we think they should not have a nuclear bomb. And we have also made it abundantly clear we want to solve the problem diplomatically. But the president has always emphasized no options have been taken off the table.

MR. RUSSERT: Is there a problem with our country and the world if the president came forward and said, "I have intelligence which says Iran is this far advanced," and people in the world and the people in the country say, "Is that the same intelligence that you had on Iraq, Mr. President?"

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, the—of course, much of the information that's been available on what Iran is doing is the result of inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Inspectors have been kicked out of Iraq. Obviously, here you've got more access from an international body that I think most people wouldn't question.

MR. RUSSERT: But you rejected their intelligence leading up to Iraq.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: I asked you on this very program...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: That's correct.

MR. RUSSERT: ...about ElBaradei and you said he's wrong.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Yes. It wasn't consistent with our report.

MR. RUSSERT: But he was right about Iraq.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I haven't, I haven't looked at it. I'd have to go back and look at it again. But your point, Tim, in terms of the credibility of the reporting, there's not much dispute within the international community—and that includes the Russians, that includes the Europeans—that in fact the Iranians are pursuing capabilities that would allow them to produce nuclear weapons.

MR. RUSSERT: Do we have the military wherewithal to take out the Iranian program?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I, I don't want to speculate on military options. It's not wise. And Rumsfeld would probably object.

MR. RUSSERT: What about North Korea? Do we have the military capability...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Tim, I'm not going to speculate on military capabilities.

I think it's not helpful to do that.

MR. RUSSERT: But their, but their potential has increased three- and fourfold. Our estimates are now they could build 12 nuclear bombs.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I'm not going to speculate, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn back home, domestic politics, and talk about the whole situation involving Scooter Libby, your former chief of staff, who was indicted by Patrick Fitzgerald. This was a document that was released in the investigation. It's a New York Times op-ed piece with your handwriting on it. And that handwriting says, "Or did his wife send him on a junket?" referring to Ambassador Joe Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, who was a CIA, CIA agent. Did you, in any way, authorize Scooter Libby to release her name or her occupation to the press?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Tim, Scooter Libby is, he's a good man. He's a friend of mine. He's somebody—one of the most competent and capable people I've ever known. He's entitled to the presumption of innocence. But there is a legal matter pending, there is going to be a trial next year, I could well be a witness in the trial, and much as I would like to talk about, and I certainly have strong opinions about the case, I think it'd be totally inappropriate for me to do so.

MR. RUSSERT: There was a story in the National Journal that Cheney authorized Libby to leak confidential information. Can you confirm or deny that?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I have the authority as vice president under executive order issued by the president to classify and declassify information. And everything I've done is consistent with those authorities.

MR. RUSSERT: Could you declassify Valerie Plame's status as an operative?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I've said all I'm going to say on the subject, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you think the president should pardon Scooter Libby?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I've said all I'm going to say on the subject, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: You wouldn't support a pardon?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I've said all I'm going to say on the subject.

MR. RUSSERT: How about Richard Armitage, who's come forward and said that he was the original source for Robert Novak some years ago?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Does he need a pardon?

MR. RUSSERT: Are you upset or concerned...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Tim, I'm not going to discuss the subject. I understand why you want to ask about it, but the fact of the matter is it's a matter pending before the courts, and since I could be a witness, I think it's inappropriate for me to say anything more.

MR. RUSSERT: The New York Times today, "Cheney's power no longer goes unquestioned," suggesting that your support of issues regarding the treatment and prosecution of terror suspects, of the national NSA surveillance eavesdropping policy, has weakened your influence within the White House.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Is that a question?MR. RUSSERT: Yes, sir. Has it?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I, I haven't read the story in any great detail. It looks like one of those thumbsuckers that's done periodically. It's probably as valid as the ones that were done saying I was in charge of everything. Obviously...

MR. RUSSERT: Were you?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: ...I give my advice to the president, the president makes his decisions. Sometimes he agrees, sometimes he doesn't.

MR. RUSSERT: When you were on this program, you did talk about being on the dark side, that we're going to have to get involved intelligence and do some things with shady characters and so forth. Is that what we've done the last five years?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We have done everything we could think of to make the nation safe. That's our number one obligation. The, the oath that the president and I take when we're sworn in up there on Capitol Hill is always to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. And we've done everything within our power and within the Constitution to in fact pursue that objective. And that's meant that we have gone after, for example, we set up the terrorist surveillance program, which has been instrumental in, in identifying key communications involving our adversaries, just as the financial tracking program has been vital in terms of tracking the money, and the detainee program, which has allowed us to collect some extraordinarily valuable intelligence from the terrorists we capture. It's all been done in a manner that's consistent with the president's authorities, with the Constitution, with our treaty obligations and with the blessing of the lawyers. So any suggestion we've gone beyond where we should have, I would just—I would take issue with. The fact of the matter is I see part of my job is to think about the unthinkable, to focus upon what, in fact, the terrorists may have in store for us, and make sure...

MR. RUSSERT: But the Supreme Court did tell you you needed congressional authority.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Yes. I happen to disagree with the Supreme Court. I think they made a—I think the Thomas/Scalia/Alito minority views were the correct ones. The fact of the matter is, the Court said, for example, the Geneva Convention applies to terrorists, that this is a—that common Article$ Three applies to an international conflict. We never before believed it did, the Court never believed it did.

MR. RUSSERT: But no regret over the treatment of, of the suspects:

waterboarding, some of the—loud music—some of the other techniques used?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I won't discuss techniques. It's important we preserve certain classified elements of the program. But I will say to you, Tim, that the information we've collected from the detainees, from the people like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the mastermind of 9/11, has probably been some of the most valuable intelligence we've had in the last five years.

MR. RUSSERT: Did they help in any...

VICE PRES. CHENEY: And has helped us prevent attacks against the United States.

MR. RUSSERT: Did it help in any way with the London terror plot?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: The detainee program?

MR. RUSSERT: Mm-hmm.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I can't say that.

MR. RUSSERT: There is a report in the papers today that the Republican Campaign Committee of the House is going to spend $50 million between now and the midterm elections, and 90 percent of that money is on negative advertising against the Democratic opponents. Is that appropriate?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, Tim, I haven't seen the ads. I hope our guys have good, hard-hitting advertisements, certainly the opposition does. And I don't see anything inappropriate about a tough, hard-charging campaign. This is an important campaign. Just think about what's at stake in this election in terms of national security and the global war on terror and where we go on these issues you and I have been talking about this morning.

MR. RUSSERT: What happens if the Democrats win the House of Representatives?

What do you expect?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I don't think it'll happen. I don't expect that Nancy Pelosi will be speaker. I think we're doing very well out there. I feel better about the election now than I did three months ago.

MR. RUSSERT: But do you fear serious oversight of the Bush administration?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We've had oversight all along, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: With robust congressional hearings?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We've had oversight all along.

MR. RUSSERT: Not—with robust congressional hearings?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: With robust congressional hearings.

MR. RUSSERT: Like the Democrats would have?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: On, on what?

MR. RUSSERT: On the war in Iraq, on weapons of mass destruction.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: We have those all the time now anyway.

MR. RUSSERT: No fears?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No.

MR. RUSSERT: No concerns?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No. Not on that part.

MR. RUSSERT: And you're fully confident you'll maintain control of both Houses?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I think we will, I really do. I've been—spent a lot of time on it, I've done 91 campaigns myself this cycle, since last fall. I'm on the road a lot. I've seen our candidates, I've seen how they're handling the issues. We've generated the resources we need to be able to have a good, hard-fought competition. I—if I had to bet today, I'd bet that—well, I can bet you a dinner that we hold both Houses.

MR. RUSSERT: I don't bet.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: You don't bet. All right.

MR. RUSSERT: Have you been hunting since February 11, 2006?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: No, sir, that was the end of the season.

MR. RUSSERT: No more hunting?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I didn't say that at all, but I have not hunted since then. But I ordinarily wouldn't anyway.

MR. RUSSERT: Will you go out and hunt again?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I do, I will.

MR. RUSSERT: Have you gotten over that incident?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, yeah, I don't know that you ever get over it.

Fortunately, Harry's doing very well, Harry Whittington, and...

MR. RUSSERT: You've talked to him?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Yes, I have. And he's a good man, and he could not have been more gracious or more generous. But it's not the kind of thing I don't think anybody could ever forget. I certainly won't.

MR. RUSSERT: Should I be relieved you didn't bring your shotgun in today?

VICE PRES. CHENEY: I wouldn't worry about it. You're not in season.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Vice President, I hope I never am.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: All right.

MR. RUSSERT: Thank you for sharing your views.

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Thank you, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: And some programming notes: The NFL's back on NBC, Manning vs. Manning tonight. Brother Eli of the Giants battles brother Peyton of the Colts. NBC Sports starts at 7 p.m.

How about those Boston College Eagles? Double overtime victory over the Clemson Tigers, 34-33.

And another match-up in politics. Our SENATE DEBATE series continues next week: Virginia. Republican Senator George Allen debates his opponent, Democrat Jim Webb. Allen vs. Webb right here on MEET THE PRESS next Sunday. And we'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: That's all for today. And as we leave this morning, we remember the 2,973 men, women and children who died on September 11, 2001, and those true heroes who gave their lives so others may live.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: This week, 9/11.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

(UNKNOWN): A plane has crashed into each tower of the World Trade Center.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: It's been five years.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: The people that knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon.

Are we safer? The answer is yes. America is safer.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: But are we safe enough? What more must be done? Have the lessons of 9/11 been learned? Our headliners: The 9/11 commissioners. Chairman Tom Kean, John Lehman, Jamie Gorelick, and Richard Ben-Veniste.

Then, President Clinton pushes back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BILL CLINTON, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I don't want any lies in there parading as truth. That's all.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: The Path to 9/11. That and the rest of the week's politics on roundtable with George Will, Fareed Zakaria, Martha Raddatz and Katrina Vanden Heuvel of The Nation magazine.

Plus, a 9/11 husband transforms the heartbreak of his life.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

(UNKNOWN): How do you respond? That was a question we immediately had to ask ourselves.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And as always, The Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JAY LENO, HOST, TONIGHT SHOW: President Bush announced today we're now safer than we were five years ago. Well, sure, now that Paris Hilton is off the road, yes.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. As we approach the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks this morning, our headliners are the people who know more about those attacks and how America has responded than just about anyone else in the country -- 9/11 commissioners Jamie Gorelick, Richard Ben-Veniste, John Lehman and Chairman Thomas Kean.

And Mr. Chairman, I want to begin with you. And of course, The big debate right now is are we safer five years out from 9/11? But everyone in the debate, Democrats and Republicans alike, begin from the premise that we face an existential threat, a generational challenge. And I want to start with a contrarian challenge to that conventional wisdom that comes from Ohio state political scientist John Mueller. He has a new book called Overblown, and in a current issue of Foreign Affairs, he says -- There is little hard evidence of an active al Qaeda threat in the United States, and the chances of an American in their lifetime being a victim of terrorism are the same as being hit by a comet or a meteor. And he concludes like this:

Although it remains heretical to say so, the evidence so far suggests that fears of the omnipotent terrorists -- reminiscent of those inspired by images of the 20-foot tall Japanese after Pearl Harbor or the 20-foot tall communists at various points in the Cold War -- may have been overblown. The massive and expensive homeland security apparatus erected since 9/11 may be persecuting some, spying on many, inconveniencing most and taxing all to defend the United States against an enemy that scarcely exists.

Mr. Chairman, is that heresy?

KEAN: Yes, I think so, because, you know, these people do exist. They're out to hurt us, they're out to hurt us badly. They want to kill as many of us as they can possibly kill. They're clever. They plan over long periods of time, and it is a generational threat. It's something unfortunately our children and maybe even our grandchildren will be dealing with, so we have to prepare and we have to try and make this country just as safe as it can possibly be.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And Jamie Gorelick, one estimate I've read is that since the 9/11 attacks, we've had to spend about $750 billion, $750 billion more than we otherwise would have had to spend because of this threat. Are we getting our money's worth?

GORELICK: Yes and no. I mean, we clearly have done some things that we absolutely needed to do in tightening up our borders and sort of hardening the United States as a target. But there's also been tremendous waste, and, you know, there are many details one could give of the waste.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Just give me one. What is the single biggest waste of money you've seen over the last five years?

GORELICK: We as a commission have said that we have given out homeland security funds not based on risk. I mean, if you don't -- if you don't give the funds out based on risk and you instead give it out on politics or some formula that gives Wyoming more than New York City, you know, you are wasting money. And we can see that.

Similarly, if you look at the first responders' inability still after five years to communicate with one another. We've spent a lot of money on it and haven't gotten a lot of bang for that buck.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Secretary Lehman, we had a new poll out this morning at ABC where we asked the country, are we doing well in the war on terror? And we show the trend over the last four years, and it's really remarkable. The number of people who think we're doing well has dropped from about 88 percent to about 52 percent today, and you'll see the number of people who think we're not doing well has climbed to about 47 percent. Does the country have that trend right?

LEHMAN: Well, I think that they do have the trend right because I think while we've had some very notable successes, capturing people like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and the 14 that are going to be tried at Guantanamo is a major accomplishment. We've really gotten rid of most if not all of the theater commanders of al Qaeda.

But we have not yet addressed as a nation the root cause. We are really not looking at the sources, we're looking at their end game, and here we've done very little. We've done almost nothing in diplomacy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So what's the root cause? What's the root cause?

LEHMAN: The root cause is this jihadist ideology that is being preached around the world, basically funded with Persian Gulf money including Iran, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates that have built these jihadist schools all over the world, the mosques, and they're preaching hatred and we haven't addressed it.

And only -- less than half a billion dollars would be need, as we noted in our report, to build alternative schools to give grants to places like Indonesia and Pakistan to provide an alternative where there is none now. If you want to send your child to read and learn to read and write, they also have to learn jihad and hatred, and that's wrong. And all the money we've spent, we've spent almost nothing on making these grants and building the infrastructure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And, Richard...

LEHMAN: Nor have we raised the issue with the Saudis and the UAE: Stop funding this hate-filled ideology.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that does bring -- excuse me, sir-- that brings me to Richard Ben-Veniste and the famous snowflake memo from Secretary Rumsfeld, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. Back in 2003 he wrote a memo to the joint chiefs where he posed the question: Are we capturing, killing or deterring and dissuading more terrorists every day than the madrassas and radical clerics are recruiting, training and deploying against us? What's the answer?

BEN-VENISTE: Absolutely not. And I think that's why many Americans think we are less safe today. We have not killed or captured Osama bin Laden five years after 9/11. And he remains the central focus spiritually, ideologically, if not operationally for Islamic radicals who mean to kill us.

The war in Iraq has been a recruiting poster for jihadists throughout the Muslim world, and there are far more terrorists now than there were on 9/11, and the Iraq invasion and occupation had nothing to do with terrorism. It had nothing to do with 9/11. There was no connection between Saddam Hussein and 9/11.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And the Senate intelligence committee report made that point again this week. But Chairman Kean, let me ask you, do you accept the argument now that the war in Iraq is a diverse from the war on terror, and has it hurt the war on terror?

KEAN: Well, the problem is that where we are right now, when you can argue whether we should have gone in or not gone in, but where we are now is in a very difficult place. There's no question that the war in Iraq is radicalizing, increasing people in that area. If it becomes, as it seems to be coming, a civil war, that civil war could spread outside the boundaries of Iraq to other areas. It's a very dangerous situation.

In that kind of a situation, in that area, that's where terror likes to breed. I mean, where there's ungoverned areas, where there's chaos, that makes more terrorists, and so we've got to, I think we've got to re-evaluate everything in that area of the world and look very carefully, because that whole region, all the way from Lebanon to probably all the way to Pakistan is volatile and dangerous and, as John Lehman said, we've got to have a different American approach over there to give people not despair.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And Jamie, on that point, we now also see in Afghanistan five years later that the Taliban is resurgent, that more opium is being produced there than ever before. And I was struck yesterday in yesterday's New York Times by the NATO operations commander general, James Jones -- he's a United States general -- he said the alliance is not making good on commitments of troops and equipment, and went on to say this: Asked which of the 26 countries in the alliance were dragging their feet, General Jones hesitated and then replied, 'All of them.'

GORELICK: Including us.

STEPHANOPOULOS: All of them.

GORELICK: Yes. I mean, I think as Tom said, and as we all noted in our report, if you have a place that is chaotic like Afghanistan was before our invasion of it to take down the Taliban, it's going to be a breeding ground and a safe haven for folks like the leadership of Al Qaida, and we went in there in order to deprive Al Qaida of that safe haven.

Well, we then pulled out of Afghanistan a sizable number of troops to go to Iraq. We assumed a job was done when it was not. And now the Taliban is resurgent. Well, you combine that with what Richard points out is happening in Iraq. We now have a chaotic situation there. We may not have liked Saddam Hussein, but we didn't have a haven for terrorists, and now we do.

If you combine those two with the fact that Iran, which has been throughout this period the greatest threat to us -- it is resurgent, it is on a powerful trajectory, it has -- it has a plan to have nuclear weapons. It no longer fears us. It has no fear of us now, because of what it sees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So take those problems Jamie lays out, Richard Ben-Veniste, and answer the question, what do we do?

BEN-VENISTE: What do we do? We are in a generational war with Islamist radicals.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Not overblown threat?

BEN-VENISTE: It is perhaps overblown in terms of what we have in the United States and what we need to do in the United States, taking the example of what happened in Spain with the Atocha bombings, in London with the bus and subway bombings, is that the second generation immigrants, practicing Muslims, who were so disaffected by conditions in their home countries, in their new home countries as to be so radicalized as to agree to commit suicide in these kinds of missions -- we need to understand that at home, we can't overreact. We can't target American Muslims simply because of their religion. We have got to continue our system, our democracy, our system of openness and diversity, and encourage people rather than discourage them. That is critical to avoiding the kind of pitfalls we've seen in England and in Spain.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I think what I'm hearing from all of you -- and I want to go back to Secretary Lehman on this -- is that right now, even though you, Jamie Gorelick, talked about the problem here at home on not assigning resources according to risk, the central challenge is in national security, a foreign policy challenge. Is that what I'm hearing, Mr. Lehman?

LEHMAN: That's correct, and it has both a military and a diplomatic and a social aspect. On the military front -- well, we talked about Iraq. Yes, it is a diversion; it's also a diversion for the terrorists. It's not -- there's no doubt it's contributed to our safety here because the jihadists are streaming to Iraq.

And we also have to remember we went into Iraq because of bad intelligence. And it is critical that we carry out the reforms that we called for in the 9/11 report of our intelligence community, because it's not been functioning at all.

And on the foreign policy front, obviously we have to rebuild a coalition to approach this thing, because it's global, and we have to address the issues of the -- all of these jihadist schools. That is the source, and we have to be proactive. We have to prevent the Saudis and the UAE from funding it, and we have to give alternative schools so that we can re-establish some equilibrium in the area.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me get into the issue of bad intelligence, Chairman Kean. We did see the Senate Intelligence Committee report come out this week and say they saw no ties between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein. In fact, they even said that Saddam Hussein wanted to try to capture Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. That seemed to go a little farther than the 9/11 Commission report, which said there were contacts but no operational relationship.

KEAN: Yes, that's what we found. Now, the Senate Intelligence Committee may have found some new information that we didn't know about, but there were some contacts. But no relationship whatsoever between the attack on the United States and Saddam Hussein. That's what we said, and that's what we believe.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I want to turn now to this controversy which hits close to home here at ABC over this movie, The Path to 9/11. And, of course, Chairman Kean, you're also become involved in this because you were a consultant to the movie, and you received a letter a couple of days ago from former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger in the Clinton administration. They say there are many untruths in the movie, and they write -- they wrote this to you: Actors portraying us do contemptible things we never did, and say things we neither said nor believed. And what's more, in many instances, these portrayals are contradicted by your commission's own findings. You should not want to lend your personal reputation to a production which seems likely to instigate new and dangerous falsehoods. And so we ask you that you use your influence to persuade ABC to withdraw the broadcast altogether. Failing that, we urge you to sever your relationship with this grossly misleading production.

Your fellow commissioners here, Richard Ben-Veniste, Jamie Gorelick have also lobbed criticisms against the film. So have Bob Kerrey and Tim Roemer.

Do you think the film should be aired, and will you continue your relationship with the film?

KEAN: Oh, of course, it should be aired. I mean, I'm not for censorship or not allowing people to see things. In my experience with these people who have been working on the film, they've been very responsive to criticism, mine and other people's, and have made changes that were necessary.

I haven't seen the final cut. It's a mini series. It's not a documentary.

It's not done by ABC News. It's done by ABC News Entertainment. But as I've seen it, I think it'll make a contribution.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the two...

KEAN: If, by the way -- if people blame Bill Clinton after seeing this, then the miniseries has failed. That's wrong and it shouldn't happen.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me get to the specifics for a second because both Sandy Berger and Secretary of State Albright appear in scenes in the film, which, according to those who have seen it, including Richard Ben-Veniste, are not only not supported by the 9/11 commission report but are directly contradicted by the 9/11 commission report.

Did you ask the filmmakers to change those scenes?

And did they change them?

KEAN: I don't know. I haven't seen the final cut. Any problems with it have been brought to their attention. All I can say is they've been responsive in the past.

I haven't seen the final product. But I think people who do see the final product, people who are watching tonight and tomorrow night, are going to see a film which really makes you understand a little better the kind of people, the kind of minds of these terrorists.

And the whole film leads into -- because it follows the plot for six years of the Clinton administration and six or eight months of the Bush administration. Both administrations are faulted. And in the end, I think, you're led to our recommendations.

You're led, at the end of the film, to why haven't we done more, at this point, to make the world safer and to make the United States safer?

STEPHANOPOULOS: Richard Ben-Veniste, you have seen at least one version of the film, an early version of the film. You said many parts of it are fiction.

The early promotional materials for the film said it was based on the 9/11 Commission Report. Now they're saying that it is based in part on the 9/11 Commission Report. Are you comfortable with that?

BEN-VENISTE: I don't think that cures the problem. The power of a docudrama is such that many people will come away from it thinking that this is the fact.

I hope ABC has taken the steps to remedy the substantial fictionalization and the distortion of the facts that were in the version that I saw.

I think this has been an unfortunate diversion from marking the fifth anniversary and telling the country what has not been done with our recommendations.

We made 41 recommendations to try to make us safer. And as we showed a year ago in our report card, or less than a year ago, there were many F's and D's, in our response, to making this country safer.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But do you agree with Chairman Kean that this film, in its whole, although he hasn't seen the full cut, will reinforce the recommendations, or do you believe it will tarnish the reputation of the commission?

BEN-VENISTE: I don't think the country is yet ready to see the kind of graphic material that's in that film.

That's just my personal idea, George. There have been many films, now, and television programs about 9/11 and the tragedy there.

I think the recommendations that we have made are common sense. They're sensible, to provide us with the kind of tools focused on our enemy, not this broad generalized misspending of our treasure that Jamie had talked about but, rather, a focused approach to what the threats are and how to protect ourselves.

That's what we need to be thinking about.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Jamie Gorelick, you wrote a letter to Bob Iger, raising the criticisms.

Are you comfortable with Chairman Kean's participation?

GORELICK: In my view of this -- I didn't direct my letter to Tom. I directed it to ABC. And the reason is this. If we are going to put this program out and send it to our schoolchildren as the truth, then...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Although the company, Scholastic, has pulled back their endorsement of the teaching materials.

GORELICK: Yes. That was the thing that worried me the most, is that Scholastic was going to take this movie and send it to our schoolchildren as the truth.

I don't think you can act to remedy the problem unless you have an accurate idea of what went wrong. And there were a number of places, as far as I could see, where it was materially inaccurate.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So should the film be pulled?

GORELICK: Well, it should either be pulled or fixed. It's -- you don't need Tom Kean to vet this. You can look at the report.

You know, what they have in -- as portrayed as incidents in the report are clearly contradicted by the words of the 9/11 Commission Report.

We labored for 20 months to get this right. And to have someone come along and rewrite that history, and lead us to conclusions as to what went wrong, will lead us in the wrong direction, if we want to make it right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Secretary Lehman, do you agree with that?

LEHMAN: Well, I agree that people should go back to the report. It's very readable. And that is factual. All of us, Democrats and Republicans, have endorsed that.

I haven't seen the film, but I can reassure and comfort my Democratic colleagues that as a Republican, having lived with the hostility of Hollywood through the last 30 years, that it's not going to have an earth-shaking impact, and I think that it certainly should go forward. It's, I'm told, equally harsh against the Bush administration -- in fact, both Bush administrations, and even back to Reagan for not retaliating against early strikes -- so absolutely it should go forward. And if you don't like the hits to the Clinton administration, well, welcome to the club. The Republicans have lived with Michael Moore and Oliver Stone and most of Hollywood as a fact of life.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Chairman Kean, let me give you the last word. You said you're confident that the film will be powerful in the end and realistic. Are you absolutely confident that tomorrow morning, on Tuesday morning, after your fellow commissioners see the film, they're not going to be saying these scenes, there are scenes in that film which are pure fiction which contradict the 9/11 Commission report?

KEAN: Well, the fascinating thing, George, is nobody's seen the final cut. Most of the people who are talking haven't seen any version whatsoever. Only in the United States and in Washington could this kind of a debate occur about things people haven't seen.

I don't know what the comments are going to be the morning after, but I think they'll be good, and I think people will be glad they saw it, and I think people will get something out of it, and I think it's going to move our recommendations forward. Unless they've changed it, it finishes with our report card, showing so much -- how much still has to be done by this country to make us safer.

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, we're going to have to end it there. Thank you all very much.

The roundtable is next with George Will, Fareed Zakaria, Martha Raddatz and Katrina Vanden Heuvel.

And later, healing the pain of 9/11.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

(UNKNOWN): You know, for every terrorist who sets off a bomb, we're hoping we can find 10 people or 100 people that want to build a school or a clinic.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(ROUNDTABLE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our voice this week, Gene Steuerle. His wife Norma was on American flight 77, the plane that crashed into the Pentagon. But instead of taking $2 million from the 9/11 compensation fund, Gene and his two daughters used the money to create a foundation dedicated to preventing terrorism. It's called Our Voices Together.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

STEUERLE: I think anyone who goes through the grief process eventually comes to the point that they want to do something themselves, they want to reach out, they want to be empowered to act. They don't simply want to be thought of as a victim, and they don't want to treat themselves as a victim.

Our Voices Together is a network of individuals and families who have been affected by terrorism or wanted to respond to terrorism, who are very united to try to reach out in a compassionate way, to try to send a very different message to the world.

One pair of widows does a bike ride to raise money for widows in Afghanistan. Another couple have donated substantial money to set up trauma centers in countries affected by terror. Another lady and her husband have been working very hard to set up educational institutions in Afghanistan, and we have a whole variety of people like this, people who have been affected by the loss of a loved one who are engaged in significant charitable activities. And we'd love to put other people in touch with them.

It's an attempt to reach out to other families around the world, not just because we would be donating money, say, to support a clinic or a school, which I think is important in its own right, you know -- you know, one more person educated, one more person who sees the good will of Americans is one less person who is going to want to hate us down the road.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: You can learn more about Our Voices Together at abcnews.com.

(THE SUNDAY FUNNIES)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's our show for today. Coming tomorrow, 9/11 '06, where things stand: ABC's coverage of the fifth anniversary of 9/11. Nightline's Terry Moran will be part of that coverage from Afghanistan, and he joins us now for a quick preview of where things stand there -- Terry.

TERRY MORAN, ABC NEWS: Well, George, the big question Americans have about Afghanistan five years after the 9/11 attacks were launched from here is, are we winning or losing the war here? And the short answer is both, and that's not evasive.

Afghanistan today is just a much more complex place than it was five years ago, when it was basically rubble that had been ruled by religious zealots. Now at one and the same time you have an economy that is growing pretty healthy, and more violence than any time since 2001. You've got a national government in place, which, while it's seen by many as incompetent and scarred by corruption, is nevertheless taking civil authority into places that have never seen it. And at the same time, the Taliban are back in a big way, controlling large swaths of the south of this country. We'll be looking at all that.

The bottom line here is that what you're seeing is not just the resurgence of the Taliban, but essentially a fight to the death here between zealots and gangsters and local tribal chieftains against a new nation that is unmistakably coming into being -- George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, Terry, thanks very much. Tomorrow's coverage starts on Good Morning America and continues all through the day, on World News, the president's prime-time address and Nightline.

Thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us. We'll see you next week.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. A top Democrat says the U.S. would be better off with Saddam Hussein still in power -- next, on Fox News Sunday.

September 11, 2001:

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: These acts of mass murder were intended to frighten our nation into chaos and retreat. But they have failed. Our country is strong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: September 11, 2006: Is our country stronger and safer? We'll ask the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

And five years later, where are the Democrats in the war on terror? We'll talk with the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Howard Dean.

Also, does the president need new weapons from Congress to fight the terrorists? We'll ask our Sunday regulars: Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams.

And our power player of the week: For him, honoring the 9/11 victims at the Pentagon is personal.

All right now, on a special Fox News Sunday.

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. We're going to spend this hour taking an overview of what we've done and what we still need to do in the war on terror. But we begin, as always, with the latest headlines.

The top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, Jay Rockefeller, says the world would be better off if the U.S. hadn't invaded Iraq, even if that meant Saddam Hussein was still in power. Rockefeller also accused the Bush administration of, quote, cynically and deliberately manipulating public opinion before the war.

The tough CIA interrogation of Abu Zubaydah, a top Al Qaida operative captured in 2002, prompted a bitter fight between the CIA and the FBI. According to a story in today's New York Times, Zubaydah was taken to a safe house in Thailand, where he was stripped, held in an icy room and forced to listen to ear-splitting music.

And in Afghanistan today, NATO and local forces killed almost 100 Taliban insurgents in the southern part of that country. But a provincial governor was killed by a suicide bomber.

And joining us now is the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

Secretary Rice, welcome back to Fox News Sunday.

RICE: Thank you. Good to be with you, Chris.

WALLACE: Let's start with the big picture. Five years later, where do we stand in the war on terror? Where do we stand in the conflict against Islamic extremism?

RICE: I think it's clear that we are safe -- safer, but not really yet safe. And we've done a lot. In terms of homeland, we're more secure, our ports are more secure, our airports are more secure.

We have a much stronger intelligence-sharing operation, not just within the country, where we've broken down walls between law enforcement and intelligence agencies to get all of the information to break up terrorist plots, but also across the world. We have, really, an intelligence network across the world of sharing information.

We've clearly hurt badly the Al Qaida organization that planned and plotted and executed September 11th, capturing many of their major field generals. When the president talked the other day about bringing to justice people like Abu Zubaydah, people like Khalid Sheik

Mohammed, you're really talking about the people who were at the center of that kind of plot of 9/11.

And, Chris, we are making progress for the long run, in having liberated 50 million people and then having new allies in the war on terror, like Afghanistan and, indeed, Iraq.

WALLACE: Any failures?

RICE: Well, certainly. I'm sure there are many things that could be done better. We would like to make more progress. People would always like to make more progress. But...

WALLACE: But anything specifically that you say that, you know, five years later, the war on terror hasn't gone as well?

RICE: History will have to judge, Chris. I think that the record will show that the last five years have been years of reorganizing the United States government, reorganizing our international alliances for this long war, and reorienting our strategic policy toward one that simply will not accept the conditions in the Middle East and in other places that have allowed extremism to flourish at the expense of moderation.

WALLACE: All right. Let's talk about some of the concerns that people have. President Bush calls Iraq, and again this week called Iraq, a central front in the war on terror. But I want to look at some of the other statements made by your administration recently. And let's take a look.

In April, your State Department said, Al Qaida in Iraq has about 1,000 fighters. That's about 5 percent of the total insurgency.

Last month, the Pentagon said, The core conflict in Iraq changed into a struggle between Sunni and Shia extremists seeking to control key areas of Baghdad.

Secretary Rice, what evidence do you have that the homegrown Sunnis and Shia fighting each other in Iraq -- and, of course, that, at this point, is the vast majority of the violence -- that they have any interest in attacking the U.S.?

RICE: Well, clearly, the person who set off much of this sectarian violence, who plotted the nation that Shias should go after Sunnis and you should try and spark civil conflict, actually was the Al Qaida leader at the time, Zarqawi, who has...

WALLACE: But he's gone.

RICE: ... been killed.

Well, but it was his strategy -- and we know that -- to try and set off sectarian violence.

Now, we have to ask the question, why did he try to do that? Because he understood and Al Qaida in Iraq understood that when there is a stable and democratic Iraq, then their plans, the plans of Al Qaida and the extremists, for a Middle East in which there is indeed sectarian violence, in which there is extremism, in which there are repressive regimes of the Taliban type, that will not be possible when there's a democratic Iraq.

And so, yes, Iraq is going through very difficult times, there's no doubt about that. But if you have a broad view of what it will take to defeat extremism, meaning that there will have to be a different kind of environment in the Middle East, it's hard to imagine that different kind of environment with Saddam Hussein in power and Iraq at the center of a nexus between terrorism and conflict.

WALLACE: But I think here's the concern a lot of people have. When we went in there, allegedly to remove the weapons of mass destruction, people understood that as the war on terror. Even when we deposed Saddam Hussein, people understood that as the war on terror. When we were fighting Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, people understood that as the war on terror.

Now we've got Shiites fighting Sunnis, Muqtada al-Sadr -- this are rivalries that go back centuries, tribal rivalries, religious rivalries. Aren't we involved in a terrible case of mission creep here that has nothing to do with the war on terror?

RICE: Chris, it is the Iraqis who will have to settle their own differences. And, indeed, that's why they talk about a process of national reconciliation. That's why they're trying to build security forces that bridge sectarian divides.

Our role, though, was to indeed remove Saddam Hussein. And it's hard to imagine that the world could possibly have gotten better with Saddam Hussein in power, that the Middle East could possibly have gotten better...

WALLACE: Is it our responsibility to solve these ethnic, sectarian problems?

RICE: It is clearly Iraq's responsibility, Iraqis' responsibilities to do that. We...

WALLACE: But we're involved in the fighting.

RICE: Well, but we have to give them an environment in which they can do that. We have to help them build security forces. We have to help them build political institutions.

And, Chris, it would simply be wrong to say that the only problem in Iraq is sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shia. There is still a considerable problem of terrorism from extremists who simply want to see Iraq be part of a Middle East in which the bin Ladens of the world control, not the Malikis, the moderates of the Middle East.

WALLACE: Meanwhile, there is Afghanistan, which used to be the safe haven for Al Qaida and where some of its leaders are still at large.

On Friday, a suicide bomber -- and we have the pictures here -- attacked an American military convoy in Kabul, killing 16 people. The Taliban, which most Americans thought we wiped out back in 2001, is back on the march in the south. And NATO forces, this week, are asking for more troops.

Secretary Rice, why didn't we finish the job in Afghanistan?

RICE: Well, it was not possible, Chris, to, quote, finish the job in Afghanistan. This is going to be also a long process of bringing stability to Afghanistan.

We have made enormous progress over the last 4 1/2 years in Afghanistan. You actually have a national government that is elected in Afghanistan, whose forces are fighting alongside of us rather than the Taliban, which was both harboring Al Qaida and giving them support. You now have for the people of Afghanistan the possibility of a better life. Women are not being beaten in stadiums that were given to the Taliban by the international community.

You have a situation in which, yes, the Taliban is trying to make a strike at the Afghan government because they do not want it to succeed. But the Taliban is not going to succeed. And they're not going to succeed because you have strong NATO and coalition forces and U.S. forces that are beating them back. The Taliban is taking a beating in this.

And, Chris, I want to be very clear. The notion that somehow this is a strategic threat to the Karzai government, I think this is not the case. You are talking about a Taliban that is able, particularly in the south, to wreak a lot of havoc and to bring death and destruction to civilians. But they are being beaten back.

WALLACE: But, again -- and just this week, the head British commander in Afghanistan, Brigadier Ed Butler, said -- and let's put it up on the screen -- The fighting is extraordinarily intense. The intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis.

I'm sure a lot of Americans are saying, isn't it a -- we had them on the run. We had the Taliban completely disrupted. Isn't it a failure to have allowed the Taliban to regroup?

RICE: Well, now, Chris, it's very hard to say that we didn't expect them to fight back. Of course they're going to fight back. Even if they're on the ropes, they're going to fight back. And, yes, they came back somewhat more organized and somewhat more capable than people would've expected. But that's why they're being beaten back by the NATO forces that are there.

I think they also believed that when the United States forces moved out and NATO moved in, that it would be easier to make advances. And they're learning a very brutal lesson, as they encounter NATO forces that are destroying them in very large numbers.

WALLACE: I don't have to tell you that one of the criticisms of the Bush administration -- we heard it again today from Senator Jay Rockefeller -- is that all of you manipulated intelligence to push the country into war.

I want to discuss just one area, the issue of whether Iraq helped Al Qaida with weapons of mass destruction.

Here's what the president said in October of 2002.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We've learned that Iraq has trained Al Qaida members in bomb-making and poisons and deadly gases.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: And in March 2003, just before the invasion, you said, talking about Iraq, and a very strong link to training Al Qaida in chemical and biological techniques.

But, Secretary Rice, a Senate committee has just revealed that in February of 2002, months before the president spoke, more than a year, 13 months, before you spoke, that the Defense Intelligence Agency concluded this -- and let's put it up on the screen.

Iraq is unlikely to have provided bin Laden any useful CB -- that's chemical or biological -- knowledge or assistance.

Didn't you and the president ignore intelligence that contradicted your case?

RICE: What the president and I and other administration officials relied on -- and you simply rely on the central intelligence. The director of central intelligence, George Tenet, gave that very testimony, that, in fact, there were ties going on between Al Qaida and Saddam Hussein's regime going back for a decade. Indeed, the 9/11 Commission talked about contacts between the two.

We know that Zarqawi was running a poisons network in Iraq. We know that Zarqawi ordered the killing of an American diplomat in Jordan from Iraq. There were ties between Iraq and Al Qaida.

Now, are we learning more now that we have access to people like Saddam Hussein's intelligence services? Of course we're going to learn more. But clearly...

WALLACE: But, Secretary Rice, this report, if I may, this report wasn't now. This isn't after the fact. This was a Defense Intelligence Agency report in 2002.

Two questions: First of all, did you know about that report before you made your statement?

RICE: Chris, we relied on the reports of the National Intelligence Office, the NIO, and of the DCI. That's what the president and his central decision-makers rely on. There are...

WALLACE: Did you know about this report?

RICE: ... intelligence reports and conflicting intelligence reports all the time. That's why we have an intelligence system that brings those together into a unified assessment by the intelligence community of what we're looking at.

That particular report I don't remember seeing. But there are often conflicting intelligence reports.

I just want to refer you, though, to the testimony of the DCI at the time about the activities...

WALLACE: That's the head of central intelligence.

RICE: Yes, head of central intelligence -- that were going on between Al Qaida and between Iraq.

But let me make a broader point. The notion, somehow -- and I've heard this -- the notion, somehow, that the world would be better off with Saddam Hussein still in power seems to me quite ludicrous.

Saddam Hussein had gone to war against his neighbors twice, causing more than a million deaths. He had dragged us into a war in 1991 because he invaded his neighbor Kuwait. We were still at war with him in 1998 when we used American forces to try and disable his weapons of mass destruction. We went to war again with him, day in and day out, as he shot at our aircraft trying to patrol no-fly zones. This was a mass murderer of more than 300,000 of his own people, using weapons of mass destruction.

The United States and a coalition of allies finally brought down one of the most brutal dictators in the Mi ddle East and one of the most dangerous dictators in the Middle East, and we're better off for it.

WALLACE: We have about a minute left, and I want to get into one last area.

There have been several stories this week that you prevailed over Vice President Cheney in the debate over whether or not to pull these top, high-valued prisoners, like Zubaydah and Khalid Sheik Mohammed, out of the CIA prisons. Also, reports that you now have more clout with the president than Vice President Cheney because of mistakes in judgment he made in the first term.

Have you replaced...

RICE: Oh, I think these are...

WALLACE: ... the vice president?

RICE: These are truly among most of the ridiculous stories. These stories float around Washington -- who's up, who's down.

The vice president remains a crucial adviser to the president. His role is different than my role. But not only is he a crucial adviser to the president, in whom the president relies, but he's also someone on whom all of us rely, including me, for advice and counsel because of his great experience and because of his great wisdom on these issues.

No, these stories are simply ridiculous.

WALLACE: You have not replaced the vice president as the president's top foreign policy adviser?

RICE: I'm the secretary of state, Chris. I have a different role from the vice president.

But let's remember who ultimately makes the decisions on foreign policy. It's the president of the United States himself.

WALLACE: We're going to have to leave it there. Secretary Rice, thanks for coming in...

RICE: Thank you.

WALLACE: ... and thanks for giving us your perspective on this fifth anniversary.

RICE: Thank you.

WALLACE: Coming up, as we continue our coverage of where our country is five years after 9/11, we'll talk with the head of the Democratic Party, Howard Dean. Back in a moment.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: Joining us now to look at what's happened since 9/11 is the head of the Democratic Party, former Governor Howard Dean.

And, Governor, welcome back to Fox News Sunday.

DEAN: Thanks for having me on, Chris.

WALLACE: Let's start with the same question I asked Secretary Rice. Five years later, where are we in the war on terror?

DEAN: I think we're in trouble. We have not pursued the war on terror with the vigor that we should have because we've gotten bogged down in this civil war in Iraq. What we ought to be doing is going after Osama bin Laden full-scale. We ought to capture him, we ought to kill him -- or kill him. And then we need to fight the terrorists which blew up the World Trade Center and killed 3,000 Americans.

WALLACE: Now, you say that we're in trouble. How do you explain the fact that, five years after 9/11, there has not been another attack on the U.S. homeland?

DEAN: Look, there has been improvement. I mean, we've done some things that we should've done, in terms of improving our intelligence and so forth.

But we proposed, the Democrats proposed, port security money, rail security money, airport security money, chemical plant security money. The Republicans turned it down. There's a lot of politics in this.

We need to do a much better job.

There was an article in the paper today -- I'm sure you saw -- that Secretary of Defense Don Rumsfeld said, We don't want a post-war plan for the reconstruction of Iraq, and then he threatened to fire any general who proposed one.

We are not paying attention to what needs to be done. Today, or this week, northern Pakistan was written off by President Musharraf of Pakistan. They have now a treaty that they won't go -- or an agreement with the tribes that they won't go in and enforce their jurisdiction.

You know, Afghanistan is turning against us, and that is where the fight on terror is. That's where Osama bin Laden is. Osama bin Laden has not been captured five years later. That's a big problem.

WALLACE: Let's talk, because you talk about the things that haven't been done. The White House, the Republicans counter that your party won't give the president the powers he needs to fight the war on terror.

Let's take a look at the NSA warrantless eavesdropping program, because after it was revealed last December -- and let's put it up on the screen -- The Bush administration's secret program to spy on the American people reminds Americans of the abuse of power during the dark days of President Nixon and Vice President Agnew.

Do you really compare protecting the American people to Watergate?

DEAN: No, I compare protecting the American people to -- what the Bush administration has done to protect American people to some of the abuses of power that Nixon and Agnew were doing, which was listening in on Americans.

Here's the problem...

WALLACE: There's a big difference, though, isn't there, Governor? One was for political gain; the other, even if it you think it's being done wrong, is to try to protect America.

DEAN: Well, unfortunately, as you said in the last section, there's mission creep here. We think it's a great thing to spy on Al Qaida; of course we should spy on Al Qaida. The problem is that's not just all they've been doing. It turns out they've had a broad-brush program so they can listen to everybody's phone calls if they want to. And they have.

And now there's a protection set up to do that. You could do all the things the president is doing and still obey the law under the Constitution if you simply went and got a warrant. In fact, there's a provision in the law that says you can get a warrant after the fact.

So there's nothing the president can't do within the scope of the 1976 law that -- where he needs additional authority. And the Democrats have said they'll give him additional authority. But we've got to obey the law under the Constitution.

The Constitution is all that stands between us and the people we're fighting against.

WALLACE: There are a couple of points here. First of all, I have had General Michael Hayden, the former head of NSA, now the head of the CIA, on this program. He says that in the NSA warrantless wiretap program, they never wiretapped, eavesdropped on a communication or a phone call unless there was probable cause to believe that it was terror-related. That's point one.

DEAN: If that's the case, why not go and get the warrant?

WALLACE: Well, all right. Here's the question. The administration's argument is that they don't need to get a warrant and that, for reasons that they won't tell us, that they can't get a warrant.

Arlen Specter...

DEAN: Which the courts now said is illegal.

WALLACE: Well, one court has said it's illegal.

DEAN: That's right, one court has said it's illegal.

WALLACE: Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has got legislation in which the White House would go to the FISA court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, that is the expert on this, the court you talk about, to review judicially, independently, whether or not this was a legal program. And the White House says it will go along with that legislation.

DEAN: Well, then we may have the makings of a deal. We'll have to -- I haven't seen the specific legislation.

Here's what the Democrats want out of this. The Constitution is set up so that not one branch has all the authority, so that if one branch has to do something to defend the United States of America, i.e. the executive branch, they have to check before they start spying on ordinary Americans. That's the whole purpose of the FISA court.

That's all we want. All we want is to make sure that we don't slide toward an imperial presidency, which is what the Nixon-Agnew problem was. And if there was...

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: ... an independent judicial review...

DEAN: That's correct. Then I'm very interested in that. I think you might get some Democratic support for that. Let's see what's in the Specter bill. I don't want to speak for Congress. I don't know what's in the bill. But that's basically what we're looking for, is judicial review.

WALLACE: Aren't you Democrats playing with political fire here?

You know, I think back to 2002 when it was the Democrats who came up with the original idea for a Department of Homeland Security and then got in a fight with the White House over the issue of collective bargaining rights, and, as a result, the Republicans were able to tar Democrats in that election -- effectively got some Democrats, like Max Cleland, out -- as being soft on terror.

If you block, or if you're seen as blocking, the NSA warrantless wiretaps or military tribunals, don't you run the risk of exactly the same thing happening in 2006?

DEAN: Well, you know, I think the Republicans have some risk here too. Bill Clinton tried to expand wiretap authority, and the Republicans all wouldn't give it to him when he was president of the United States. So there's always politics, and you always have to watch politics on both sides.

What the Democrats want here is not politics. We think the president has played too much politics.

You know, the president got rid of the CIA unit that was supposed to track down Osama bin Laden. Then in the last three weeks, he's stepped that up again.

We think there's a lot of politics in this. We think there's a lot of politics in the president's speeches -- one every day on terrorism. They think they can't win the elections unless they talk about terrorism all the time. We think we ought to talk about a new direction for the country.

So there's always the risk of politics. But in defending the United States, the best thing to do is do what you think is right. We want to get the terrorists. We think the civil war in Iraq has become a distraction to getting the terrorists. And we do want our Constitution and our laws to be upheld, because that, as I said before, that's what stands between us and the people we're fighting against.

WALLACE: Let's talk about Iraq, because I've been looking at what you have said over recent weeks, months, years about U.S. troops in Iraq, and I'm trying to figure out where you stand. Let's take a look at this.

In December 2005, you said, Bring the 80,000 National Guard and Reserve troops home immediately.

This August, you said, I think that most Democrats would agree that we ought to be out of there by the '08 elections.

This week, you said, I'm with George Aiken, the wonderful Vermont senator, who once said about Vietnam, 'Declare victory, and get out.'

At various points, you've called for getting out in 2007, getting out in 2008, getting out immediately. You can set the record straight here today on Fox News Sunday. When do you think that all U.S. troops should be out?

DEAN: Those, actually, quotes are all part of the same piece. The person who proposed getting the National Guard and Reserve troops out was actually a former Reagan defense official named Larry Korb. They have a plan to redeploy our troops, which I think is still a solid plan.

I'm sure I did say at one point we could be out by the end of '07. That was probably a year and a half ago. Clearly the times have gone by.

WALLACE: When, right now, do you think we should get all the troops out?

DEAN: The bottom line here is the Democrats think we shouldn't be in Iraq and the Republicans want to stay there forever, it seems to me, to leave this problem to the next president.

We think, as a party -- and I'm speaking for the party now -- we think we shouldn't be in Iraq, and we don't think we can withdraw our troops precipitously. I have also said...

WALLACE: So when would they all be out?

DEAN: I have said as an individual, there probably is a consensus that we could leave Iraq and be out by the end of 2008 in the party. But that doesn't encompass every single party position.

And there is a plan that is widely accepted by both moderates and liberals and conservatives in the Democratic Party that allows us to do that. And that plan was put together by a former Reagan defense official.

Look, 60 percent of the American people think we shouldn't be in Iraq. They think it was a mistake. And I am one of those people.

WALLACE: And you don't see any problem if we pull out -- you say we shouldn't be in Iraq -- so if we just pull out of Iraq over the course of the next two years?

DEAN: We have to have a phased redeployment. The first thing is, bring the National Guard and Reserve home.

The second thing is, we're not doing the job in Afghanistan. We don't have enough troops in Afghanistan. That's where the real war on terror is. That's where Osama bin Laden, five years after he killed 3,000 Americans, is still holed up. The Taliban is resurging. You know, I admire Secretary Rice, but she is wrong about what's going on in Afghanistan. Things are significantly worse in Afghanistan today because we don't have the manpower.

There is a fascinating article in The Washington Post today which says that President Bush pulled out the special ops forces who were chasing Osama bin Laden so he could put them in Iraq. That is exactly why the Democrats think Iraq is a mistake. It is hurting our attack on the war on terrorists.

WALLACE: We have about 30 seconds left. On a related subject, you piled on Karl Rove and the White House pretty good about the Valerie Plame leak case. Let's put up what you said.

You said, The president should fire him. You said, There's no question that Rove was the one that leaked the information about the CIA agent's name.

Governor, now that we've learned that Rove wasn't the one who leaked the name, that in fact the original source of the leak was Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, are you going to give Karl Rove an apology?

DEAN: Absolutely not. I still think he should be fired. Karl Rove discussed the name of a CIA agent at the time of war with a reporter. You're not supposed to do that. And President Bush said that he would fire anybody who did. He did not do that.

Look, we need a new direction in this country. We need a new direction to defend America. We need a new direction in the war on terror. We need to stop the Republican war on middle-class Americans who are having trouble sending their kids to college. We need a new direction.

That's what the election is about: Are we going to have a new direction in this country, or are we going to keep doing what we're doing? And I think the path we're going down is a big mistake.

WALLACE: Governor Dean, we're going to have to leave it there. Thank you.

DEAN: Thank you.

WALLACE: Thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us.

DEAN: My pleasure.

WALLACE: Coming up, our panel of Sunday regulars on the war on terror, both victories and defeats. Stay tuned.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: Many Americans look at these events and ask the same question: Five years after 9/11, are we safer? The answer is, yes, America is safer.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was President Bush on Thursday, defending his administration's record in the war on terror.

It's panel time now, and the gang is finally all here: Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of the Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams, also from National Public Radio.

It's good to have you all back here around our little table again.

All of us have our own thoughts about these last five years.

Brit, where are we in the war on terror?

HUME: Well, we're certainly safer. I think that's clear. I find it remarkable that there's been no further attack on the American mainland. And we know there have been some attempts, and they have been able to be thwarted, for which we should all be grateful.

Obviously this is a living thing, though, this terror movement, and it has many forms. And it's going on in many places.

And there are two ways to look at this. One is that you can sort of build up your own walls and borders and protect yourself from attack in that way. And the other theory is that you go where the terrorists are, you find them, and you fight them, and you defeat them, and you try to change the regimes that support them.

And that is where the controversy is, and that's where it is to this day. And we're in this war in Iraq, which is not popular and which the people do not seem to connect particularly with the war on terror -- is the central theater there, in a way. And that's where the political trouble is here.

LIASSON: Yes, I also think that the enemy is not very diffuse; it's all over the world. It also involves things like Iran's developing nuclear program, which could easily fall into the hands of terrorists. Same thing with North Korea.

The sentiment that was behind the 9/11 attacks I don't think has diminished around the world, whatever you want to call it, Islamofascism or political Islam. That's still out there, and I don't think that that has lessened.

Although I do think that the initial perpetrators of the attack, Al Qaida, have been certainly weakened, to a large extent. But I think that the threat is now much more diffuse, much harder to take care of.

WALLACE: Bill, let me ask you about that, because I read an article today that basically made that argument and certainly credits the fact, which I think is remarkable, that we have not been attacked again in the last five years -- who among us on 9/12/2001 would've imagined that possible?

But it makes the argument that we are losing, not winning, the war on terror: Iraq; Iran is more dangerous; North Korea's more dangerous. And the argument -- and I want to see what your reaction is -- that, for every terrorist we're killing in Iraq or Afghanistan, we're radicalizing even more people around the world.

KRISTOL: It was a global war before 9/11, you know. It wasn't just that there were a few terrorists. Where did the terrorists in Afghanistan come from? They weren't mostly Afghans. We've been fighting a global war against jihadist Islam.

I think we're winning it. But it's a tough war. And they fight back, and they recruit more terrorists. And things we do do have some negative side effect, though I still think it's, by far, a huge positive to remove Saddam Hussein. I think we're winning the war against jihadist Islam.

The biggest problem is that we're in denial that we're fighting a war. When Governor Dean says that the center of the war of terror is in Afghanistan, that's ridiculous. Afghanistan's not the center of the war on terror. It was one front of the war on terror.

It was extremely important to remove the Taliban government there, to deny the jihadists a sanctuary. But they are happy to set up sanctuaries elsewhere. They're happy to take over regimes elsewhere. They're happy to have the Iranian regime pursue nuclear weapons. So it's a global war.

And even the question that we all have to answer, Are we safer?, in a way, is the wrong question. The question is, Are we winning?, not, Are we safer?

WALLACE: And are we winning?

KRISTOL: Yes, I think we're winning. But we would win more thoroughly and more completely if we were in less denial about the fact that it's a global war; and that if Iraq's the central front, we should do everything it takes to win there, not try to do it on the cheap.

And if Iran is now, which I think it is, the center of gravity in the next stage of this global war, then we need to do everything it takes to deny that jihadist regime a nuclear weapon.

So I think we're winning, but we could do a little better.

WILLIAMS: I don't understand what you just said, because it seems to me that that's where Al Qaida was when we were attacked on 9/11, and I think the central job was to go after Al Qaida. And today, as we look back, what we see is that most Americans think that, in fact, terrorists worldwide have about the same ability to attack us as they did on 9/11.

And it's just a different type of structure. Al Qaida seems to have been weakened, although they have some resurgence lately, in Afghanistan. But what we're seeing is that there's this terrorist network all over the world, and that you have this increased U.S. military presence throughout the world.

And most Americans think that's one of the sources for generating anti-American sentiment that leads to the creation of terrorists, the recruiting of terrorists. That's not good for the U.S.

And if you ask most Americans, they say let's decrease that military presence, that you want to increase; they say let's decrease dependence on oil, which feeds some of these regimes that support terrorists around the world; let's do a better job of dealing with things like prisoners, black sites in Guantanamo Bay and like, because what that does is anger our allies and make it more difficult for our allies to work with us in this war on terror.

HUME: There's a very interesting new book out called, The Looming Tower ...

WALLACE: I'm reading that right now.

HUME: ... by Lawrence Wright, who makes, I think persuasively, the argument that after the initial conflict in Afghanistan, and after Tora Bora indeed, even though Osama and key lieutenants escaped, that Al Qaida was essentially dead, finished, washed up as a major force in the world terror movement.

And he goes on to argue that the war in Iraq has given what he would call the progeny of Al Qaida new life, but that Osama bin Laden's Al Qaida has essentially been weakened to the point of not being very important anymore.

And I think that's probably true. I think what we learn as we go here is that this is more a terror movement than it is a network, and that where you can defeat or destroy one terror operation -- to wit, bin Laden's Al Qaida in and around Afghanistan -- that others will form and emerge to take its place.

I'm struck to hear Juan and others say, as they do, that we need to be focusing all our energies on Al Qaida. Well, who's been the big troublemaker more recently? Well, you look in the Middle East; it's Hezbollah who's been tremendously important. Hezbollah is the sworn enemy of the United States, funded by Iran.

Do we then chase around the mountains of Afghanistan in an effort to catch one or two or three Al Qaida leaders now weakened, or do we go after Hezbollah?

Now, those are the kinds of questions, it seems to me, you need to ask. And simply talking endlessly about Osama bin Laden being on the loose or, as I think it's more likely, on the lam, it seems to me, goes nowhere.

WALLACE: Mara, I want to pivot to another aspect of looking -- the overview from 9/11. Back in the first days after 9/11, I think we would all agree, one of the few blessings was the way in which all of our political leaders, Republicans and Democrats, joined together.

This is the picture that I think none of us will ever forget, on the night of September 11th, when all of those bitterly divided Republicans and Democrats gathered on the front steps of the Capitol and sang, God Bless America.

Was it inevitable that this would end up becoming so political, so polarizing? Did that have to happen?

LIASSON: No, I don't think it was inevitable. That certainly is what's happened. But I don't think it was inevitable.

I think a lot of the good will was squandered, a lot of that unity was squandered. And I think an election came up, you know, which is what happened.

And there was a certain strategy, a kind of mindset -- and you could say it was a correct one -- that the best way to win elections for the Republicans was to rally its base, to not so much worry about the moderate voters in the center. There was actually thinking at the White House that that center had shrunk so much that it didn't matter; the most important thing was to get your base out.

And it turned out the Republicans were right; there were a lot more Republican voters that they could get. But if you go down that path, you want to sharpen differences as much as possible. And I think that's what happened.

I also think the Democrats -- there have been so many -- I don't know if they're centripetal or centrifugal, but the forces have been there that have forced both parties to the extremes for years and years. So you could say that some of that was inevitable. But I think it didn't have to happen.

WALLACE: All right. Let's take a break here, but let's talk about that. And coming up, this political debate that only seems to get hotter and hotter: Which party has the better plan for fighting and winning the war on terror? We'll discuss that when we come back.

COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR HARRY REID (D-NV): There's a reason, five years after 9/11, that America is not as safe as it needs to be. It's because Republicans play politics of national security but fail when it comes to the policy of national security.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That's Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, taking the political battle over the war on terror to the president and Republicans this week.

And we're back now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan.

So, Bill, let's pick up on this conversation. Did this have to become a political food fight? Or is there a way -- and you can blame it on the Republicans, blame it on the Democrats -- that we could've maintained that unity of purpose we had right after 9/11?

KRISTOL: How? We don't suspend politics in times of war; we don't suspend elections in times of war. And so, we've had debates.

And I think a lot of these debates, incidentally, have been healthy. I mean, would we prefer a situation where no one criticized the Bush administration for having gone into Iraq or for the way it's pursuing the war in Iraq? I, myself, disagree with the Democrats on about 90 percent of what they've been saying, but I wouldn't say they don't have the right to say it, and I wouldn't say that you don't want an opposition party saying some of this.

I mean, I think there have been times when especially the Democrats, in my view, have sort of not understood the unseemliness when you have soldiers fighting in the field, et cetera, to turn every event, including now the fifth anniversary of 9/11, into a partisan fight. But it happens.

HUME: You know...

KRISTOL: And, actually, there's less bitter partisanship during this war than in previous wars -- much less than during Vietnam, much less than during the Civil War. And, actually, if you look at World War II, that wasn't exactly, you know, (inaudible) misconduct in that war. There were bitter partisan elections in 1942 and even in 1944.

HUME: Well...

WILLIAMS: What I think is going on here is that you have the Republican Party, much as Mara said, using fear. I mean, they've turned Winston Churchill on his head. You know, Churchill said, We have nothing to fear but fear itself. The Republicans...

HUME: That was Roosevelt.

WALLACE: That was Roosevelt.

WILLIAMS: At the moment, Republicans are saying we have nothing but fear. And they're selling fear and they're using fear in this midterm election.

HUME: Oh, Juan.

WILLIAMS: And I think it's being done in a way that polarizes people, that drives apart.

I mean, the fact is, as you were just saying, Democrats have been largely supportive of this administration. I mean, even in this ongoing debate right now about Guantanamo Bay and how we will handle these prisoners at these tribunals, it's Republicans -- it's McCain, it's Chuck Hagel, it's Lindsey Graham -- who are having to come to the forefront because Democrats don't want to get caught in the political trap of being the opposition, even though I think they have a legitimate question to raise, as the Supreme Court has said.

HUME: I think it's worth looking at the reasons why we had that moment of national unity and what's happened since that's caused it to fade.

The moment of national unity was caused by this immediate sense we all had of a nation wounded, and so we rallied around, frightened, vulnerable, determined, wounded. That moment lasted for a while. Things began to get a little controversial about Afghanistan.

But what made all this division again, political division, and fighting and business as usual possible was the fact that we haven't been attacked again. That people look around in their daily lives and, as they come and go, they experience some inconveniences at airports and concerns elsewhere, but basically life has gone back to normal. The economy has recovered. America is much like it was before 9/11. And things feel normal.

And people don't like the war in Iraq. They have deep disagreements -- they two parties deeply disagree about their approaches to the world, about the style of war you use to fight the war on terror. So those divisions emerged.

If we were attacked again, I suspect the unity would recur. Who wants it?

WALLACE: But, Mara, I mean, we had almost -- and I agree, things have certainly changed -- almost unanimous support for the Patriot Act. We had tremendous support when the president went to Congress in October 2002 and wanted authorization to fight in Iraq. I mean, it went on for a while, it went on for more than a year.

LIASSON: Yes, it did. But things change. And I also think that politics is the method in the United States that we hash out differences. And as long as that's going to be the case, I think you're going to have these debates.

And I agree with Bill. Some of these debates are absolutely essential. I mean, what is the best strategy for fighting the war on terror? And what's the best way to solve the problems in Iraq, which are now much thornier than they were in the beginning? We're not just fighting insurgents; we're trying to keep this country from splitting apart and partitioning itself and also, if that happens, prevent the Iranians from having outside control there.

These are important questions. Now, I don't know if either party is coming up with very good solutions in this election season. But they are important questions and have to be debated.

KRISTOL: I just want to strongly object to one thing. And I'm willing to be critical of President Bush's management of the war in all kinds of ways. But it is a totally false charge that he has played the politics of fear.

Compared to previous presidents at wartime, he has been incredibly responsible. He has never said a word about the Clinton administration. He has never tried to blame past failures on them. He's been scrupulous about that. He has bent over backwards not to make this a war against Islam. He's said Islam's a religious of peace. He's tried to be very careful in not demonizing enemies.

I mean, look at Joe McCarthy. Look at Harry Truman, a man I admire. Look at his rhetoric against Tom Dewey in 1948: Fascism is coming back. Look at normal rhetoric used by presidents who were in political trouble. Bush has been, I think, very careful and very responsible.

WILLIAMS: I appreciate what he's done in terms of not trying to isolate especially Muslims here in the United States. But he is the same person who's been using recently rhetoric like Islamic fascism, which I think goes overboard.

But the second...

HUME: Juan, you concern yourself about this, what you called, fear campaign by Republicans. There is a big difference between Democrats and Republicans on this issue, it seems to me, and between conservatives and liberals. And that is, conservatives believe that we have something very serious, very dangerous to be afraid of.

And the sense one gets, despite what they may say about it, time and time again from the American left is that this whole war on terror was really an overreaction, that it should be a police and intelligence operation, that it should be a matter of justice. That's the way the Clinton administration chose to fight this.

And that the president uses 9/11 as a political -- well, 9/11 was a real thing. And what it said about the worldwide terror movement is true.

WILLIAMS: OK, Brit...

HUME: And so, if you believe that...

WILLIAMS: ... I agree with you, we are at war. I agree with you and the president; we're at war.

HUME: Right.

WILLIAMS: But in the last week, what have we seen, Brit? We've seen the start of a fall campaign season in which Republicans are in dire trouble, the president's unpopular, the war in Iraq's unpopular. What does the president do?

He doesn't start a conversation about dealing with the key issues of the day. He switches the conversation, switches the agenda to his strong point, which is the war on terror, the one point on which Americans give him some support. And he does it conveniently, tactically and purposely. He politicized 9/11 and the memory of it as we come to this five-year mark.

HUME: I'll let...

WALLACE: You have 10 seconds.

HUME: Well, the fact of the matter is that this is the issue we ought to be talking about, Juan, unmistakably.

WALLACE: Gentlemen, have to leave it there.

Thank you, panel. See you next week. To be continued.

And just ahead on this fifth anniversary of 9/11, a special power player of the week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: 9/11 -- it's a day none of us will ever forget. But the question is, what lessons do we draw from that terrible event? There's a man in Washington who's been working for years to provide one answer, and he's our power player of the week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

LAYCHAK: It's the day my brother died, right? And it brings back all those memories that I felt when he was -- when it happened.

WALLACE (voice-over): This fifth anniversary of 9/11 is personal for Jim Laychak. He's president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, and he's working almost full-time to build a site to remember his brother Dave and the 183 other people who died at the Pentagon that day.

LAYCHAK: It helps me take something tragic and turn it into a positive outcome.

WALLACE (voice-over): The brothers grew up in a military family. Dave worked as a civilian in the Army for 17 years. He took a job in the Pentagon just months before 9/11.

LAYCHAK: He was very patriotic. And this was his way of serving the country.

WALLACE (voice-over): He was working on the first floor, just yards from where American flight 77 crashed into the building.

For two days, the family, including Dave's wife Laurie, held out hope he was trapped alive in the rubble, until a brother-in-law, who was a policeman, got inside.

LAYCHAK: It was then, that Thursday morning, that he called -- he told me sister, and my sister called me, that we needed to prepare Laurie for the worst, that Dave was probably not -- not coming back. So that Thursday after it happened was probably one of the toughest days.

WALLACE (voice-over): In the weeks that followed, Laychak became involved in plans to build a memorial.

LAYCHAK: Since the fall of 2003, I probably spend about 70 to 80 percent of my time on the funds.

WALLACE (voice-over): Anheuser-Busch made the first big contribution of a million dollars. Secretary and Mrs. Rumsfeld gave more than a quarter-million.

In June, they broke ground on the site.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LAYCHAK: We owe it to our loved ones. We owe it to the men and women that are fighting overseas to keep us safe.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE (voice-over): The other day, Laychak took us outside the Pentagon, so close to where his brother died, to see a marker in the reconstructed building.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: So this stone is still charred from the accident.

LAYCHAK: Right.

WALLACE: And right across the street here...

LAYCHAK: Right, that's where the memorial will be. We're looking at about a 1.9-acre site of where the memorial will be, right now.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE (voice-over): The design is 184 benches, each with the name of a victim on it, over a small, lighted pool. It will be organized by the age of those who died, from 3 years to 71. Fifty-nine benches will face one way, representing those on the plane; 125 will face the other way for those inside the Pentagon.

The hope is to dedicate it in two years. And Jim Laychak can already see that day.

LAYCHAK: There's kids, there's families, there's old people, young people. They're laughing, they're crying. And I'm a big brother, just trying to, you know, look out for his little brother. And that's the feeling that I know I'm going to have when we get this built.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: If you want to find out more about the Pentagon memorial, check out our Web site at foxnews.com/sunday.

And that's it for today. Stay tuned to this Fox station and Fox News Channel for complete coverage of the fifth anniversary of 9/11, including the president's address to the nation Monday night.

We'll see you next Fox News Sunday. And we leave you today with some images of the day that changed America.

CBS – FACE THE NATION

SCHIEFFER: Good morning again, on this day before the fifth anniversary of 9/11. We begin with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Madam Secretary, thank you so much for coming.

RICE: Of course, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you this. After 9/11, we went to Iraq because we were told Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction and because Iraq was a place that harbored terrorists.

We've known for a long time now that Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction. And now, in this bombshell report that the Republican- controlled Senate Intelligence Committee released Friday, we find that U.S. intelligence agencies concluded long ago that there was no connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaida.

So it begs the question, was this whole thing a colossal mistake?

RICE: Well, first of all, the overthrow of Saddam Hussein is very important and better for the world. One cannot imagine a Middle East that would be different and would not be a place in which extremism thrives without Saddam Hussein's removal and the chance for a different kind of Iraq.

But at the time, Bob, the intelligence services, in fact, did not say that there was no connection between Al Qaida and Iraq. That's simply not the case.

George Tenet, then the director of Central Intelligence, testified that there were multiple contacts, going back a decade, between Osama bin Laden and Iraq.

In fact, the 9/11 Commission itself talked about contacts. What did we know?

We know that Iraq was a state sponsor of terror, of terrorism, had in fact been listed by the State Department as a state sponsor of terrorism.

We know that Zarqawi ordered the killing of an American diplomat from Iraq, that he ran a poisons network in Iraq, that the Abu Nidal organization, the terrorist organization had operated out of Iraq.

So there were clearly links between terrorism and Iraq. But more importantly, we had been at war with Iraq in 1991 because Saddam Hussein destabilized the region by invading Kuwait.

That brought us into the region, into places like Saudi Arabia, with our forces, in ways that were unprecedented. In 1998, President Clinton ordered American forces against Saddam Hussein, air power against Saddam Hussein.

For the entire period after the end of the Gulf War, the first Gulf War, our pilots were flying no-fly zones and being shot at by Saddam's forces.

The idea that somehow this was a peaceful relationship with Saddam Hussein; if we had just let him be, the world would have been fine, I just find a not very sustainable argument.

SCHIEFFER: But you know, in his book, Fiasco, Tom Ricks writes that all of what you say is true, but he says, in a sense, we had contained Saddam Hussein, that he wasn't posing, really, a threat to much of anything.

RICE: Well, perhaps people can disagree, but I do not consider Saddam Hussein, who was still firing at our aircraft, who was still threatening his neighbors, who had caused 300,000 deaths in his own country, having used weapons of mass destruction, who was breaking the embargo, the so- called oil-for-food program that had turned into an enormous scandal where the people of Iraq were being hurt but certainly not Saddam's regime.

I don't consider that contained.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me just ask you for your reaction to what the top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, Jay Rockefeller said.

He says that, despite the evidence, the administration used -- and these are the words he used-- cynical manipulation, deliberately cynical manipulation to shape American public opinion.

He went on to suggest that we might actually be better off if Saddam were still in power. Listen to what else he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JAY ROCKEFELLER (D-WV): He wasn't going to attack us. He was surrounded by people who didn't like him.

Do you think the Saudis liked Saddam Hussein?

Do you think Iran likes him?

Do you think Jordan likes him?

No. He would have been isolated there. Yes, he would have been in control of that country. But we wouldn't have depleted our resources, preventing us from prosecuting a war on terror, which is what this is all about.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SCHIEFFER: Now, that was an interview that he gave on Friday to our correspondent Sharyl Attkisson. What's your response?

RICE: Look, I have respect for Senator Rockefeller, but I just have to respectfully disagree.

I mean, the notion that, somehow, someone who had caused more than a million deaths in the Iran-Iraq war, someone who had invaded Kuwait, and we believe, was probably on his way to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, somebody who threatened his neighbors every day, who shot at our aircraft, who had broken out of an embargo and was using his oil wealth to build up an arsenal of weapons, that this is not a threat, in the world's most volatile region -- I just think it's very, frankly, odd analysis and, given the post-9/11 environment, a very dangerous analysis because what we learned with September 11 is not to let threats fester until they come back to haunt us.

Now, is it difficult going in Iraq? Absolutely.

Are the Iraqi people struggling to build a stable democracy on the ruins of an old tyrannical dictatorship in which people solve their problems by conflict and oppression, not by politics?

Of course it's difficult.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me ask you this, Madam Secretary. Have we created some kind of a terrorist haven there?

Because some would argue that there really was no terrorist threat in those days but now that there actually is.

RICE: Well, Saddam Hussein -- the State Department and the United States government had said that Iraq was a state sponsor of terror, going all the way back to the 1990s so he was a state sponsor of terror.

He had terrorists operating in his country, including Zarqawi, who had a poisons network in the country.

And I would just remind that, at the time, the director of Central Intelligence talked about these contacts between Iraq and Al Qaida. And in fact, the 9/11 Commission talked about contacts.

There is, in retrospect, an attempt to somehow paint Saddam Hussein as just sitting there calmly in the region. Yes, he was a bad guy; people didn't like him, but he wasn't much of a threat.

It's simply ahistorical, if you look at the conflict into which he dragged that region, starting in the 1980s.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me ask you, and let's shift to something else. This week, or last week, of course, the president announced that these people that were in these secret prisons were now going to be transferred to military control.

I'm told that, within the administration, you were one of those who argued that this needed to be done. I'd like to ask you, Madam Secretary, when did you learn that the CIA was operating these secret prisons?

RICE: Well, Bob, we've talked in the past. When I was in Europe, I talked about the fact that, yes, we had intelligence activities that were trying to gain essential information from detainees because the president....

SCHIEFFER: Did you know, early on, about this?

RICE: I'm not going to talk about intelligence activities.

SCHIEFFER: What do you think is the -- why did you think it was necessary to get these people out into the open and into some sort of justice system?

RICE: Well, the president gave the rationale for this in his speech, which is that, now, almost five years after September 11, when we have exploited the intelligence value -- and exploited it, by the way, in a way that I think has kept America and its allies safer. Because these people have been a font of extremely important information.

But now, many years later, we believe we've exploited that intelligence value to the degree that it's now time to bring them to justice.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me ask you this, Madam Secretary. The president said there's nobody currently in what he called this CIA program. I read that to mean these secret prisons.

Will others be put in that program or has it now been shut down?

RICE: Bob, the president is going to retain-- and I think the American people will want him to retain-- all the tools that are available to him, within our laws, to be able to get information from captured terrorists, to be sure that we can use that information to make the country more secure.

After September 11, it was very clear that the big missing link in our abilities to fight the kind of attack that took place on September 11 was information.

You can't go around like a needle in a haystack trying to find out who might attack. You need information.

SCHIEFFER: Is what you're saying here is that it's all right for a democracy to operate secret prisons, but we just got all we could get out of these people, so we took them out of the prisons?

RICE: But it is clearly an important thing for a democracy to protect itself and to use all legal means available to it, including those that live up to our treaty obligations to do that. Of course we're going to continue to run intelligence activities when they're needed. But let me just say one -- that the debate that has taken place, the McCain amendment that became the Detainee Treatment Act, the importance of the Supreme Court decision, what this shows is that in democratic societies, there's give and take, and now we're getting an institutionalization of the means to fight terror. And the president is cooperating with Congress to do that.

SCHIEFFER: Madam Secretary, thank you so much, as always.

RICE: Thank you very much.

SCHIEFFER: Hope to see you again.

And we go from the secretary of state to ground zero in New York, where Senator Chuck Schumer is standing by. Senator, thank you for joining us. Let me just ask you first...

SCHUMER: Good morning.

SCHIEFFER: ... I want to go back to the top of that interview. Do you agree with Senator Jay Rockefeller, your Democratic colleague, that perhaps we would be better off if Saddam Hussein were still there, because that would mean we wouldn't have spent these billions of dollars? Or do you come down on the side of Secretary Rice, who says no way are we better off if Saddam Hussein were still there?

SCHUMER: Well, somewhere in the middle. I do agree that we're better off without Saddam Hussein. It was a good thing to get rid of him. He was a brutal dictator. He gassed Kurds, and everything else. But the problem is that, once Saddam was gone, this administration had no plan as to what to do next.

And right now, we're in a quagmire in Iraq because it seems to be devolving into a civil war. We're policing the civil war. You never heard a plan of what was going to be put into place once Saddam left and how we were going to protect ourselves, guard the Iraqi people in the right way.

And so, that's the problem here. It's not getting rid of Saddam Hussein. It's that there was never a plan after he left.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me ask you about what Vice President Cheney said this morning because you have certainly stated some of the things that the administration disagrees with. The vice president said the debate going on in this country just validates the terrorist strategy that we have no stomach for this long fight with terrorism. And he says our doubts encourage the terrorists.

SCHUMER: Well, let me say this: Secretary Cheney represents what's wrong with this administration policy. Because we can be both strong and smart. We've seen a lot of strength from this administration, no doubt about it. But we certainly haven't seen enough smarts. And that's why the things in Iraq are getting worse.

Iraq is probably more of a danger now than it was a few years ago. We seem to be policing a civil war, where the Shiites, the Sunnis and the Kurds just hate one another. And we need smarts.

Now, we Democrats have proposed an alternative. We've proposed a year of transition, where we focus on, where we redeploy our troops and focus only on four things. Not policing a civil war, but counterterrorism, force protection, training, and logistics. It's a much better plan. We're just as strong and just as tough against terrorism as Vice President Cheney. But I think we'll be a lot smarter about it.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let's talk about here at home. You're at ground zero, where this horrible thing happened. Do you think we're safer today than we were in those days, Senator?

SCHUMER: Well, let me say this. And first, I want to mention here at ground zero, every time you peer into the hole there, you think of those who were lost. It was just such a terrible tragedy. And you know, for many, maybe it's five years away, but for those who lost loved ones, it's just like yesterday. For many of us in New York, it's just like yesterday.

Now are we safer? We have made some progress in homeland security, there's no doubt about it, but not close to enough. The homeland security department has been a mess.

And when you can say five years after ground zero, we only inspect 5 percent of the containers that come on board, when we have no detection devices to guard against nuclear weapons being smuggled into the country, or somebody bringing explosives into a railroad station or an athletics event, when our police and fire still can't talk to one another on their radios, something is wrong. And the Department of Homeland Security has been plagued, plagued by underfunding, plagued by a lack of focus, and sometimes plagued by politics. When it comes to the defense in the war on terror, in homeland security, this administration has talked the talk but they have not walked the walk.

SCHIEFFER: Well, what about this whole idea of the Department of Homeland Security? On the whole, this is a massive bureaucracy, there's no question about that. But some people say maybe we ought to rethink the whole thing. Maybe this wasn't the best idea after all. What do you think needs to be done about the Department of Homeland Security right now?

SCHUMER: I think we ought to seriously think about breaking it up, because the Department of Homeland Security is a huge bureaucracy, doesn't seem to have much focus, and it was sort of put together very quickly after the 9/11 Commission began, almost as a defensive reaction.

It hasn't worked, and we ought to look at something new.

Senator Byrd on the floor of the Senate before homeland security was put together said, let me quote a senator, he said when you don't have a real plan, reorganize. He said, that senator -- I forgot his name -- like Brutus on the floor of the Roman Senate in 40 A.D. I think he was very accurate.

SCHIEFFER: And how about this whole idea of the president now coming to the Congress and asking for some new legislation to create a system of justice whereby these 9/11 people, the worst of the worst, and I mean, I don't think there's any question about that, can be brought to some kind of justice? Is the Congress going to go along with that, Senator?

SCHUMER: Yeah, well, here's what's happening. You know, we want to give the president -- Democrats and Republicans -- every tool he needs to keep us safe. We want to give this president that tool, we want to give every president in the future that tool.

But you can do it consummate with the rule of law. The administration, again, is a little bit like a bull in a china shop. They don't obey the rule of law. Now the Supreme Court, hardly a liberal organization, has thrown out their process for detainees, and we're worse off than we were had they gone to Congress originally and we would have given them what they needed, but we would have done it consummate with the rule of law.

The good news here, Bob, is that three leaders in the Senate, all Republicans who have military experience -- Senator McCain, Senator Graham and Senator Warner -- are trying to put together just the kind of plan that I was mentioning, something that protects us but is consummate with the rule of law. And we're hopeful that they'll come to an agreement with the administration. And it is the intent of Democrats to follow their lead on this.

SCHIEFFER: Senator, thank you so much.

When we come back, we'll talk to...

SCHUMER: Thank you, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: ... the governor of New York, George Pataki. Senator, thank you, Senator.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And with us again from ground zero, the governor of New York, George Pataki. Governor, thank you.

And I want to start with something that Senator Schumer just said and see what your take is on it. He said that he thinks maybe we ought to just rethink this whole idea of the Department of Homeland Security. It's a huge bureaucracy, but he's not quite sure it works. You're a governor. What's your luck been dealing with it?

PATAKI: Well, I'll tell you, Bob, it's a vast improvement from what we were dealing with on September 10th of 2001. The Department of Homeland Security obviously is imperfect, but it's a brand new creation. It was something that came from the aftermath of these attacks. And what we have to do is make it work. We can't simply put a new name or try a new structure. We have to make the existing structures work, and I think we can do that.

We have better flow of communication. We have better coordination of assistance. And we have law enforcement working more closely together. Is it perfect? No. There's far more to do. But I think what we have to do is try to continue to move forward and make things better and not start from scratch.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let's talk about the city of New York and your state. Do you think it's safer now? Senator Schumer thinks it's probably better than it was, but he says there's still some real gaps here on inspections at the ports and so on. How do you respond to that?

PATAKI: Well, we are -- I think we are far safer. We are proactive now. And we do have law enforcement at all levels, local government, state government, federal government working together, sharing information. And that's important.

Of course, we know, we are aware now that we are in an ongoing war against those who detest freedom and have attacked us in the past and will attack us again.

And we are being aggressive overseas in going after sanctuaries and going after places where they could recruit, plan, train and carry out organization for further attacks.

So in that sense, we are far safer than we were on September 11. But there are gaps. There are gaps. There is much more we need to do.

And in particular, first of all, I think, the borders. When you're in a state of war, how can you be in a position where you have thousands of people crossing into the country illegally?

Sure, the vast majority of them want to be a part of America and the American dream, but we have to make sure that everybody coming here is coming here legally and with good intentions.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me go to something closer to New York. And that is the trains. Because millions of people ride the trains in and out of New York.

We had these bombings in London. We had the bombings in Spain. Are you comfortable with the security level on the trains coming in and out of New York?

PATAKI: You know, Bob, I don't think we'll ever be comfortable with the level of security on trains, subways, airplanes, at our ports, until this war is over. And that's going to be for some time.

We in New York are still at level orange. And what that means, on a day like tomorrow, we're going to have state troopers riding our commuter trains. We're going to have National Guard at Penn Station and Grand Central Station and other spots.

And we do that, not just on days like September 11 but on an ongoing basis. We are safer and we are more proactive by doing that. But on the other hand, I don't think there's anyone who can look you in the eye and say that a terrorist or an organized attack couldn't happen again.

It can. And we have to continue to be aggressive and vigilant to protect our people.

SCHIEFFER: Governor, you're at ground zero, a part of the world that many of us consider hallowed ground, as I'm sure you do right now.

But I have to ask you this question. Are you a little bit surprised that it has taken so long and progress down there in rebuilding that area has been so slow?

PATAKI: No, Bob, I'm really not. And you focused on part of the reason, that I believe, as you do, that this is hallowed ground. And we have to act very respectfully and prudently.

But if you look at Lower Manhattan today, there are 10,000 -- actually, it's probably 12,000 more residents than there were four or five years ago. It is the fastest-growing community in lower Manhattan.

Thirty million square feet of office space were destroyed or damaged on September 11. Twenty million of that is back. But what we are doing at the actual site is being done respectfully. And the cornerstone is going to be the memorial.

You'll see that rising behind me, but it's not going to soar to heights. It's going to, where the towers stood, have voids and reflecting pools, waterfalls dropping into those voids to express the magnitude of what we lost on September 11.

And I'm very pleased with how strong Lower Manhattan has come back. It is still the financial capital of the world. And we do have one of the finest, I believe, master site plans for the redevelopment of the actual site where the towers stood that is both respectful, that reflects back on the heroes we lost and yet will soar to new heights.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, Governor, I want to thank you very much for being with us this morning on this very special day in America. Thank you so much. And we'll be back in a minute with a final word.

PATAKI: Thank you, Bob.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: Finally today, I cannot even remember where it was, but in the months after 9/11 I was giving a lecture when a young person rose up with a question. He said, you keep talking about the brave Americans, but aren't the people who flew those airplanes into the Twin Towers heroes too? After all, they believed so deeply in their cause they were willing to give their lives for it.

I was stunned, frankly. No, I told him, those people are not heroes, nor can they ever be. They deliberately took the lives of innocent men, women and children to promote their cause. No cause, even a noble cause, is worth that.

Americans, on the other hand, did the opposite, I said. They risked their lives, some gave their lives for no reason or reward, except to save the innocent. And not just at ground zero and the Pentagon, but all over America. People went back to work. They opened their homes to those without homes. Congress passed emergency legislation unanimously. Partisan differences faded. Road rage vanished as the country came together as it had not come together since World War II.

Sadly, much of that feeling has drifted away. But I like to believe that deep down, it is still there in all of us.

We must never forget the dark day that was 9/11, but we must always remember it led to America's finest hour.

We were all heroes that day. We had to be.

That's it for us. We'll see you next week right here on Face the Nation.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Over the past five years, we have waged an unprecedented campaign against terror at home and abroad.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: 9/11, five years later. As President Bush prepares to address the nation on this solemn anniversary, we'll ask: Is the world a safer place? The U.S. secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, is our guest.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN KERRY, D-MASSACHUSETTS: We need national leadership capable of raising hopes and inspiring trust, not raising fears and demanding blind faith.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Democrats claim they can do a better job. The U.S. senator and former Democratic presidential nominee, John Kerry, joins us for an exclusive Sunday interview.

Has the war shifted the United States's focus from a more important enemy? Osama bin Laden is still at large. We'll talk with Afghanistan's ambassador to the United States, Said Jawad, and get insight from our panel: John Miller of the FBI, terrorism expert Brian Jenkins and CNN terrorism analyst Peter Bergen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

(UNKNOWN): We don't think Guantanamo Bay is a good thing.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Trials and tribulations at the U.S. Prison in Cuba. Will new interrogation rules help or hurt the war on terror? U.N. Deputy Secretary General Mark Malloch Brown speaks out about that and much more. "Late Edition's" lineup begins right now.

It's 11 a.m. in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 7 p.m. in Baghdad, 7:30 p.m. in Kabul, Afghanistan. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition." We'll get to my interview with the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, in just a moment. First, though, let's check in with CNN's Fredricka Whitfield -- She's at the CNN Center in Atlanta -- for a quick look at what's in the news right now. Hi, Fred.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. President Bush scheduled to deliver a prime-time address to the American people tomorrow night from the Oval Office to mark the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. Over the past several days, he has been trying to reassure an uneasy American public that the United States is winning the war on terror. Just a short while ago, I spoke with the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Secretary Rice, thanks very much for coming in.

CONDOLEEZZA RICE, SECRETARY OF STATE: Pleasure to be with you, Wolf.

BLITZER: On this fifth anniversary of 9/11, there's a story on the front page of The Washington Post that says that the hunt for Osama bin Laden, quoting one U.S. source, "has gone stone cold. The clandestine U.S. commandos whose job is to capture of kill Osama bin Laden have not a credible lead in more than two years. Nothing from the vast U.S. intelligence world -- no tips from informants, no snippets from electronic intercepts, no points on any satellite image -- has led them anywhere near the Al Qaida leader, according to U.S. and Pakistani officials."

Is that true?

RICE: Well, I can't speak of the specifics of that, Wolf. I can tell you that the United States and its Pakistani allies, its Afghan allies are on the hunt for him and will continue to be on the hunt for him.

But in part, it is because he is in, apparently, very remote areas. He doesn't communicate, apparently, very much. And it is not easy to track someone who is determined to hide in very remote areas.

But Al Qaida is not just Osama bin Laden. And so, despite the fact that we will continue to press for his capture, to bring him to justice, the bringing down of Al Qaida's field generals, like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Abu Zubaydah and Ramzi bin Al-Shibh -- this has been critical to the fact that we've been able to prevent attacks on the American homeland.

And of course, that's the most important issue here.

BLITZER: Do you have a sense, though -- is he in Afghanistan or Pakistan?

RICE: I think that there are multiple reports about where he might be. But there are fewer and fewer places for him to hide.

What we do know is that he does not have the kind of safe haven that he had in Afghanistan before the Taliban was overthrown.

What we do know is that the Pakistanis operate now in areas of the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan that they did not before. And so his world his gotten smaller.

I don't know precisely where he is, but I do know that we'll continue on the hunt for him. But we're also going to continue to remember that this is not about one man. This is about disabling the Al Qaida organization and its capacity to hurt us.

BLITZER: This new videotape -- old video, actually, that was released the other day on Al Jazeera, showing Osama bin Laden with some of the Al Qaida hijackers, what do you make? What's your interpretation of this video?

RICE: It's a little hard to interpret. I do know that one of the people the president mentioned, Ramzi bin Al-Shibh, was there apparently either after the fact talking about 9/11 or prior to 9/11 filling Osama bin Laden in on the details. It just shows that these lieutenants who were very important to the plotting and planning of September 11 are being brought to justice.

But I can't speak to Al Qaida's motivation for releasing a five- year-old tape at this point in time.

BLITZER: Let me read to you from the Senate intelligence committee report that came out this week, which I'm sure you've looked through. Among other things, it says this: "Postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted unsuccessfully to locate and capture Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi."

The report goes on to say: "According to debriefs of multiple detainees, including Saddam Hussein and former Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, and captured documents, Saddam did not trust Al Qaida or any other radical Islamist group and did not want to cooperate with them."

This is in stark contrast to some of your statements and presidential statements in recent weeks, months and years.

RICE: You started out with a very important modifier, postwar intelligence says. Do we have better access now to understand what Saddam Hussein may have been doing so we can question Saddam Hussein, question Tariq Aziz, question his intelligence officers? Of course. But did we have the ability to get that kind of information before he was brought down?

The fact is, nonetheless, before he was brought down, Iraq had been designated a state sponsor of terror going back into the '90s. The Abu Nidal organization operated out of there. We know that Zarqawi ran a poisons network in Iraq. We know, too, that he ordered the killing of an American diplomat from Iraq. And we know that in testimony of the director of central intelligence at the time and as a matter of fact even in the 9-11 report that contacts between Al Qaida and Iraq had been going on, going back for more than a decade. So was Iraq involved with terror? Absolutely, Iraq was involved with terror. Were they a danger to make alliances with people who wanted to hurt us? Absolutely. We are learning more about the nature of those terrorist ties now that we have access to people who we couldn't have possibly had access to before the invasion of Iraq.

BLITZER: Because specifically on the connection between Saddam Hussein and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by U.S. forces earlier in the summer, the leader of Al Qaida in Iraq, I want to play what you told Larry King on February 5, 2003, and more recently what the president himself said only last month. Listen to these two clips.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: There is no question in my mind about the Al Qaida connection. It is a connection that has unfolded, that we're learning more about as we are able to take the testimony of detainees, people who were high up in the Al Qaida organization.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Zarqawi's the best evidence of a connection to Al Qaida affiliates and Al Qaida.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: That was what the president said in 2004. I want to play more recently what he said on August 21, only a couple of weeks ago, at his news conference. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I swear it (ph), because imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein, who had the capacity to make a weapon of mass destruction, who was paying suiciders to kill innocent life, who had relations with Zarqawi.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right, now, that's the sensitive point. The Senate intelligence committee report says flatly, he had no relations with Zarqawi. In fact, he saw Zarqawi as an enemy of the Iraqi regime.

RICE: The information on which -- about what the president is talking about, of which the president is talking, is that Iraq was a state sponsor of terror. That we know. That Zarqawi operated a terrorist network in Iraq, that we know. That he ordered the killing of an American diplomat from Iraq, and indeed had money come to him in order to do that, that we know. Are we getting a more...

BLITZER: This is Zarqawi you're talking about. RICE: This is Zarqawi that we're talking about.

BLITZER: But Zarqawi and Saddam Hussein were in a battle?

RICE: I don't think -- well, first of all, let's take with a grain of salt the notion that somehow Zarqawi and Saddam were in some kind of pitched battle.

BLITZER: That's what the report concludes.

RICE: No, what the report concludes is that some have testified that Saddam Hussein did not trust Zarqawi and that he was trying to find him. As I said, we are learning more as we have access to these people.

But the fact is that Iraq was a state sponsor of terror.

And what the president is talking about and what we've all been concerned about -- were all concerned about -- was this nexus between one of the most dangerous figures in the Middle East, Saddam Hussein, who had taken that region to war twice in a very short period of time, causing more than a million lives in the Iran-Iraq war and putting 300,000 of his own people in mass graves.

That link, his love of weapons of mass destruction, someone who had actually used them against his own people -- the link between Saddam Hussein, a dangerous figure, terrorists who he clearly harbored like Abu Nidal and his animosity for the United States, and his ability to build weapons of mass destruction -- in a post-September 11th world, letting that nexus remain in the middle of the world's most volatile region was not in the U.S. interest. And the world is better off without him.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Up next, more of my interview with the secretary of state. She addresses the criticism that the Bush administration hyped bad intelligence regarding Saddam Hussein's regime and weapons of mass destruction.

Plus, U.N. Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown on the handling of terror detainees at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

And later, Democrats are taking on President Bush over national security. And Senator John Kerry is among those leading the charge.

We'll talk with the former Democratic presidential nominee. You're watching "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." Let's get to part two of my interview with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who's strongly defending the Bush administration's case for war with Iraq.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE) BLITZER: There are several other countries on the State Department list of state sponsors of terror, including Syria and Cuba and Iran, North Korea. And the United States has not gone to war to depose their leaders.

RICE: Well, but Saddam Hussein was special in this case. This is somebody against whom we went to war in 1991.

BLITZER: But wasn't he contained -- with hindsight...

RICE: No, I simply don't buy that argument.

BLITZER: ... contained in that box?

RICE: No, absolutely not. This is somebody who was, with high prices of oil -- by the way, not as high as they are now -- was continuing to build his arsenal, somebody against whom the sanctions regime had clearly broken down -- you can't read the reports of the oil-for-food scandal and think that the oil-for-food sanctions were somehow constraining Saddam Hussein -- somebody who continued to shoot at our pilots as they tried to fly no-fly zones to keep him from attacking his own people or attacking his neighbors, someone who was paying money to suicide bombers to launch attacks on Israel.

BLITZER: So let me interrupt...

RICE: This was a dangerous man, and it was time to get rid of him.

BLITZER: So looking back, with hindsight, obviously -- all of us are smarter with hindsight -- no weapons of mass destruction, absolutely no connection to the 9/11 plot from Saddam Hussein -- is that right?

RICE: Well, it depends on how you think about 9/11. I think we've all said Saddam Hussein, as far as we know, had no knowledge of, no role in the 9/11 plot itself.

But if you think that 9/11 was just about Al Qaida and the hijackers, then there's no connection to Iraq.

But if you believe, as the president does and as I believe, that the problem is this ideology of hatred that has taken root, extremist ideology that has taken root in the Middle East, and that you have to go to the source and do something about the politics of that region, it is unimaginable that you could do something about the Middle East with Saddam Hussein sitting in the center of it, threatening his neighbors, threatening our allies, tying down American forces in Saudi Arabia.

We are in much better shape to build a different kind of Middle East with Saddam Hussein gone.

BLITZER: So you have no regrets about going to war against Saddam Hussein? RICE: Oh, no, absolutely not. I think it is one of the most important historical decisions that an American president has taken in decades. And it is the right decision. Because when there are threats like that in a volatile region, you should take care of them and give yourself a chance for a better future.

BLITZER: This same Senate Intelligence Committee report says that the intelligence that you were getting -- your administration, the U.S. government -- from Ahmed Chalabi, one of the Iraqi exile leaders and his Iraqi National Congress, much of that was fabricated and phony.

RICE: Well, the same...

BLITZER: Involving the weapons of mass destruction.

RICE: Look, Wolf, the same intelligence reports that it seems to have had -- whatever fabricated evidence there was seems to have had relatively little effect on the Central Intelligence documents the president was relying on -- the National Intelligence Estimate, the work that he got from the director of Central Intelligence.

Let's remember -- and people have short memories -- there were very tough sanctions on Saddam Hussein. Why?

Because the entire world worried about his weapons of mass destruction, because he continued to lie to weapons inspectors, because he created conditions in which they had to leave in 1998.

President Clinton ordered, in 1998, strikes against Iraq, because of these...

BLITZER: But we now know -- and correct me if I'm wrong -- that he was telling the truth when he said he didn't have weapons of mass destruction.

RICE: But what we do know, also, from other reports is that he was retaining certain kinds of capabilities, that he never lost his intention to build these weapons of mass destruction. And I think this will unfold over time.

But when you ask, given what we knew at the time, was it right to take him down? Absolutely.

Given what we know now, was it right to take him down? Absolutely.

BLITZER: So you're still saying that. I want you to listen to what Senator Jay Rockefeller, the vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Democrat from West Virginia, said, in releasing the Senate report on Friday.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. JAY ROCKEFELLER (D-WV): The administration, in its zeal to promote public opinion in the United States for toppling Saddam Hussein, pursued a deceptive strategy prior to the war of using intelligence reporting that the intelligence community warned was uncorroborated, unreliable, and in critical instances, fabricated.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: Simply untrue. I have a lot of respect for Senator Rockefeller, but let's just review where we were before this war. We had in 1998 a vote by the United States Senate -- I believe unanimously -- that Saddam Hussein's regime was so dangerous that we needed to change the regime. It was called the Iraq Liberation Act.

We had, at the time of the war, a vote in which speeches were given on the floor about how the intelligence was unequivocal that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.

The entire world thought Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. And whatever information turns out to have been in error was simply in error.

The administration was going on the basis of intelligence reports from the entire intelligence community that for instance said that he had reconstituted his biological and chemical programs and, unchecked, would build a nuclear weapon again. When you have that kind of information, you have a dangerous dictator in the world's most volatile region who has gone to war twice and used weapons of mass destruction, it would indeed be shirking the responsibilities of the president not to take him out.

BLITZER: But that information about reconstituting biological, that was wrong.

RICE: Well, Wolf, again, prewar intelligence and postwar intelligence, once you're in Iraq, you can learn things that you could not possibly know before you were in Iraq. But the fact is, the intelligence committee itself, many of the people who had the same access that the administration had, believed that he had weapons of mass destruction. It was on that basis and his danger to the region and to American interests that in a post-September 11 world, it was time to take Saddam Hussein out.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Still ahead, more of my interview with the secretary of state. We'll talk about additional concerns involving Iraq and the U.S. military mission there. Is the United States heading in the right or wrong direction? But up next, a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the latest on very sensitive negotiations over Iran's nuclear program. Stay with "Late Edition."

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. We return now to my interview with the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: The Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, John Kerry, who is going to be on this program later, he made a very, very stark statement yesterday. Listen to what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN KERRY, D-MASSACHUSETTS: Be forewarned: Don't be surprised if they hype the Iranian nuclear crisis come October, if all other appeals to fear are failing as the midterm election approaches.

RICE: Well, I'm not going to try to speak to politics. But I think it's really quite remarkable when you have a statement like that when you've had the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors register severe concerns about the Iranian nuclear activity, when you've had the U.N. Security Council vote just a little over a month and a half ago that Iran must mandatorily suspend its enrichment activities, when you have the IAEA director general, Mohamed ElBaradei, saying he's not getting full cooperation from Iran.

This isn't the United States hyping a threat. This is the United States trying to build a coalition of states, all of whom know that Iranian nuclear activities are unexplained and troubling.

BLITZER: Do you have the support from Russia and China and even France for tough sanctions against Iran right now?

RICE: I think we will see that the world knows that Iran has not lived up to the promise, the promising opportunity that was given to it when the six powers got together to put forward a package of incentives. It said clearly to Iran it was possible for Iran to have civil nuclear power and civil nuclear cooperation. Iran has not taken that opportunity, and I'm quite certain, having not taken that opportunity, that the world will respond as the Security Council resolution demands.

BLITZER: With tough sanctions?

RICE: There will be, I'm quite certain, sanctions that demonstrate to Iran that it can't continue on this course.

Now, Wolf, it is true that people want to leave open the path of negotiations, that talks are continuing. But Iran also needs to understand, and I think will understand, that the world is prepared to act on the resolution that it passed just six weeks ago.

BLITZER: Most of Iran's revenue comes from the export of oil. It's a major oil exporting country.

Should the United States propose sanctions on Iraqi oil exports?

RICE: On Iranian exports?

BLITZER: Excuse me -- on Iranian oil exports?

RICE: The issue here is not Iranian oil exports.

BLITZER: Why not get them where it would be the most painful?

RICE: Because we believe that the key here is perhaps on the financial side. There are things that you can do to cut off financing to Iran's programs, to make clear to Iran that it will not be able to take advantage of the international financial system in the way that it needs to to be able to use those proceeds from oil.

Everybody jumps to the notion that oil and gas sanctions are the next best thing. We have developed, with our partners, a list of potential sanctions.

I think we will want to match those to Iranian activities and to Iranian behavior at any point in time, but that there will be an international community, an international coalition that will make it clear to Iran that it can't continue on the course that it's on. I'm quite certain of that.

BLITZER: How concerned are you about Iranian influence in Iraq right now?

The Iraqi prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, scheduled to go to Iran this week. Your ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, saying, only a few weeks ago, that Iran is fomenting a lot of the insurgency against the Iraqi government right now, and urging attacks on U.S. military forces.

RICE: I don't think there is any doubt that Iran is a negative force, particularly in the South of the country, in encouraging some of these militia activities.

But I don't see a problem with Prime Minister Maliki going to Iran. It's a neighbor of Iraq. They do have diplomatic relations. I think the Iranians -- the Iraqis will carry very strong messages that they expect Iran to behave like a good neighbor, not a neighbor that is trying to destabilize the country.

BLITZER: You're not concerned that Iran, Iran right now is effectively winning in terms of influence, influencing the shape of a future Iraq?

RICE: I have no doubts that the Iraqis, having thrown off the yoke of Saddam Hussein, do not wish to replace it with the yoke of Ayatollah Khamenei. And they are fiercely independent people. They want good relations with their neighbors, but they also want the capacity and the ability to chart their own future.

BLITZER: Is there a civil war in Iraq right now?

I say it in this context, and I'll read to you what Republican Senator Chuck Hagel, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, said on August 6th. He said, "Are we going to put our troops in the middle of a civil war? Who are they going to fight? This will be slaughter of immense proportions. The American people will not put up with it. The leadership in Congress will not put up with it. We cannot put American troops and ask them to do the things that we're asking them to do in the middle of a civil war, and that's where it's headed."

RICE: Well, there is sectarian violence, a lot of it, by the way, set off because Al Qaida in Iraq, under Zarqawi, had a plan to try to set Shia against Sunni and vice versa. And to a certain extent, some of that has taken place.

But the idea that, somehow, they've fallen into civil war because there is sectarian violence, I think, is simply not right.

The Iraqis continue to try to build a government of national unity in which Kurds and Sunni and Shia are trying to work out the political bargains that will finally allow Iraqis to use political institutions, not violence and repression, to work out their differences. They are building a national army. They've done well in building their national army. It's respected across Iraq.

I think they've had more trouble building police that are non- sectarian. And there, the change in the Ministry of Interior is believed to be having an effect. It's the minister of interior who is indeed dedicated to police...

BLITZER: Because the violence in Iraq today is as bad if not worse than it's been in the past three and a half years.

RICE: And it will take some time for this young government to get its hands around this, to get security forces. The Baghdad security plan, we believe, is having some effect. But of course, violent people can always engage in kidnappings or killings or suicide bombings.

What's harder to show is the commitment of many, many Iraqis, most Iraqis, including most Iraqi leaders, to finding a political bargain that will allow them to exist as one country. That's what they want. That's what they're working toward. And we are expressing confidence in them as they seek that future.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time. A quick question on the Israeli-Lebanese issue: The U.N. Security Council Resolution 1701 called for the unconditional release of those two Israeli soldiers that sparked the most recent war between Israel and Hezbollah; also for the disarming of Hezbollah.

That's an old resolution as well, going back to the year 2004.

Is there any progress being made on either of those fronts, the unconditional release of the soldiers and the disarming of Hezbollah?

RICE: Well, certainly on the unconditional release of the soldiers, it has to happen. And I note that Secretary-General Annan has said that he will use his good offices to try to bring that about. What has happened in Lebanon?

You have Lebanese authority, for the first time, central Lebanese authority, spread throughout the country, including the Lebanese army, into the south.

You have an international arms embargo against the rearming of organizations like Hezbollah, at the expense of the Lebanese government. You have German help for the Lebanese at their airport and an international naval force helping with patrolling the shores.

And you have a political process in which the Lebanese understand that they have obligations not to have armed militias running in the country because they want central authority to be in the hands of the Lebanese government.

Now, Wolf, it's going to take some time. Lebanon didn't get into this mess overnight. And it's not going to become a stable, fully functioning democracy overnight, either.

But they have made very big strides forward. I know that there are those who want to say that Hezbollah somehow gained from this latest round, but you know, with Nasrallah saying that, maybe if he had known that the Israelis were going to do what they did, he might not have launched this attack.

It makes you wonder, what is he hearing about how people are seeing Hezbollah? As this settles down, the winners here will be a moderate, democratic Lebanese government with enormous international support, financially, in terms of reconstruction and in terms of security.

And that will mean that the region will win. Because the kind of extremism, outside of normal Lebanese political channels, which allowed Hezbollah to attack Israel, unbeknownst to the Lebanese government and to sink the country into destruction, I think that you are beginning to see the creation of conditions in the South which will not allow that to happen.

BLITZER: On that note, we'll leave it. Madam Secretary, thanks very much.

RICE: Thank you very much. Good to be with you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And still to come, here on "Late Edition," we'll get a very different perspective from former Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry.

Also, is the world ready to impose sanctions against Iran because of its defiance over its nuclear program?

The U.N. deputy secretary-general, Mark Malloch Brown, weighs in on that, the war on terror, lots more. "Late Edition" will be back right after this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I want to be absolutely clear with our people and the world: The United States does not torture. It's against our laws, and it's against our values. I have not authorized it, and I will not authorize it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: President Bush acknowledging for the first time this past week that the United States has been holding 14 Al Qaida operatives in secret CIA prisons around the world. The men are now being held at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay in Cub.

Welcome back to "Late Edition." U.S. allies have been critical of the Bush administration's handling of terror suspects. I spoke about that and more with the United Nations deputy secretary general, Mark Malloch Brown.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Mark Malloch Brown, thanks very much for joining us from the United Nations. Lots of issues on your agenda right now. Let's go through some of the major issues. But first I want to get your quick reaction to President Bush's announcement this week, a dramatic announcement that he was shutting down those secret CIA prisons around the world, bringing those 14 Al Qaida suspects to the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

In the same announcement, though, he left open the possibility he could reopen those secret prisons if necessary down the road. What does the United Nations think about that? And you speak for the U.N.

MARK MALLOCH BROWN, DEPUTY U.N. SECRETARY-GENERAL: Well, look, I think relief that this is a step towards regularizing the justice system -- U.S. justice system as it applies to terrorists. Obviously we've repeatedly said that we're not very comfortable with Guantanamo Bay, but we also respect it's a U.S. domestic matter.

Our point really is that the U.S. would do itself a power of good in the world if it can put terrorism as much under the same justice system which, after all, is the most admired in the world, as any other crime. The domestic system, in other words.

BLITZER: When you say you are not comfortable with Guantanamo Bay, the U.S. Naval Base, the prison camp there, what do you want the U.S. to do, shut it down?

BROWN: Well, we've repeatedly said that, you know, while that's a decision for the U.S., that the fact that it is viewed as being outside the law and indeed has now been the subject of a Supreme Court finding just means that it's a sort of public relations black eye for America around the world, and compromises the issue of this being a war for freedom around the world that America is waging. It just runs against that. And I just don't think it is good for Americans politically or in public relations terms. And it's certainly not good for those there in terms of prompt, fair justice.

BLITZER: So you want the U.S. to shut down the prison there and take those prisoners, what, and move them to within the continental United States? Is that what you are saying?

BROWN: Well, yeah, look, we -- it is our colleagues on the human rights side of the U.N. who do this. We don't want to kind of take too strong a political position on this, but we've just repeatedly made it clear that we don't think Guantanamo Bay is a good thing.

BLITZER: All right. Let's talk about what is happening in Iraq right now. The United Nations understandably got a little gun-shy in Iraq after the bombing of the U.N. compound there. Shortly after the liberation, the U.S.-led invasion, Sergio de Mello, the U.N. official on the scene, was killed in that terrorist attack.

A recent Pentagon study entitled "Measuring Security and Stability in Iraq" included this: "Death squads and terrorists are locked in mutually reinforcing cycles of sectarian strife, with Sunni and Shia extremists each portraying themselves as the defenders of their respective sectarian groups. Conditions that could lead to civil war exist in Iraq."

What is the United Nations doing, if anything now, to prevent a civil war from erupting in Iraq?

BROWN: Well, while we've lowered our public profile in Iraq after the attacks on us, we have remained the second-biggest international presence there after the coalition itself, and have been very actively engaged in both the election process and the political reconciliation after the elections, and in the constitution-writing process, as well as in economic reconstruction.

But I can't disguise from you that, you know, despite the real efforts we're making, we feel pretty alarmed at the moment at the direction of things. This new government, lots of talented people in it, trying very hard, but it's not yet been able to stabilize the security situation. And there's still a sense when one visits Baghdad, as I did quite recently, that, you know, large parts of the population have still not been brought in to the political process.

So, you know, this is not an easy one.

BLITZER: Is it a civil war already?

BROWN: I don't think it is a civil war already. And I think one can get very semantic about the definition of that. But it is clearly an Iraqi-on-Iraqi conflict now, where Iraqis, even more than foreign troops, have become the principal target of the violence. And that has the potential at any time to roil out of control in a way which pits whole communities against whole communities. So it is very much an Iraq on the edge at the moment.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And just ahead, more of my interview with the deputy United Nations secretary general, Mark Malloch Brown. We'll speak about the fragile peace unfolding right now in Lebanon, and whether U.N. peacekeepers can prevent another breakout of violence between Israel and Hezbollah. "Late Edition" will be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We return now to my conversation with the United Nations deputy secretary general, Mark Malloch Brown.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Let's talk about perhaps the number one issue facing the United Nations right now, especially the Security Council, which would be Iran and its nuclear enrichment program.

U.N. Security Council Resolution 1696 said this: "Iran shall suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, including research and development, to be verified by the IAEA." That would be the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The IAEA report on Iran came out August 31st. It concluded with these words: "Iran has not addressed the long outstanding verification issues or provided the necessary transparency to remove uncertainties associated with some activities. Iran has not suspended its enrichment. The agency remains unable to confirm the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program."

Is it time, right now, for tough sanctions to be imposed against Iran to force it to stop this enrichment program?

BROWN: Well, we are clearly at a watershed moment here. Because while some elements of the Iranian response to the P-5-plus-Germany, the permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany, you know, did express a willingness to negotiate, and when Kofi Annan was, a few days ago, in Iran, that was repeated to him by the president and others.

Nevertheless, Iran has not complied with what has been a minimum condition of the Security Council resolution and of all the international negotiators, which is that its enrichment program be suspended while negotiations take place.

So clearly, we are now moving to a critical showdown moment when some kind of enforcement action has to get under way in the Security Council. And, you know, exactly where we start, I think it's a matter for the key member states. We are very much leaving this to them.

And there are, frankly, evident disagreements amongst them. Some want to start with a fairly low threshold of sanctions and build up steadily if Iran does not come into compliance.

Others, the U.S. particularly, appears to want to start with a kind of healthier, stronger dose of sanctions at the front end. And they are going to have to work that out between them.

BLITZER: All right. Let's move on, talk about the recent Israeli war with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Is there any progress on this issue of these Israeli soldiers that were abducted -- that Resolution 1701 calls for the unconditional release of the abducted Israeli soldiers -- any prospect that they are about to be released?

BROWN: Well, you will have seen that Kofi Annan, during his pretty successful trip to the region, which dealt not just with the prisoner issue but lifting the blockade of Lebanon and, most critically, getting an expanded UNIFIL force deployed, that within that, he was able to say that he has now put in place a facilitation effort to try and secure the release of those prisoners.

Now, that is under way as we talk. And we have decided that we are not going to talk about it in any detail, for fear of compromising what is a highly confidential, discreet effort that could only be weakened if it is, sort of, exposed and attracts a lot of press attention at this stage.

BLITZER: Let's talk about something that you can discuss, which is the efforts to disarm Hezbollah, as called for in 1701 as well, Kofi Annan's telling The New York Times, August 29: "It's a constant balancing act in Lebanon. When people say the Lebanese army should go and disarm Hezbollah, you are asking for civil war."

Well, what does that mean, then? How do you disarm Hezbollah?

How do you make sure that only the Lebanese army has weapons, as opposed to various militias?

BROWN: Well, look, the initial, primary intent of the resolution was to stop Hezbollah attacking Israel. And I think that goal is very much, now, in place, with this expanded, very robust UNIFIL now deploying along the border, including with a maritime element, to make sure there is not arms smuggling across the sea into Lebanon.

And that force will disarm anybody it catches trying to shoot at Israel or bring in new armaments. But the second stage, disarmament of the existing armament hidden in southern Lebanon, was always to be dealt with politically.

In other words, the Lebanese, with U.N. support, had to achieve a political agreement which included Hezbollah giving up its arms. Now, that disarmament would then be, if you like, policed and monitored by UNIFIL. But the disarmament itself would come out of a political process rather than a military one.

And that's going to require a general moving forward on the whole of 1701 to make sure that the broad conditions for a long-term political agreement between the two sides are in place.

BLITZER: A full agenda for the United Nations, indeed. Mark Malloch Brown, thanks very much for joining us. BROWN: Thank you, Wolf.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And coming up: Just two months before U.S. congressional elections, are both Republicans and Democrats here in the United States playing politics with national security, in the war on terror?

We'll speak with the Democratic senator, the former Democratic presidential nominee, John Kerry.

Also, the world's most wanted man still at large. We'll get insight from a terror panel about why Osama bin Laden continues to elude capture. Much more "Late Edition" right after this.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." Every week, we spotlight two people who have made news that you may have missed. Here are their stories.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

Mohammed Khatami: What's his story?

The former Iranian president he has been touring the United States as part of an effort to promote greater dialogue between western and Islamic states.

During his visit, Khatami said the war in Iraq has damaged America's long-term interest and warned that military action against Iran would only cause more instability in the Middle East.

He also urged U.S. Muslims to play a key role in promoting peace and security. He served as Iran's president from 1997 until 2005. He is the most senior Iranian official to visit the United States since Islamic fundamentalists seized the U.S. embassy in Tehran in 1979 and held 52 Americans hostage for 444 days.

Marion Jones: What's her story?

The Olympic sprint champion was cleared this week of alleged anti-doping violations. Reports surfaced last month that Jones tested positive for the strength-enhancing drug, EPO.

But a second test failed to confirm the initial results. Jones, who denies ever using performance-enhancing drugs, says she's eager to resume competition.

A sprinter and long jumper, Jones won five medals at the Sydney Olympic Games in 2000 and hopes to capture her second gold medal in the 100-meter relay at the 2008 Beijing Games.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And let's take a close look now at what's on the cover of this week's major news magazines here in the United States.

Newsweek features "The Boss Who Spied on her Board."

Time Magazine asks, "Does God Want You to Be Rich?"

And U.S. News and World Report has what parents need to know about MySpace, that Web site.

And a reminder that CNN's prime time coverage of the 9/11 anniversary begins tomorrow, 8 p.m. Eastern, with Paula Zahn. I'll be anchoring our coverage of the president's address to the nation at 9 p.m. Eastern.

That's followed by "Larry King Live" from ground zero, and at 10 p.m. Eastern Anderson Cooper live on the ground in Afghanistan.

BLITZER: And this is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We must not and we will not give the enemy victory in Iraq by deserting the Iraqi people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: A promise to stay the course in Iraq. But is the U.S. presence there hurting or helping the war on terror? As President Bush prepares to address the nation on the fifth anniversary of 9/11, Democrats sharpen their calls for a change of directions.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: The president pretends again and again that Iraq is the central front on the war on terror. It is not now and never has been.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Democratic Senator and former presidential nominee John Kerry is our guest.

Five years later, the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks remains at large. Why is Osama bin Laden so hard to find? And is Afghanistan falling back into the hands of the Taliban? We'll ask Afghanistan's ambassador to the United States, Said Jawad. Plus, insight from our panel, the FBI's John Miller, terrorism expert Brian Jenkins and CNN terrorism analyst Peter Bergen.

Welcome back. Just ahead, my interview with the former presidential nominee, John Kerry, but first to Fredricka Whitfield for a quick check of what's in the news now. Hi, Fred.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. Five years after the terror attacks, five years since we saw U.S. political leaders casting partisanship aside, standing shoulder to shoulder in the terror fight. This week, more sharp criticism of the president and his terror policies coming from his former rival for the White House, the Democratic senator, John Kerry of Massachusetts. Senator Kerry is joining us now from Boston. Senator, thanks for coming in.

KERRY: Glad to be with you. Thank you.

BLITZER: Here's how the president this past Thursday summed up how the state is in as far as the war on terror is concerned.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We've learned the lessons of 9/11, and we've addressed the gaps in our defenses exposed by that attack. We've gone on the offense against our enemies and transformed former adversaries into allies. We have put in place the institutions needed to win this war. Five years after September the 11th, 2001, America is safer, and America is winning the war on terror.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Two points he makes, America is safer and America is winning the war on terror. Do you agree with him?

KERRY: We are safer in small ways. We are not as safe as we ought to be after 9/11. And the fact is, there are more terrorists in the world today who want to kill Americans and the terrorists at the highest level of incidence at any time since 9/11. The president sees a different world.

BLITZER: When you say that the U.S. is safer today, I want you to listen to what the vice president, Dick Cheney, said earlier this morning on "Meet the Press" regarding this specific point.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DICK CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I don't know how you can explain five years of no attacks, five years of successful disruption of attacks, five years of defeating the efforts of Al Qaida to come back and kill more Americans. You've got to give some credence to the notion that maybe somebody did something right.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: You want to respond to the vice president?

KERRY: Well, of course, some people have done some things right, and I give them great credit. Law enforcement officials and intelligence officials, cooperating with other countries, have succeeded in interrupting some cells. We all accept that. That is the least that we should expect.

But the fact is the bottom line, they took eight years to prepare in between the first bombing of the World Trade Center, I think anybody in law enforcement would tell you that there's an element of luck involved and they're grateful we haven't been hit. But there's nobody in law enforcement who will tell you that we are as safe as we ought to be.

Law enforcement can't even talk to each other across channels in certain cities. There's a level of unpreparedness with respect to chemical plants, nuclear plants, our ports and facilities. We still can't screen cargo that goes onto airplanes. I mean, it's extraordinary how much money has been spent in Iraq versus homeland security.

So, yes, in smaller ways here and there, of course, you can get on a plane and we're safer. Are we as safe as we ought to be after 9/11? The answer is profoundly no and the 9-11 Commission has given failing grades to this administration in almost every sector.

BLITZER: But you acknowledge -- I think I heard you say the administration does deserve some credit for avoiding another major terror attack on U.S. soil over these past five years.

KERRY: Well, I think there are law enforcement officials, intelligence officials -- look, it's what I said in the very beginning. If you'll recall, Wolf, I said that the effort to fight terrorists around the world is going to be primarily law enforcement and intelligence gathering because you got to find out who they are and what they're planning in order to go get them.

And, yes, there will be military operations here and there in that effort. What the administration has mistakenly done is turned the whole thing into this military context with Iraq at the center of it.

And, unfortunately, Iraq has made the war on terror more difficult. It has made the search for terrorists more difficult. It has pushed allies away from us. It's overstretched our military. It's weakened countries in the middle east. It's lost America's moral authority.

I mean, there are a whole series of things that, in fact, Iraq has done that have reduced our ability to be able to effectively fight a war on terror, and the president and vice president keep setting up a phony straw man. They say, we can't abandon Iraq. We're not talking about abandoning Iraq. We're talking about how one is successful in Iraq, and many of us believe the only way to be successful is to reduce American forces there.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to get to Iraq in a few moments, but I want to continue on this war on terrorism. The vice president on "Meet the Press" earlier today also said something very alarming about the next potential Al Qaida or terror attack against the United States. It wouldn't just be potentially 3,000 Americans who were killed as was the case on 9/11 five years ago but could be hundreds of thousands of people. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CHENEY: The real threat is the possibility of a cell of Al Qaida in the midst of one of our own cities with a nuclear weapon or biological agent. In that case you'd be dealing, for example, if on 9/11 they'd had a nuke instead of airplanes, you'd have been looking at a casualty toll that would rival all the deaths in all the wars fought by America in 230 years.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: That's a lot of dead people. Is he accurate with that assessment?

KERRY: It has always been a threat. It has always been what has driven -- way before 9/11, way before the attack on the Cole, we have always talked in the intelligence community and in our military scenarios, threat scenarios, about the possibility of a bomb being reassembled here in the United States.

But here's the bottom line, Wolf. What have they done to secure our borders? What have they done to guarantee that containers coming into America are actually inspected and secure? I mean, if that is indeed the threat, the president is damning the administration himself by talking about it, because they haven't done the things necessary to protect America, and that's exactly what I and others are talking about.

Iraq has been an extraordinary diversion from all of these efforts, $325 billion spent in Iraq that could have been spent to put that technology in place to help us be more secure. Moreover, they took their eye off of Afghanistan, failed to capture and kill Osama bin Laden when they had him in the mountains of Tora Bora. And that's why we are more threatened today with an Al Qaida that is reconstituted itself in some 65 countries.

BLITZER: How worried are you, if you are worried, Senator, that the administration's emphasis now on the war on terror, Republican candidates saying Democrats basically are weak in fighting terrorists, that this could -- as was the case in 2002 and 2004 -- play to their political advantage come the elections in November?

KERRY: Well, that's exactly why I'm speaking out, and I think others have to speak out. They don't have an advantage. They've been incompetent. We have a Katrina foreign policy, and we have a Katrina effort with respect to the war on terror. We can do better. There is a way to make America safer.

And what I'm talking about is how you actually are successful in Iraq. We're not being successful today in Iraq. The fact is that General Casey himself has said that the large number of American forces delays the willingness of Iraqis to stand up for themselves. I think you have to get Iraqis to want democracy for themselves as much as we want it for them.

And the only way to do that is to begin to be clear about their assumption of responsibility. But nobody has talked about abandoning Iraq. What we're talking about is redeploying forces for success rather than standing still and losing in the current context.

The Senate Republican leader, the majority leader, Bill Frist, says your policy that you support, that other Democrats support is a policy of defeatism. In fact, he's got a new word he's coined for it. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. BILL FRIST (R-TN), MAJORITY LEADER: The "defeatocrats" is a pretty good name for the Democrats, I think, at this juncture. And let's see how the month plays out.

If the Democrats stay on their line of surrendering as a solution to the war on terror or cutting and running -- and, again, we'll have to wait and see; that's the way they left the message in July -- then I think that that's probably a pretty good word for them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: It's not just Senator Frist. Most of the Republicans are echoing that same offensive.

KERRY: Because they want to debate slogans, not a real policy for success for America. And they really, I think -- I mean that's its own cut-and-run policy because it's a cut and run from the truth, just as they've cut and run from the realities on the ground in Afghanistan and from the real way in which you reduce the number of terrorists.

Look, there's a simple test here: Are there more terrorists in the world today, than before 9/11, who want to kill Americans? The answer is, yes.

Are terrorist acts happening at a greater level today than they were at 9/11? The answer is yes.

This is a failed policy. And what we're offering is not fear. What they want to do is scare Americans. What we're offering is a real way to make America safe and a real policy to be successful in Iraq. It's very simple.

BLITZER: We're going to talk more about Iraq, Senator. Stand by. We have to take a quick break. We're also going to speak to Senator Kerry about his own political ambitions this year, down the road. What's going on on the campaign front?

Also, what's behind new deadly violence in Afghanistan? I'll ask that country's ambassador to the United States, Said Jawad. And we'll ask a panel of terrorism experts, where is Osama bin Laden?

And what are the new terrorism risks?

Stay with "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. We're continuing our conversation with Democratic senator and former Democratic presidential nominee, John Kerry.

Senator Kerry, as you know, Republicans are hammering you, saying you're being hypocritical in condemning what the Bush administration is doing now in Iraq, given the fact that you supported the resolution that authorized the president to go to war, including words like this.

This is what you said on the Senate floor back in October of 2002.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: I am pleased that the Bush administration has finally recognized the wisdom of shifting its approach on Iraq. And that shift has made it possible, in my judgment, for the United States Senate to move forward with greater unity, having asked and begun to answer the questions that best defend our troops and protect our national security.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: You supported the war, going into the war, and now you don't.

KERRY: Well, I supported the president doing what he said he would do. And we gave him the big stick to be able to provide for the thorough inspections in Iraq. And the president promised three major things.

He said he would do adequate planning. They said that they would go to war as a last resort. And they said that they would build a legitimate coalition and they would complete the inspections.

They didn't do any of those things. And I began to be critical of that. And if you played the rest of that speech, Wolf, it laid out very clearly those standards that I expected the president to live by.

And I said, if he doesn't, I won't support him. He didn't. And so I have been completely consistent with the criticism that I think was appropriate for a president who broke his promises about how you take a nation to war.

BLITZER: Senator Jay Rockefeller, the vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, says that the situation in the Middle East today would be better if Saddam Hussein had remained in power, as opposed to being removed, given what's happened over these past three years. What do you say?

KERRY: Well, I know what Senator Rockefeller is saying by that. I mean, look, we're all delighted that Saddam Hussein is gone. But in the larger context of our foreign policy and interests in the region, the fact is that they have made a mess of the policy in Iraq.

They didn't do the planning. They didn't put in enough troops. They didn't keep the army intact. They didn't keep a civil structure. Every mistake possible has been made. And there's been no accountability for it.

Now, I believe that Iraq is one of the great foreign policy disasters of all of American foreign policy history. They have over- extended our country. They have lost us allies.

They've taken their eye off of Osama bin Laden. They've reduced our ability to forge a legitimate coalition and other efforts to chase terrorists. They have hurt the United States's moral authority in the world, with Abu Ghraib, with Guantanamo.

I mean, this is an enormous catastrophe for American legitimate interests in foreign policy.

And the fact is that what Senator Rockefeller is saying is that, when you measure that against the boxed-in, completely held down Saddam Hussein, you've got to ask a question.

Now, look, I don't think it's worthwhile going backwards, Wolf. I think what we have to do is say, what do we do now?

How do we get our troops out of there?

How do we protect American interests?

BLITZER: Is Iraq already in a civil war?

KERRY: Yes.

BLITZER: Because I interviewed the prime minister, two weeks ago exactly today, Nouri al-Maliki, and he said this. Listen to what he told me. I'll read it to you.

"We're not in a civil war. In Iraq we'll never be in a civil war... the violence is in decrease and our security ability is increasing, and I want to assure he who loves Iraq, that is will never be in a civil war."

Is he wrong?

KERRY: By most standards by which experts look at what is a civil war, the answer is yes, he is wrong. In most civil wars in history, the average number of people killed is around 18,000. And it is violence, internally, of one group against another for one reason or another.

All those reasons are there and all that violence is there. And more deaths are there. The fact is there is a low-grade civil war going on.

Has it broken out into a full-scale, entire country engulfed?

No, it hasn't. And it is possible that it won't.

BLITZER: Are you supporting a flat timetable for U.S. troop withdrawal?

KERRY: I support it, Wolf, because I believe it is the way to pressure the Iraqis to understand the needs to coming together to assume responsibility for themselves. And every time the president says we're there for as long as it takes or the next president is going to make the decision about this, what he's doing is saying to the Iraqis who are jockeying for position and power that they have an endless amount of time within which to do that. The United States is going to be there and be their crutch.

That delays the willingness of Iraqis to stand up. General Casey, our own leading general, has said that. Moreover, Secretary Rice and others have said you can't resolve the differences of Iraq militarily. These have to be resolved diplomatically and politically.

And I don't see the kind of major diplomatic engagement, a Dayton Accords-like summit that we ought to be having, which is the only way to resolve the stakeholder differences, the differences between Shia and Sunni. That is absent, so by setting a date, you accelerate the pressure to create the diplomacy. You accelerate the pressure to be able to assume responsibility.

Finally, if you get two months away from the date and it's falling apart or there aren't enough benchmarks of success, you obviously don't want chaos and you're not locked in, but unless you get tough on the notion that the United States has got to pull out, I believe that this is endless, bottomless, and I think it's an effort without a sufficient strategy for victory.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, Senator. A little politics. You want to run for president again?

KERRY: I don't know. I haven't made up my mind yet. I think if you've run before and if you've come as close as I did, and you obviously ran for a reason in the first place, those reasons don't go away automatically. But I have to take a look at whether or not the support will be there and what I feel about it, what my family feels about it, and I'll make those judgments over the course of the next months.

BLITZER: You still have a lot of money left over from the last campaign if you want to run again, is that right?

KERRY: Well, we have some left over but it's going to take a lot more than that. You're going to have to go out and raise a lot of money if you're going to run.

BLITZER: And you would decide when?

KERRY: Well, I think somewhere after the elections. Look, my focus right now is on winning Congress, winning the House or winning the Senate, winning both. And I'm going to be campaigning very, very hard across the country for candidates in an effort to change the direction of our policy in Washington on health care, on education, on the budget deficit, on our foreign policy.

There isn't one issue where this administration, frankly, has simply either failed to do the job or avoided doing the job, and you can look to border security and immigration as the latest example.

BLITZER: And you'll be doing that in New Hampshire tomorrow, right? KERRY; I'm going up this afternoon to help some candidates there, and then I'll be traveling around the country over the course of the next weeks.

BLITZER: A key state as all of us know, looking down the road. Senator, thank...

KERRY: Yeah, but I'm going to states that have nothing to do with presidential politics also.

BLITZER: Good. Thanks, Senator. Thanks very much for coming in.

KERRY: Great to be with you.

BLITZER: All right. Up next, NATO wants more troops in Afghanistan. I'll speak with Afghanistan's ambassador to the United States, Said Jawad, and ask him why the Taliban is still such a dangerous foe and is the Taliban making a major comeback.

Up next, though, a quick check of what's in the news right now, including an earthquake that's rattled parts of the southeastern United States of all places. Stay with us. We'll be right back.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." Many in and out of the administration believe that Osama bin Laden is hiding somewhere along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

BLITZER: But why can't he be found and captured? Joining us now here in Washington is Said Jawad. He's Afghanistan's Ambassador to the United States. Mr. Ambassador, thanks for coming in.

SAID JAWAD, AFGHANISTAN'S AMBASSADOR TO U.S.: Thank you.

BLITZER: Well, what's the answer? Why can't Osama bin Laden be found?

JAWAD: I think the reason is political constraint in the region. I think there is enough military power, intelligence gathering in the region, but from the very beginning, from the days of Tora Bora, Pakistan have not allowed hot pursuit of terrorists into their territory.

BLITZER: You think he's in Pakistan, Osama bin Laden?

JAWAD: I think by having more than 30,000 international forces in Afghanistan and increasingly building the capability of Afghan intelligence forces, we are certain that he is spending most of his time in Pakistan, yes.

BLITZER: When you say most of his time, is there other places he might be spending other parts of his time?

JAWAD: He might be able to slip into Afghanistan here and there but he is mainly spending most of his time in Pakistan.

BLITZER: The Pakistanis, as you well know, from President Musharraf on down, they believe he's in Afghanistan someplace

JAWAD: If he were in Afghanistan, there's no constraint whatsoever, political, military or intelligence-wise, to go after him, to find him and to bring him to justice.

BLITZER: It's not just Osama bin Laden. It's his number two, Ayman al Zawahiri, it's Mullah Mohammed Omar, the former leader of the Taliban. Where do you think those other two guys are?

JAWAD: There's been very recent reports about the fact that Mullah Omar is in Queta, Pakistan. Zawahiri, I really don't know exactly, but he is spending a lot of time in close area with Osama bin Laden.

BLITZER: Because he makes very frequent appearances on videotape.

JAWAD: Right. And a lot of these people require connectivity to the outside world, which is not available in a cave in Afghanistan. And we also should consider the fact that a lot of the friends and associates of Osama bin Laden were found in major metropolitan centers, not necessary in caves or in the tribal areas, so the search should be expanded.

BLITZER: Here, Mr. Ambassador, is what a lot are concerned about Afghanistan right now, that the Taliban and other insurgents, for that matter, seem to be making a major comeback, and it could endanger the democratically elected government of President Hamid Karzai.

JAWAD: They are making a serious comeback. They are a serious security challenge for us right now. But the political process, the reconstruction process in Afghanistan is way advanced by now, and there is a commitment of the Afghan people, the engagement of the international community, more than 60 countries, that will ensure that we, Afghanistan, will never go back to the days where, when it was a danger for itself, for the region, and for global security.

BLITZER: Here's what The Washington Post wrote on Wednesday: "More than 1,500 people have been killed in combat and terrorist attacks this year as violence in Afghanistan swelled to its highest level since 2001, when U.S.-led forces drove the Taliban from power. Suicide bombings, once unheard of, are now almost daily occurrences. Schools have been burned across the region, and dozens of community leaders have been assassinated," including a major political figure today killed in Afghanistan.

JAWAD: Right.

BLITZER: Anything you can dispute The Washington Post with that assessment on? JAWAD: No. This is true. And this is -- there are two reason for this increased terrorist activity in the south of Afghanistan. The first reason is that in the past five years in most of these area, there were never a strong permanent presence of either the international forces or the Afghan security forces. We lacked the resources to be present there. The international community conducted sweeping operations and then retreated back to their military installation. That's one reason. And then the other reason is that the basis of the support outside the border is still operating.

BLITZER: The U.S. NATO -- the U.S. general who is the NATO supreme allied commander, General James Jones, he said this on Thursday. He said, "Let me simply say that what's going on in Afghanistan is, while not a complete surprise, certainly the tenacity of the resistance is a bit of a surprise. A certain amount of it in the southern region has turned out to be more than we expected."

He wants reinforcements. He says NATO does not have enough troops inside Afghanistan right now.

JAWAD: He is right. I think it's a matter of increasing by small numbers. What he is asking is a limited reinforcement, but more importantly, build up capability for these forces to have mobility to move around, and to establish in small group permanent prisons in difficult areas of Afghanistan, because it's important to conduct the sweep operation but we have to be able to hold them after the terrorists are gone. Otherwise, they will just go to the next province, or they go to the neighboring country and come back.

BLITZER: They used to say of President Hamid Karzai that instead of being the president of Afghanistan, he is really the mayor of Kabul, which is the capital city, because his authority outside of Kabul is limited. Do you dispute that?

JAWAD: He has been elected by the vote of Afghanistan. Eighty- six percent of eligible voters participated, and he is the man who symbolized the future of Afghanistan. Yet the ability of the Afghan government, which is symbolized by President Karzai, to deliver services, to be present in every corner of Afghanistan, is limited due to lack of resources.

So if, for instance, if the capacity of the Afghan national police force is built further, there will be less need for foreign soldiers. And our prisons will be permanent in many districts and areas which is prone to terrorist activities.

BLITZER: I want to get to the other sense -- very sensitive issue in Afghanistan, because it's becoming the world's major exporter of opium and heroin. I'll read to you what the executive director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime said September 2nd: "The news is very bad. On the opium front today in some of the provinces of Afghanistan, we face a state of emergency. In the southern provinces, the situation is out of control. This year's harvest will be around 6,100 metric tons of opium, a staggering 92 percent of total world supply." When Americans hear that in Afghanistan, close ally of the United States, that more than 90 percent of the world's opium supply is coming from your country, what do you say?

JAWAD: Well, it is a global threat. It's a serious threat for Afghanistan security and for the regional stability. The proceeds of narcotics feed into terrorism, but yet as I mentioned, it's a global threat that requires international cooperation.

We have been successful in some areas in certain provinces of Afghanistan, but overall we have to look back and see if the approaches we have taken in cooperation with the international community has been successful or not and adopt the mullahs that have been successful to other areas. Specifically cultivating narcotics, as mentioned in the report, is mostly in the south, areas where they are facing security challenges. And where we face security challenges, there's no development, and people fear -- there's no alternative for a lot of these farmers and in the narco traffickers, the terrorists are actively pushing the farmers to grow more poppy.

BLITZER: And make a lot of money on it because --and it becomes a source of, that money becomes a source for weapons and other sorts of attacks, potential attacks against your government, NATO troops, U.S. troops. We have to leave it there, Mr. Ambassador. You got a full plate on your agenda. Good luck to you.

JAWAD: You thank you very much.

BLITZER: Ambassador from Afghanistan, Said Jawad, thanks very much.

And coming up, five years after the 9/11 terror attacks, are we safer? We'll get insight on where things stand in the hunt for Osama bin Laden and more from a panel of terrorism experts. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." Joining us now to talk about what we've learned since the 9/11 attacks five years ago and what worries these experts more over the past five years and looking down the road are three guests.

John Miller is the FBI assistant director for Public Affairs. Brian Jenkins is a terrorism expert with the Rand Corporation. He's the author of an important new book, entitled "Unconquerable Nation: Knowing our Enemy, Strengthening Ourselves." And in Kabul, Afghanistan, our CNN terrorism analyst, Peter Bergen. He's the author of "The Osama bin Laden I know."

Gentlemen, thanks to all of you for coming in. Two of you have actually met with Osama bin Laden, Peter Bergen in Kabul, John Miller when you worked with ABC News. You met with Osama bin Laden.

Why is he so hard, John, to find? JOHN MILLER, FBI ASSISTANT DIRECTOR FOR PUBLIC AFFAIRS: I think it's the terrain and the challenges over there. If you stack it up against Eric Robert Rudolph, here was an American who was the Olympic Park bomber, who ran away into the Nantahala National Forest in North Carolina.

Using military assets, police, all the technology we have, we searched for him for a couple of years and managed not to find him until a police officer came across him.

Now, you put that against the overlay of the Afghan-Pakistani border area, tribal areas, where even the governments on both sides of that border have struggled to have any influence for generations, and it's a real challenge.

And once you've been there -- and I've been on that border; I've been at the checkpoints -- and you look at the enormity of it, then it starts to make sense. It's easier said than done.

BLITZER: Peter, you have an important article in today's Washington Post, in which you suggest that one of the problems may be a half-hearted effort on the part of the Pakistani government to try to find Osama bin Laden.

PETER BERGEN, CNN TERRORISM ANALYST: Well, there's no doubt, you know, in terms of the senior Taliban leadership, not a single one of them have been arrested since 2001.

And it is the universal view of the U.S. military that most of that senior leadership is in Pakistan.

And then, you know, in terms of Al Qaida, yes, there's been a very good effort by the Pakistanis to arrest senior leadership of Al Qaida, but I think, when you look at bin Laden's favorability ratings in Pakistan, scoring 65 percent in a poll taken in 2004, I can't think of a Pakistani political figure with higher favorability ratings.

And so, for any Pakistani government -- I'm not singling the Musharraf government out here -- I'm just saying it would be a tough one to go after bin Laden, who, after all is a very popular guy.

I think it would be political dynamite for the Pakistanis to be really involved in a snatch operation on bin Laden.

BLITZER: Brian Jenkins, I've known you for many years. You deal with the nuts and bolts of counterterrorism, fighting terrorists.

How much of a difference would it make, practically, if the U.S. captured or killed Osama bin Laden?

BRIAN JENKINS, RAND CORPORATION: I think, Wolf, it would make less of a difference now than it perhaps would have five years ago.

Certainly, he has helped formulate this jihadist ideology, which has, since 9/11, really transcended the original organization of Al Qaida and become a source of inspiration that persuades young men to turn themselves into terrorist weapons. And he has continued to communicate over this five-year period.

But this is a phenomenon, now, which has gone beyond bin Laden. They would lose one effective communicator. It would not end the radicalization process that is continuing worldwide.

BLITZER: You agree, John?

MILLER: I do. I think it would be a very important symbolic victory, but if you go over the six terrorist plots that have been designated against U.S. targets over, not the five years since 9/11, over the last 12 months, that the FBI has had a major hand in disrupting each one of them, there are only a couple of them out of that six that have any discernible involvement by main Al Qaida.

It has been much more, as Brian suggests, the Al Qaida acolytes out there who are hearing the call on those videos from Zawahiri, from bin Laden, from Azzam and others, and rising up to that call, that are following those sites on the Internet that not only tell them what Al Qaida would like or expect from them but then link them to the manuals and the training to do it.

In some ways, the Internet has become the new Afghanistan.

BLITZER: We did see, Peter Bergen, a new videotape that was released in recent days, showing Osama bin Laden five years ago, meeting with some of the hijackers, presumably in Afghanistan, in some of that rugged terrain, that video coming out.

Tomorrow is the fifth anniversary. How nervous should Americans be, and others around the world, Peter, who might be watching this program, that there could be some terror plot that could unfold on this fifth anniversary?

BERGEN: Certainly, Al Qaida wants to mark the fifth anniversary. But in my view, and I'd be interested in John's view, the averted airliner plot in London, the attempt to bring down multiple American passenger jets with liquid explosives, which I believe has some Al Qaida component, may have been the one big shot deal they wanted to do.

And I don't think, if there is a Plan B, it may be a bit like Zacarias Moussaoui, the not very effective, so-called 20th hijacker or Richard Reid, the not very effective so-called shoe bomber.

Certainly, they will want to mark the date. As you pointed out they, released this historical videotape. And I think that rather begs the question, you know, where is the contemporaneous videotape or audiotape from Osama bin Laden or Ayman al-Zawahiri?

Are they lost in the pipeline between the tribal areas in Pakistan and al-Jazeera? Are they on the way?

It would be very, very weird, in my view, Wolf, if we didn't hear from either or both of them in the next few days. Because this is something they want to remind Americans and their followers about the dreadful attacks on 9/11. BLITZER: We're going to pick that thought, up precisely. We'll take a quick break. We'll get the views of our other panelists about tomorrow.

Should the world be worried that Al Qaida could take action on this fifth anniversary?

Much more of our "Late Edition" right after this.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're continuing our conversation with our terrorism panel.

CNN analyst Peter Bergen is in Afghanistan. He's in Kabul. Here in Washington, the assistant director of the FBI for Public Affair, John Miller and Brian Jenkins, the terrorism expert with the Rand Corporation.

Brian, how worried should Americans be tomorrow?

JENKINS: You know, certainly there's a possibility of something taking place on the anniversary. Someone may try something.

But the fact is, our operative presumption has to always be, every day, that there could be a terrorist plot.

We've seen more than 30 large-scale terrorist attacks, across the planet, since 9/11. A lot more plots have been discovered and thwarted. They are continuing to come out of the chutes and try to launch some sort of an attack every few weeks.

So it's not just one day. It's a matter of the day before that day and the day after. Their operational code is lie in wait; attack when we are inattentive, keep operations going.

BLITZER: John, you work for the FBI. Is the FBI taking special precautions tomorrow?

MILLER: Well, I think as Brian said, we're almost on that level of alert all the time. In the past 12 months, not five years but in the past year alone, we've seen five active terrorist plots on U.S. soil that between the joint terrorism task forces that we tripled and the number of analysts that we've doubled since 9/11, we've been able to thwart.

That's a high level of operational tempo largely by homegrown entities here inspired by Al Qaida as opposed to run by Al Qaida. We have seen in a couple of plots some connectivity, or the appearance of connectivity to Al Qaida, we're still looking at.

But I would say based on that we will be looking out sharply tomorrow. There will be command posts operating. There will be people in joint terrorist task forces paying close attention to that, because as Peter pointed out, we have seen Al Qaida mark anniversaries largely through propaganda with a new message, a new video. I agree we can probably expect one more of those tomorrow. But as far as attacks, I think they had put a lot of their resources and their bets on that airplanes plot coming from London to the United States, but we'll be on alert anyway.

BLITZER: Would you be comfortable, John, getting on a plane tomorrow and flying to New York or Washington?

MILLER: Extremely. And the reason I say that is, that was a plot that uncovered that really ratcheted up security on a plane. And I think that air travel is -- has become an awful lot safer because of those enhancements, and on symbolic dates will probably be even safer.

BLITZER: You agree, Brian?

JENKINS: I do. We have...

BLITZER: Are you going to fly tomorrow?

JENKINS: Actually, I'm going to be here in Washington. I'm flying out very, very early on a dawn flight Tuesday morning.

BLITZER: But it's nothing to do because you're afraid to fly on 9/11.

JENKINS: Absolutely not. I get on airplanes all the time. And also, Americans have to make a distinction between those measures that we take in order to prevent a large-scale attack on the country because of the devastating consequences, casualties, economic impacts, psychological impact and the danger to the individual American. The individual American usually is at far greater danger driving his automobile or her automobile on a weekend or going to work than getting on an airplane and flying somewhere.

MILLER: Especially in L.A.

JENKINS: Especially in L.A.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time. Peter, I want to pick your brain on this very worrying comment the new Al Qaida leader in Iraq, Abu Ayyub Al-Masri made this statement on Thursday. He said to his followers: "I invite you not to drop your weapons, and don't let your souls or your enemies rest until each one of you kills at least one American within a period that does not exceed 15 days, with a sniper's gunshot or incendiary devices or Molotov cocktail or a suicide car bomb -- whatever the battle may require."

Quickly, how serious is this threat?

BERGEN: Well, I mean, I think this sort of may be in the area of hyperventilation. I mean, we've had a lot of statements from Al Qaida saying as a for instance, the United States is owed 4 million deaths in some kind of nuclear catastrophe. So, you know, I don't take that threat particularly seriously, particularly because in Iraq, the U.S. military is in a much more sort of withdrawn to the bases kind of mode than it was a couple of years back. And I mean even if they want to do these things it's a much tougher target. The U.S. military deaths have been falling over the last years, relatively speaking, because of this different posture. I mean, yes, military is not out there on the streets in the same way that it was and, therefore, presents a much harder target for Al Qaida in Iraq to attack.

BLITZER: Peter Bergen, thanks very much. John Miller and Brian Jenkins, thanks to both of you as well. Let's hope tomorrow passes quietly and that all the future days pass quietly.

Up next, in case you missed it, what was said about the war on terror on this fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks on the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States. And coming up at the top of the hour, "This Week at War" takes you inside Iraq, Afghanistan, London, evaluates the war on terror five years after 9/11. John Roberts and "This Week at War" comes up right at the top of the hour.

BLITZER: CNN Pipeline will be broadcasting all of CNN's coverage of 9/11 five years ago. It starts tomorrow morning 8:30 a.m. Eastern. Check it out. You want to know what happened exactly five years ago, CNN Pipeline.

And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States, all of them assessments on the war on terror five years after the 9/11 attacks.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: It's changing and evolving to some extent. We've done enormous damage to Al Qaida, to the leadership of Al Qaida. We've captured and killed hundreds of their senior people. But by the same token, you've got one of the organizations, Al Qaida organizations out there now that have only a remote connection to the center. It is changing and evolving. On the other hand, I think we've also made to say I think we've made significant progress.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR CHARLES SCHUMER, D-NEW YORK: The homeland security department has been a mess, and when you can say five years after ground zero we only inspect 5 percent of the containers that come on board, when we have no detection devices to guard against nuclear weapons being smuggled into the country or somebody bringing explosives into a railroad station or an athletic event, when our police and fire still can't talk to one another on their radios, something is wrong.

(END VIDEO CLIP) (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

THOMAS KEAN, CHAIRMAN, 9-11 COMMISSION: Where we are right now is in a very difficult place. There's no question the war in Iraq is radicalizing, even increasing people in that area. If it becomes as it seems to becoming a civil war, that civil war could spread outside the boundaries of Iraq to other areas. It's a very dangerous situation. In that kind of a situation, in that area, that's where terror likes to breed.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HOWARD DEAN, CHAIRMAN, DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE: We're not doing the job in Afghanistan. We don't have enough troops in Afghanistan. That's where the real war on terror is. That's where Osama bin Laden, five years after he killed 3,000 Americans, is till holed up.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: That's your "Late Edition" for this Sunday, September 10th. Please be sure to join us next Sunday and every Sunday at 11 a.m. Eastern for the last word in Sunday talk. We're on for two hours every Sunday 11 to 1 p.m. Eastern.

I'm also in "The Situation Room" Monday through Friday 4 to 6 p.m. and for another hour at 7 p.m. Eastern. Don't forget, tomorrow night our live coverage of President Bush's address to the nation from the Oval Office. I'll be anchoring our coverage starting at 9 p.m. Eastern. Tomorrow night, the president addresses the nation from the Oval Office on this, the fifth anniversary of 9/11.

Until then, thanks very much for joining us. I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. For our North American viewers, "This Week at War" with John Roberts just ahead, right after a check of what's in the news right now.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, September 12, 2006 7:50 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, September 12, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060912.pdf; dojclips060912.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Cheney, Rumsfeld Call For Perseverance At Pentagon Ceremony (AFP) 5
Cheney Defends Homeland Security Policy (AP) 6
President Bush's Reality (NYT) 7
Democrats Answer Cheney (WP) 7
N.J. Prosecutors Defend Effort To Get Phone Company Records Against Federal Lawsuit (AP) 8
Where's The Outrage? (USAT) 9
Al-Qaida Lieutenant Warns Of New Attacks (AP) 10
Al Qaeda Threatens More Terror Attacks (WT/AP) 11
Bin Laden's Deputy Warns Of Attacks In The Middle East (NYT) 12
Al-Qaeda Calls On Muslims To Fight In Lebanon, Israel (WP) 13
Republican Pushes Hardline Tribunal Bill (AP-Y) 14
White House Gains Concessions In Senate Measure On Tribunals (WP) 15
Graham Thinks Terror Trial Bill Fatally Flawed (TSSC) 16
U.S. Appeals Ruling On American Held In Iraq (NYT/AP) 18

Patriot Act:

Patriot Act Gag Orders Lifted (NBH) 18

Homeland Response:

Bush: Set Aside Differences On Terrorism (AP) 19
Bush: 'The War Is Not Over' (LAT) 21
In Prime-Time Address, Bush Says Safety Of U.S. Hinges On Iraq (NYT) 23
Bush: Vigilance Is Key In War On Terrorism (USAT) 24
Bush Says Iraq Victory Is Vital (WP) 25
'A Struggle For Civilization' (WT) 27
Bush Speaks To A Changed Nation, Where Unity And Clarity Have Evaporated (NYT) 28
President Tries To Win Over A War-Weary Nation (WP) 29
Osama's Spin Lessons (NYT) 31
Bin Laden's Victory (WP) 32
In Unpredictable District, Some Say Bush Is Politicizing Terrorism (NYT) 33
Nation Pays Tribute To Heroes (USAT) 34
Survivors At Three Gatherings Talk Of Heroism, Loss And Love (USAT) 35
America Marks A Grim Anniversary (WP) 36
Memories, Grief Endure Across Region (WP) 39
Marine Felt Calling After 9/11 Attacks (WP) 42
U.S. Observes 5-year Anniversary Of 9-11 (AP) 43
Anniversary Brings Back Memories Of Attacks (MCT) 45
Nation Marks Lives Lost And Hopeful Signs Of Healing (NYT) 46
In Pa., Mourners Remember Flight 93 (AP-Y) 49
Looking Back On A Tragedy With Energy And Respect (NYT) 50
Family Of Fallen 9/11 Rescuer Fights DOJ (HILL) 51
'Zero' Sums Up Our Paranoid Moment (USAT) 52
The Liberals' War (WSJ) 52
A War Of Words (WP) 54
Law Firms See An Array Of Fates After Sept. 11 (LAW) 55
FBI Has Two Squads In Minnesota Focused On International Terrorism (MINNST) 56
Local FBI Chief: U-S Response To Terror Has Been Successful (STPPP) 57
World Remembers 9-11 But Many Not Crying (AP-Y) 57
The Apocalypse Will Be Blogged (NYT) 59
Rice Thanks Canadians For Post-9/11 Help (AP-Y) 61
House In 9-11 Standoff (HILL) 62
Parties Bicker Over 9/11 Bill (RC) 63
A Solemn, Sad Moment To Reflect, But Politics Also Surfaces (NYT) 64
Lawmakers Unite Once Again Over 9/11 (WT) 65
Whereas Congress Cannot Set Aside Politics . . . (WP) 66

With 9/11 Film, Kean Finds Tough Critic In Hamilton (WP) ... 67
The Fictional Path To 9/11 (NYT) ... 68
Serious Gaps Seen In Airline Security Since 9/11 Attacks (WT) ... 69
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 70
Lawmakers Back Ban On Liquids On Airliners (USAT) ... 71
Funding, Amendments Pose Ports Bill Obstacles (RC) ... 72
Port Security Bill Set To Clear Senate (LAT) ... 73
Safe Ports (WP) ... 74
Jack Bauer Insurance (WSJ) ... 75
The Aftermath Of Hurricane Katrina (HILL) ... 75

War News:

Grim Outlook Seen In West Iraq Without More Troops And Aid (NYT) ... 77
Pentagon Weighing Report On Anbar (WP) ... 78
Sadr Holds Out Against Plan To Divide Iraq (WP) ... 79
Top Aide To Sadr Outlines Vision Of A U.S.-Free Iraq (WP) .. 80
Iraqi Militias Seen As Spinning Out Of Control (LAT) ... 82
Iraqi Elections Believed To Have Worsened Divisions, Report Says (MCT) ... 84
Reinforce Baghdad (WP) ... 85
Even Dating Is Perilous In Polarized Baghdad (WP) ... 86
Saddam Accuses Kurds Of Sowing Hatred (AP) ... 88
Saddam Says Genocide Trial 'Dividing Iraq' (AFP) ... 89
Hussein Trial Resumes; Sectarian Attacks Continue In Streets (NYT) ... 90
Bomber Attacks Afghan Governor's Funeral (NYT) ... 91
Blast Hits Funeral Of Slain Afghan Governor (WP) ... 92

DOJ:

Justice Department Lawyers Lose Appeal On Overtime Pay (WP) ... 93

Corporate Scandals:

Tension At The Top (WP) ... 94
H-P's Leak Probe Comes Under Wider Scrutiny (WSJ) ... 96
House Panel And U.S. Attorney Join H.P. Inquiry (NYT) ... 97
Feds Scrutinize HP Probe Of Leaks (USAT) ... 99
Federal Prosecutors Ask For Info On HP Probe; Board Ponders Dunn's Fate (LAW/AP) ... 99
Hewlett-Packard Says Justice Department Joins Probe (Update4) (BLOOM) ... 101
Privacy Piracy (USAT) ... 102
Dell Delays Briefing, Filing Profit Report As Woes Mount (USAT) ... 102
Expanding Investigations Increase The Heat On Dell (WSJ) 103
Dell's Quarterly Report Is Delayed As Probe Widens (BLOOM) ... 105
Dell Delays Quarterly Report Due To Accounting Probe (FINDLAW/AP) ... 105
Justice Said To Drop Criminal Investigation Of Freddie Mac (WP) ... 106
Editorial: White-collar Blues (FT) ... 107
Grasso Seeks New Judge For Trial (WSJ) ... 108
Garden State Business Briefs (NSL) ... 108
SEC Charges 2 More Ex-ITXC Execs (HC) ... 109
Capitol's New Bank Examiners (WSJ) ... 110

Criminal Law:

Probe Of Veco, Lawmakers Led By Justice Dept. (ADN) ... 111
Moses Got Campaign Cash From VECO Before Casting Deciding Vote (AP) ... 112
Leading Developer Portrayed As 'Thief' Or 'Visionary' (WP) .. 114
Gotti's Got Write Stuff (NYDN) ... 115
Ex-Schrenko Aides Get 8 Years Each Former State Schools Chief Reports To Federal Prison (AJC) ... 116
Georgia's Ex-top Educator Reports To Prison; Aides Sentenced (AP) ... 116
Prosecutors Say Trash Pickup Favors Behind Alleged State Payroll Scam (BVND) ... 117
2 Cuban Activists Plead Guilty To Weapons Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP) ... 118
Florida: Cuban Exiles Avoid Trial With Plea (NYT) ... 119
Two Anti-Castro Activists Plead Guilty To Weapons Conspiracy (MH) ... 119
2 Cuban Exiles Accept Plea Deal (FLSUNSEN) ... 120
Magistrate Rules In Cuban Militant's Favor In Bid To Leave Jail (AP) ... 120
8th Circuit Grapples With Sentencing Guidelines (LAW) ... 121
Woman Missing From Carnival Cruise Ship (MH) ... 122
Ohio Woman Missing From Cruise Ship (WP/AP) ... 122
Loaded Gun Found In D.C. Court Cellblock (LAW/AP) ... 123
California Opens Inquiry On Breaches Of Computers (NYT) 123
17 Charges Filed In Rape Case Linked To Phoenix Killings (WP/AP) ... 124

Civil Law:

Government Joining Case Against Drug Maker Over Pricing Allegations (AP) ... 125
Dey Denies Allegations On Drug Pricing (UPI/UPI) ... 125
N.J. Gets $500K Settlement From GlaxoSmithKline (AP) ... 125
Big Tobacco's Promises To Reform Go Up In Smoke (USAT) ... 126

DOJ_NMG_0061490

Nicotine Study Faulty (USAT) 127

Civil Rights:

EEOC Seeks Key Testimony In Sidley Austin Age Discrimination Suit (LAW) 127
Journalist Remains In Contempt Of Court (FINDLAW/AP) 128
Court Panel Denies Blogger's Appeal (NYT) 129
After Steps To Desegregate, Plaintiffs Drop Tennessee Suit (NYT) 129
Segregated Schools: New Debate, Old Problem (USAT) 130
Parties Battle Over New Voter ID Laws (LAT) 131
New Help For Overseas Voters (WP) 134

Antitrust:

Board Members At Bristol-Myers Told To Fire CEO (WSJ) . 135
Dismissal Recommended For Bristol Chief (NYT) 137
Bristol Board Urged To Fire CEO, Company Lawyer (MRKTWTCH) 139
Commission Takes Over Germany's Intel Probe (FT) 139
EU Takes Over German Antitrust Inquiry Into Intel (CNET) .. 140
EU To Investigate AMD Complaint Against Intel (WSJ) 140
How Hartmut Pilch, Avid Computer Geek, Bested Microsoft (WSJ) 141
Hot Seat To Protect Its Box-Office Turf, Ticketmaster Plays Rivals' Tune (WSJ) 142

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Was Manure-to-Power Venture Just Bull? (LAT) 144
Tribes Opposed To Michigan Federal Court Nominee (AP) 148

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mob Figure Sentenced In Racketeering Case (LAT) 148
Cocaine Ring Busted, Feds Say (NOTP) 149
Wests Enter Guilty Pleas, Face Years In Prison (KNOXNS) . 150
Pot Growers Sentenced To Federal Prison (AP) 151
2 Ex-Teammates Of Cycling Star Admit Drug Use (NYT) 151
Weapons Come From Many Sources (MHCA) 154

Immigration:

GOP Fails On Welfare Reform (HILL) 156
Keep The Immigration Debate Civil (LAT) 157
Arizona Primary Will Test GOP Immigration Strategy (HILL) 158

Tax:

Glaxo To Settle Tax Dispute With IRS Over U.S. Unit For $3.4 Billion (WSJ) 158
Internal Revenue Service, Glaxo Settle Biggest Tax Dispute In History (FINDLAW/AP) 160
Former Tyco Tax Officer Is Charged With Filing A False IRS Return (WSJ) 161

Congress-Administration:

GOP, Dems Take Contrasting Approaches To Ethics Reform (USAT) 161
Navy Officials Tried To Fire Chaplain Prior To Charges (WT) 162
Digging Us Out Of The Deficit With Holey Math (WP) 162
The Milberg Effect (WSJ) 163

Other News:

Economists' Inflation Estimates Up (USAT) 164
NABE Economists Expect Slowdown But No Recession (WSJ) 165
Trade Picture Brightens (WSJ) 166
Rising Inventory Of Unsold Homes Is Likely To Put Pressure On Prices (WSJ) 166
Dow Ekes Out Gain After Early Slide As Oil, Gold Retreat From Lofty Heights (WSJ) 167
Average Gas Price Falls 11 Cents A Gallon In A Week (USAT) 168
OPEC Sets Stage To Cut Output Should Oil Prices Keep Falling (WSJ) 168
OPEC Leaves Oil Output Quotas In Place As Price Keeps Falling (WP) 169
Opec Move Sparks Slide In Oil Price (FT) 171
'Blogosphere' Spurs Government Oversight (USAT) 171
Plans To Honor L.A. Muslim Leader Bring Out Animosity (LAT) 173
Mehlman: GOP Will Hold (RC) 174
House GOP Going For Broke To Hold Seats (USAT) 176
Anti-Incumbent Sentiment (AP) 177
Vermont Races Could Shape House's Future (LAT) 178
Among Governor Races, Iowa Lead Shifts Again (WSJ) 180
La.'s Jefferson Fights To Stay In Office (USAT) 185
Louisiana Players Aid Jefferson Foe (RC) 186
RI Senator Targeted In Tuesday Primary (AP-Y) 188
GOP Leaders Throw Weight Behind Chafee (FT) 189
Laffey Decries Party, Beltway In His 'outsider' Campaign (HILL) 190
Political Moderates Imperiled (CSM) 192
Burns' Foe Compiles Highlight Reel Of Gaffes (RC) 193
Under Fire, Democrat Retreats (WT) 195
Mich. Voters Focus On Economy (WP) 195
Chicago's Daley Vetoes Bill Aimed At Big Retailers (WSJ) 197
Chicago Mayor Vetoes Big-Store Minimum Wage (NYT) 198
Wal-Mart Discounts Politics (WSJ) 198
View Of God Can Reveal Your Values And Politics (USAT) .. 199
Americans May Be More Religious Than They Realize (WP) 201

DOJ_NMG_0061491

The 'Daily Show' Generation (USAT) 203
'Death Of A President' Courts Controversy, But To What End? (WSJ) 204
'Death Of A President' Faces Tough Questions, Audience (USAT).....205
The Republican Collapse May Not Be So Imminent (NYT).206
3 Killed Outside U.S. Embassy In Syria (AP-Y) 208
Rice Indicates Slight Shift In Stance On Iran Sanctions (NYT) 208
Rice Leaves Door Open For Dealing With Iran (USAT).....210
Rice Open To Talks On Nuke Program (WT/AP).....210
Brief Nuclear Halt May Lead To Talks With Iran (WP) 211
Iran Closes Down 2 Opposition Newspapers (AP).....212
Iran Shuts Top Reformist Paper, Citing Cartoon Seen As An Insult (NYT).....213
Iranian Newspaper Ordered Closed After Publishing Cartoon (LAT).....214
Proxy Terrorism From Iran (LAT).....215
Starting Another War (NYT).....216
Abbas Agrees To Share Power With Hamas (AP) 217
Abbas And Hamas Agree To Coalition Government (LAT) ..218
Fatah, Hamas Move Toward Unity (WT).....219
Palestinian Reports Unity Deal With Hamas (NYT).....221
Abbas Announces Deal With Hamas (WP) 222
Blair Gets Rough Ride In Beirut (FT).....223
Protesters In Lebanon Drown Out Blair's Offers Of Aid And Support (NYT).....224
Cameron Hits Out At US Foreign Policy (FT).....225
Tory Denounces Blair's 'Slavish' Tie To U.S. (NYT).....226
Briton Urges Frankness Toward U.S. (WP) 227
Rice Warns Sudan Of Relations With U.S. (AP).....228
Sudan Flouting Peace Treaty, Annan Charges (WP) 228
Mystery Lingers In Kyrgyz 'Kidnapping' (WT/AP).....229
Senator Shoots Down Reports Of Close Call (HILL).....229
US And EU Condemn China's News Rules (FT) 231
Old China News Agency (WSJ).....231
No More Chinese Whispers (WSJ).....232
Uruguay At Center Of Lively U.S.-Venezuela Chess Game (NYT) 234
The U.S.-Korea Tie: Myth And Reality (WP) 235
A Sensitive Seoul Isn't Always A Good Thing (WSJ).....236
It's A Boy! (WP).....238

DOJ_NMG_0061492

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney, Rumsfeld Call For Perseverance At Pentagon Ceremony (AFP)

By Jim Mannion

AFP, September 12, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney called on Americans to stay united and persevere in an increasingly divisive war against terrorism five years after the September 11 attacks on the United States.

Cheney joined US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld at a memorial ceremony at the site where a hijacked American Airlines jet struck the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, killing 189 people, including the five Al-Qaeda hijackers.

"We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power," Cheney told a gathering that included families of the victims.

President George W. Bush later visited the Pentagon where he consoled and embraced relatives of the victims, ending an emotional round of visits that took him to "Ground Zero" in New York on Sunday and Shanksville, Pennsylvania on Monday.

Hijackers flew two airliners into the World Trade Center, followed by another into the Pentagon and a fourth into a field in Pennsylvania, killing nearly 3,000 people in the worst attack on US soil.

The anniversary comes amid deepening public disenchantment with the war in Iraq and a resurgence in Afghanistan of the Taliban, the Islamic fundamentalists toppled in a US-led offensive within months of the September 11 attacks.

At the ceremony, hundreds of guests, dignitaries and military observed in silence as bagpipes played and a giant American flag was unfurled over the side of the Pentagon as firefighters did on the day of the attack.

Cheney and Rumsfeld, key architects of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, alluded only indirectly to the bitter divisions that have opened since the attacks on New York and Washington.

Both, however, sounded themes of national unity and determination in their speeches, and broadly defended the administration's performance.

Cheney called September 11 "a day of national unity."

"When that giant flag was unfurled here, it rallied the country," Cheney said. "And everyone was reminded how fortunate we are every day to have the men and women of the Pentagon on duty for the United States of America."

Cheney said the United States has learned "that there is a certain kind of enemy whose ambitions have no limits and whose cruelty is only fed by the grief of others."

"And in these years, we also found our mission: to defend America against a present danger and to offer a democracy and hope as the alternative to extremism and terror.

"This struggle is fierce and it will be lengthy, but it is not endless," Cheney said. "Our cause is right. Our will is strong. This great nation will prevail."

A video tape released by Al-Qaeda's number two leader Ayman Al-Zawahiri on the anniversary threatened continued attacks on US and western interests in the Gulf and on Israel.

Rumsfeld, praising Cheney's resolve and "fierce determination to bring our enemies to justice," said the attacks drew the United States into "a war not of our making."

"On this fifth anniversary and on the anniversaries to come, we must ask ourselves, are they succeeding?" Rumsfeld said.

"Well, in many ways, the enemy's failing," he said.

He said many of those who have not been killed or captured are "on the run" and they had lost a sanctuary in Afghanistan.

Rumsfeld implicitly linked Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to the September 11 attackers, saying, "They've lost a supporter in Iraq that was paying the families of suicide bombers 25,000 dollars each."

DOJ_NMG_0061493

"But they still try every day to convince us to doubt our prospects, to distrust one another, and to believe that the battle against them cannot be won or is not worth the cost," he said.

Cheney Defends Homeland Security Policy (AP)

The Associated Press, September 11, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney says the fact that there has not been another attack on U.S. soil shows "we've done a pretty good job" of protecting the country against terrorists.

"I don't know how much better you can do than no, no attacks for the past five years," said Cheney, dismissing Democratic charges that serious security gaps remain.

On Monday, as the country marked the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Cheney attended a service of remembrance across the street from the White House at St. John's Episcopal Church, where former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was among those at the service.

Cheney then presided at a moment of silence on the South Lawn, where the Marine Band played "Amazing Grace," "America the Beautiful" and "Taps" as Cheney and his wife, Lynne, stood solemnly with Mrs. Thatcher, Cabinet members and White House staffers.

Later, at a memorial observance near the site where an American Airlines plane slammed into the Pentagon five years ago, Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld walked side-by-side to the speaker's platform as somber music played. Rumsfeld's arm was in a sling; he is recovering from shoulder surgery.

A moment of silence was observed at 9:37 a.m. EDT, the exact time the plane struck, killing 184 people.

Also in attendance was retired Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, who was vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff the day of the attack.

The Bush administration has been on the defensive over its policies in Iraq, where insurgents have been escalating their attacks.

Cheney, in an hour-long interview Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," acknowledged the Iraqi insurgency was underestimated and that he was wrong when in May, 2005 he declared the insurgency "in its last throes."

"I think there is no question but that we did not anticipate an insurgency that would last this long," the vice president said, adding that "major, major work ... is ahead of us."

"But the fact is, the world is better off today with Saddam Hussein out of power. Think where we'd be if he was still there," Cheney said.

Democrats countered that the country is now less safe.

"Vice President Cheney's influence over our nation's foreign policy has made America less safe," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Vice President Cheney's appearance (Sunday) proves that he just doesn't get it."

Cheney refused to separate Iraq from the overall terrorist threat, although a Senate Intelligence Committee report last week said there's no evidence Saddam Hussein had ties with al-Qaida. He said the war in Iraq is now the central front in the fight against terrorism.

Cheney defended his role as a leading advocate for invading Iraq, for a warrantless surveillance program and for harsh treatment of suspected terrorists.

"Part of my job is to think about the unthinkable, to focus upon what in fact the terrorists may have in store for us," Cheney said when asked about his "dark side."

Cheney shrugged off news reports that his influence was waning, partly as a result of foreign policy miscalculations and partly as other advisers, especially Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, were getting more attention from President Bush.

The vice president said the reports were about as valid "as the ones that said I was in charge of everything."

Rice told "Fox News Sunday" that "these stories float around Washington — who's up, who's down. The vice president remains a crucial adviser to the president. His role is different than my role. ... These stories are simply ridiculous."

DOJ_NMG_0061494

Asked if the United States still would have invaded Iraq had the CIA told Bush and him that Iraq had no weapons of mass destruction in 2003, Cheney answered yes. He said Iraq had the capability of obtaining such weapons and would have done so once U.N. penalties were eased.

President Bush's Reality (NYT)

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Last night, President Bush once again urged Americans to take terrorism seriously — a warning that hardly seems necessary. One aspect of that terrible day five years ago that seems immune to politicization or trivialization is the dread of another attack. When Mr. Bush warns that Al Qaeda means what it says, that there are Islamist fanatics around the world who wish us harm and that the next assault could be even worse than the last, he does not need to press the argument.

After that, paths diverge. Mr. Bush has been marking the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 with a series of speeches about terrorism that culminated with his televised address last night. He has described a world where Iraq is a young but hopeful democracy with a "unity government" that represents its diverse population. Al Qaeda-trained terrorists who are terrified by "the sight of an old man pulling the election lever" are trying to stop the march of progress. The United States and its friends are holding firm in a battle that will decide whether freedom or terror will rule the 21st century.

If that were actual reality, the president's call to "put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us" would be inspiring, instead of frustrating and depressing.

Iraq had nothing to do with the war on terror until the Bush administration decided to invade it. The president now admits that Saddam Hussein was not responsible for 9/11 (although he claimed last night that the invasion was necessary because Iraq posed a "risk"). But he has failed to offer the country a new, realistic reason for being there.

Establishing democracy at the heart of the Middle East no longer qualifies, desirable as that would be. Where Mr. Bush sees an infant secular Iraqi government, most of the world sees a collection of ethnic and religious factional leaders, armed with private militias, presiding over growing strife between Shiites and Sunnis. Warning that American withdrawal would "embolden" the enemy is far from an argument as long as there is constant evidence that American presence is creating a fearful backlash throughout the Muslim world that empowers the fanatics far more than it frightens them.

Fending off the chaos that would almost certainly come with civil war would be a reason to stay the course, although it does not inspire the full-throated rhetoric about freedom that Mr. Bush offered last night. But the nation needs to hear a workable plan to stabilize a fractured, disintegrating country and end the violence. If such a strategy exists, it seems unlikely that Mr. Bush could see it through the filter of his fantasies.

It's hard to figure out how to build consensus when the men in charge embrace a series of myths. Vice President Dick Cheney suggested last weekend that the White House is even more delusional than Mr. Bush's rhetoric suggests. The vice president volunteered to NBC's Tim Russert that not only was the Iraq invasion the right thing to do, "if we had it to do over again, we'd do exactly the same thing."

It is a breathtaking thought. If we could return to Sept. 12, 2001, knowing all we have seen since, Mr. Cheney and the president would march right out and "do exactly the same thing" all over again. It will be hard to hear the phrase "lessons of Sept. 11" again without contemplating that statement.

Democrats Answer Cheney (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Perhaps Vice President Cheney should quit his current job and work within a political system more to his liking, the kind in which those in charge can protect national security by telling everyone what not to say and what not to think.

Cheney seemed terribly impatient with democracy Sunday on "Meet the Press" when he suggested that those who oppose President Bush's Iraq policies are helping -- excuse me, validating -- the terrorists.

Our allies in the war on terror, Cheney said, "want to know whether or not if they stick their heads up, the United States, in fact, is going to be there to complete the mission."

DOJ_NMG_0061495

Then the punch: "And those doubts are encouraged, obviously, when they see the kind of debate that we've had in the United States. Suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion, validates the strategy of the terrorists."

Meaning what, exactly? If Cheney doesn't like "the kind of debate that we've had in the United States," is there any other "kind," short of a lock-step endorsement of all of Bush's choices, he'd endorse?

It's no wonder that Cheney isn't happy with the spread of democracy to the American foreign policy debate. Not only did Cheney have to answer Tim Russert for a whole series of spurious prewar claims and badly mistaken predictions. He must also be distressed with how different the political world is now from what it was four years ago, when he and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld began building their case for the Iraq war.

Back then, Democrats were petrified. They desperately wanted to change the subject from foreign policy to . . . well, anything else. Cheney loved it when tormented Democrats failed to see that they could never win the electorate's confidence if they left national security to the other party.

Yes, there were honorable exceptions proposing alternatives to the administration's approach, including (from somewhat different points of view) Sens. Joe Biden, Carl Levin, Richard Durbin and the late Paul Wellstone. But far more than was healthy, the foreign policy debate back then was largely a Republican and conservative affair.

That's changed. As the administration's failures have become obvious to an American majority, Democrats have begun to play the opposition's essential role of offering alternatives. Voters trying to get beneath slogans such as "cut and run" might usefully consult two speeches given in the past week, one by Biden, the other by Sen. John Kerry. These days Biden is seen as a bit more "hawkish" than Kerry, but what's striking is that both speeches focused on ending the impasse Bush's policies have created.

Both emphasized what should be a central element in the debate, the potential disaster looming in Afghanistan. The administration, Biden said last Thursday, "has picked the wrong fights at the wrong times, failing to finish the job in Afghanistan, which the world agreed was the central front in the war on radical fundamentalism, and instead rushing to war in Iraq, which was not a central front in that struggle."

On Saturday, Kerry condemned the administration's "stand-still-and-lose strategy" and called on the administration to send 5,000 more troops to Afghanistan to quell the Taliban insurgency.

Biden made an important point in arguing that elections alone, absent efforts to "build democratic institutions and bolster moderates," do not guarantee democracy.

Biden also pushed his proposal for radically decentralizing Iraq's government so that Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds can find "breathing room in their own regions" and create a circumstance in which most American troops could be home "by the end of 2007, without leaving chaos behind."

Kerry's speech put greater emphasis on the need to "redeploy" from Iraq, but even the Democrats' 2004 nominee argued for leaving a "residual force to complete the training" of Iraqi troops and "deter foreign intervention."

These speeches reflect a growing consensus within a broad swath of Democratic opinion: First, that Iraq is a blind alley, a distraction from the war on terrorism, not its "central front." Second, that the United States needs a responsible way to disengage from Iraq, reengage in Afghanistan and prepare itself to deal with the rising power of Iran, so far a real winner from Bush's Iraq policies.

The administration, in the meantime, is offering -- stasis. It seems to define victory as maintaining our troops in Iraq through the end of Bush's term without telling us exactly why doing so will make the situation there any better.

A debate about alternative futures is what the country needs. Who can be surprised that Vice President Cheney doesn't want it to happen?

N.J. Prosecutors Defend Effort To Get Phone Company Records Against Federal Lawsuit (AP)

By Beth Defalco, Associated Press

AP, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061496

TRENTON, N.J. – New Jersey has the right to obtain information about a federal domestic surveillance program because that program is no longer a secret, the state argued in response to federal efforts to quash its investigation.

The Justice Department wants to throw "an impenetrable cloak insulating the federal government's domestic surveillance activities from all judicial scrutiny," acting New Jersey Attorney General Anne Milgram said in a statement Monday.

New Jersey prosecutors subpoenaed 10 phone companies in May because of suspicion that state consumer protection laws may have been violated if phone companies were turning over records to the National Security Agency.

The federal government sued the New Jersey attorney general's office in federal court June 14, claiming compliance with the state's subpoenas or even acknowledging the existence of such a program would threaten national security.

The state in its response, filed late Friday, argued: "There is no secret for the state secret privilege to protect."

The program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people the government suspects have terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to take action.

The federal government considers the program vital to fighting terrorism, but critics say it unconstitutionally gathers private information.

Federal officials have objected to efforts by several states and civil liberties groups to investigate or shut down the NSA program. Most recently, it filed a lawsuit against a Connecticut state agency last week and against Maine utility regulators last month.

The courts have been split on that argument: A judge in Chicago agreed with the government that state secrets would be exposed if a case there went forward there, but another judge in San Francisco said the surveillance is already so well known that there is was no danger of spilling secrets.

A judge in Detroit last month ordered an immediate end to the program, saying it violates free speech and privacy rights as well as the separation of powers, but the plaintiffs agreed to keep the ruling on hold until the judge decides whether to issue a stay.

Where's The Outrage? (USAT)

By Karen Hughes

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, one essential ingredient is still lacking in our international response to terrorism: the concerted moral outrage of everyday citizens of every faith and country.

The names of the people murdered that morning read like a roll call of the world's family: Ahmed, Alonso, Chung, Fazio, Fitzgerald, Goldstein, Gonzalez, Jablonski, Mbaya, McSweeney, Mohammed, Rizzo, Wallendorf and Zukelman. The victims, citizens of more than 90 countries, included a young Muslim woman, seven months pregnant, on her way to attend a friend's wedding; an Iranian grandmother who had overcome her fear of flying to visit her grandsons in Boston; a German businessman in New York to attend a meeting. His son, 4 at the time, said, "If the terrorists knew how much we love Papa, they wouldn't have flown the plane into the tower."

Unfortunately, the extremists we face don't care. Since that fateful day, hundreds of others have been torn from their families, murdered as terrorists targeted morning commuters in London, Madrid and India, wedding guests at a hotel in Jordan, children in school in Russia and lining up for candy in Iraq, tourists in Egypt and Bali, Indonesia.

This is not right, or normal, or acceptable, and a much louder chorus of voices needs to join in condemning it. Terrorism threatens all of us. It targets the very foundations of a free society. Yet where are the mothers organizing against terrorism as American mothers did against drunken driving? Where are the fathers promising to teach their sons to choose to live rather than choose to die? Where are the religious clerics and congregations of all faiths arguing that no just and loving God would call on young men and women to kill themselves and others in the name of religion?

To be fair, many voices, Western and Eastern, Islamic and Christian, have spoken out against the violence. Yet the criticism seems oddly muted. Offensive cartoons sparked massive protests in nations across the Islamic world. The international outcry was immediate when civilians were killed in the recent conflict between Israel and Hezbollah.

DOJ_NMG_0061497

Yet we have seen no similar mass condemnation of terrorist violence and murder, and no hint of remorse from those engaged in these acts. As I have traveled the world, I have met those who try to justify the violence based on policy differences, long-held grievances or a perceived threat from the West.

Those who speak of a clash of civilizations seem to forget that Islam is part of America, that an estimated six to seven million Muslims live and worship freely in America. America and our international partners went to war to protect Muslims in the Balkans and gave generously to help Muslims rebuild their lives after the tsunami in Indonesia and the earthquake in Pakistan, just as many Muslim-majority countries reached out generously to help Americans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

We do this because we believe in the dignity and value of every person. The fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 is both a reminder of the inhumanity of the extremists we are up against and the humanity shared by most citizens of the world. The color of our skin, the language we speak and the way we worship may be different, but much more unites us than divides us.

So why aren't more of us doing more to stop the terror?

First, I believe most of us hope that terrorism is an aberration. Unfortunately, I do not believe it is true. Part of my job is to look at the propaganda being spread on Internet sites and TV sets around the world. It is chilling. Bombings are depicted as acts of glory. Children are being taught the language of hate. Thousands of people have been trained in terror training camps, convinced the only way to defend their faith is to kill all others who have a different point of view.

Second, the presence of religion in this debate makes governments and individuals nervous. We are unsure how to engage; we hesitate to offend. Yet all major faiths — including Christianity, Islam and Judaism — teach that life is precious. We cannot allow what is essentially a death cult to get away with murder in the name of religion.

It is in the best interest of all the civilized people that the terror stop. And we have a model. Slavery's path from international norm to pariah began with moral outrage. In 1833, one of every seven adults in Britain signed a petition against slavery. That was twice the number of people eligible to vote at the time and the largest public petitioning of Parliament to that date. The grassroots petition drive was born of the conviction that every person has value — a conviction that should guide us today.

Our challenge is to launch a new grassroots movement across all faiths and continents, a movement that clearly states that no grievance, no complaint, no matter how legitimate, can ever justify the targeting and killing of innocent civilians. A movement that commits to teach our children that life is precious, diversity should be celebrated, and hope can conquer hate.

I have read many stories of lives cut short by acts of terrorism. Almost all the victims' families speak of the joy their loved ones brought to those around them. They didn't deserve to die. And those who killed them earned only shame, not glory. The least the rest of us can do is say so loudly and in concert.

Karen Hughes is under secretary for public diplomacy and public affairs at the State Department.

Al-Qaida Lieutenant Warns Of New Attacks (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, September 11, 2006

Al-Qaida's No. 2 condemned U.N. peacekeepers in Lebanon as enemies of Islam and warned the terror group will strike the Persian Gulf and Israel, suggesting new fronts in its war against the West in a video Monday marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The video of Ayman al-Zawahri was one of three al-Qaida released for the anniversary, showing increasingly sophisticated techniques as the group tries to demonstrate that it remains a powerful, confident force five years into the U.S. war on terror.

One video showed images of the planes striking the World Trade Center, lionizing the 19 suicide hijackers as men "who changed history." Another was a 91-minute documentary-style video in which Osama bin Laden is seen smiling and chatting with the planners of the Sept. 11 attacks in an Afghan mountain camp.

Al-Zawahri spoke in the third and longest video, warning Americans of more attacks to come.

"We have repeatedly warned you and offered a truce with you. Now we have all the legal and rational justification to continue to fight you until your power is destroyed or you give in and surrender," he said. "The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events."

He also called on his followers to attack the U.S. in response to its jailing of a prominent Muslim cleric.

DOJ_NMG_0061498

"I call on every Muslim to make use of every opportunity afforded him to take revenge on America for its imprisonment of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman," he said.

Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric from Egypt, was convicted in the U.S. of seditious conspiracy for his advisory role in a plot to blow up five New York City landmarks, including the United Nations in 1995.

Al-Zawahri's comments also pointed to new fronts for al-Qaida attacks. The terror network has had few operations in Lebanon, Israel or in the Gulf region — except for in Saudi Arabia, where its branch carried out a campaign of violence in recent years but has been heavily damaged by a government crackdown.

He urged his followers to attack Western targets to stop what he said was the stealing of oil from Muslim countries.

Both Lebanon and Israel have warned of a possible growing al-Qaida presence.

"We have seen over the last months increased al-Qaida activity in our area," in Lebanon, Jordan and Egypt's Sinai peninsula, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "We've seen an attempt by al-Qaida to also infiltrate in Gaza and even in the West Bank, so we take the threat very seriously and we're taking the appropriate countermeasures," he said, without elaborating.

Addressing the United States, al-Zawahri said "you should not waste your time" reinforcing troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, "because they are doomed to defeat."

"Instead, you have to reinforce your troops in two regions. First is the Gulf, where you will be thrown out after you are defeated in Iraq, at which point your economic ruin will be achieved," he said. "The second is Israel, because the jihad reinforcements are getting closer to it."

He also denounced the U.N. peacekeeping force now moving into Lebanon under terms set out in a U.N. cease-fire resolution that on Aug. 14 ended fighting between Israel and Hezbollah guerrillas. He suggested Muslims should prevent the peacekeepers' deployment.

"What is so terrible in this resolution ... is that it approves the existence of the Jewish state and isolates our mujahedeen in Palestine from Muslims in Lebanon," he said. "This is consecrated by the presence of international troops who are hostile to Islam."

"Anyone who accepts this resolution means that he accepts all these catastrophes," he said.

The Egyptian-born al-Zawahri called on the Muslim world "to rush with everything at its disposal to the aid of its Muslim brothers in Lebanon and Gaza" and accused Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia of being "traitors" when it came to those two conflicts.

The comments about Lebanon — which indicated the video was recent — were the first indirect threat against the French-led force deploying there, tasked with enforcing a border zone free of Hezbollah weapons.

But it is not clear al-Qaida has the means to carry out significant attacks in Lebanon. The Sunni-led al-Qaida and Shiite Hezbollah are considered enemies. The Shiite guerrillas were angered over the terror group's interference in December, when al-Qaida in Iraq claimed a rocket attack from Lebanon into northern Israel, provoking Israeli airstrikes on a Palestinian base in Lebanon.

Al-Zawahri also called on Iraq's Kurds to shun America and Israel.

"I appeal to my brothers in Islam, the Kurds, to renounce these calls which support America and Israel," he said.

Bin Laden and al-Zawahri are believed to be on the run in the Afghan-Pakistan border region. Many analysts believe that they no longer have centralized control to order or organize attacks by militants around the world. The capture and killing of many midlevel commanders has left the organization more diffuse and amorphous.

At the same time, the central leadership's propaganda machine has gotten more sophisticated, aiming to rally militants and romanticizing the jihad, or holy war, against the United States as a heroic fight.

The three videos were all issued by As-Sahab, al-Qaida's media production arm.

Al Qaeda Threatens More Terror Attacks (WT/AP)

By Elaine Ganley

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061499

PARIS -- Al Qaeda yesterday marked the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks with threats of more assaults as the world remembered the day in solemn observances and some expressions of resentment over the U.S. response to the attacks.

"We have repeatedly warned you and offered a truce with you. Now we have all the legal and rational justification to continue to fight you until your power is destroyed or you give in and surrender," al Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri said in one of three videos the group released yesterday.

"The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events," he said and warned that Persian Gulf countries and Israel would be al Qaeda's next targets. He accused the governments of Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia of supporting Israel's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Elsewhere, somber remembrances marked the day. From Europe to Asia, heads bowed in moments of silence for the nearly 3,000 people killed in the attacks five years ago.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani wrote President Bush on behalf of the Iraqi people, expressing condolences to the families of the September 11 victims.

"On this sad and memorable day, I would like to reiterate the gratitude of the people of Iraq for the people of America and for your leadership," Mr. Talabani wrote. "The people of Iraq will never forget those who helped them in getting rid of the most brutal and terrorist regime of Saddam Hussein."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who won the country's first post-Taliban election in 2004, expressed the appreciation of the Afghan people to the United States for the "sacrifices of your sons and daughters" in rebuilding his country.

Saudi Arabia, birthplace of 15 of the 19 September 11 hijackers, sent a message of sympathy to the American people and relatives of the victims.

But it also noted that "the hand of terrorism has reached innocent people of various nationalities and religions" and reminded Americans that Islamic nations have repeatedly been targeted by terrorists.

In Europe, the scene of three terrorist attacks since September 11, commemorations touched each nation.

Bells tolled in Rome's city hall square.

"9/11 will be in our memory forever," said Rome Mayor Walter Veltroni during a ceremony in a downtown piazza designed by Michelangelo. "We all remember where we were, what we were doing, what our first reaction was."

In London, bouquets of white roses and yellow carnations were piled in a memorial garden where the names of 67 Britons killed in the New York attacks are inscribed -- and where a steel girder from the wreckage of the World Trade Center is buried. Relatives tearfully remembered their dead.

"It doesn't get any easier, but our minds are much calmer, and we can think through all the events without being flooded by tears and sadness," said Adrian Bennett, 55, whose 29-year-old son, Oliver, was among the victims.

French President Jacques Chirac, in a written message to President Bush, reiterated his nation's "friendship" in the fight against terrorism.

A week after the September 11 attacks, Mr. Chirac flew over the World Trade Center site. But that solidarity quickly dissipated into rancor in the buildup to the Iraq war, when Mr. Chirac led opposition to Mr. Bush's plans.

Many foreign leaders still think the war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since. Even German Chancellor Angela Merkel -- an advocate of closer ties with Washington -- had criticism of the United States yesterday, saying: "The ends cannot justify the means."

"In the fight against international terror ... respect for human rights, tolerance and respect for other cultures must be the maxim of our actions, along with decisiveness and international cooperation," she said.

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark joined many when she said: "No, we're not more secure since 9/11."

She said more should be done to reach out to moderate states and leaders in the Islamic world to encourage understanding between different peoples, and to help end the sense of alienation and exclusion among some young Muslims that fuels extremism.

Bin Laden's Deputy Warns Of Attacks In The Middle East (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

DOJ_NMG_0061500

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — Osama bin Laden's top deputy used the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks on Monday to urge fellow Muslims around the world to take up arms against the United States, and he warned of new attacks by Al Qaeda throughout the Middle East.

Dressed in a white robe and turban and seated in front of shelves filled with books, the deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, said American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan were "doomed to defeat" and pledged that the United States military would be expelled entirely from its bases in the Persian Gulf region.

Mr. Zawahri criticized America's military support for Israel during the country's recent war with Hezbollah, and he called on the Muslim world "to rush with everything at its disposal to the aid of its Muslim brothers in Lebanon and Gaza," according to a full transcript of the video provided by the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups.

Mr. Zawahri said Al Qaeda would strike again in coming weeks, but he gave no indication of the type of targets or specific locations.

"The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events with God's permission and guidance," he said in the video, during which he is asked a series of questions by an anonymous interviewer.

Running more than an hour, the Zawahri video, broadcast on CNN and the Internet, was unusually long compared with previous videos released by As-Sahab, Al Qaeda's clandestine media production arm, based in Pakistan.

Terrorism experts in Washington were examining the tape on Monday to find any coded messages that Mr. Zawahri might be sending to his followers. American government officials did not seem to be concerned that the tape might signal an impending attack. "It's one tape of what they said was going to be a media blitz," said an American intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity under ground rules imposed by his agency. "We take it as propaganda. We take all these tapes seriously, but over the years they have been propaganda and not substance."

The video message from Mr. Zawahri was released along with a separate, documentary-like video showing footage of Qaeda operatives planning the Sept. 11 attacks, as well as two of the Sept. 11 hijackers reading from their wills.

They were part of a flurry of audio and video messages that the terrorist organization has released in recent weeks.

President Bush has used several speeches over the past week to highlight what he described as his administration's successes since the 2001 attacks in dismantling Al Qaeda and keeping the organization's senior leaders on the run.

At the same time, Mr. bin Laden and Mr. Zawahri have been able to produce a record number of recordings this year — messages that seem intended both to inspire their followers and to taunt their adversaries.

According to IntelCenter, a company based in Virginia that monitors Qaeda videos, the terrorist group has released 46 videos so far this year, nearly three times the number it has produced in any previous year.

Mr. Zawahri discussed the internal politics of the jihadist movement, announcing that an Algerian separatist organization called the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat had formally joined with Al Qaeda.

He held forth on historical events like the Sykes-Picot agreement between the French and British to redraw the borders within the Middle East after World War I.

Al-Qaeda Calls On Muslims To Fight In Lebanon, Israel (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Al-Qaeda marked the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks with a call for Muslims throughout the world to violently oppose the international peacekeeping force gathering in southern Lebanon and position themselves for direct assaults against Israel and Persian Gulf governments.

In a lengthy video posted on Islamic Web sites late Sunday, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahiri, described last month's U.N.-authored cease-fire between Israel and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon as a Western plot to separate and isolate "the mujaheddin in Palestine . . . from the Muslims in Lebanon."

DOJ_NMG_0061501

The Lebanon crisis, Zawahiri said, was a subset of the primary issue of Israel and its occupation of Palestinian territories. Every "sincere Muslim," he said, should "hurry" to southern Lebanon to aid in setting up "a jihad base on the borders of Palestine to connect" with those on the inside.

His comments reflected an ongoing al-Qaeda effort to position itself as the vanguard of the Palestinian fight against Israel and to capitalize on the outrage the conflict generates in the Muslim world.

Zawahiri's 76-minute video, aired in part yesterday by the al-Jazeera satellite television network and CNN, was one of several released before the anniversary. Titled "Hot Issues," it showed Zawahiri, in a white robe and a turban, sitting in front of a bookcase stocked with volumes in Arabic.

Earlier Sunday, al-Qaeda posted a 90-minute documentary, titled "Knowledge is for Acting Upon." Subtitled in English and narrated by an unknown figure, it was a history of al-Qaeda grievances against the West, including the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, the alleged desire of the West to occupy Arab lands in pursuit of oil and the stationing of U.S. troops in the Persian Gulf region.

The video combined old footage of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden with previously unseen video, including images of Sept. 11 hijackers Hamza Alghamdi and Wail M. Alshehri reading portions of their wills and of bin Laden apparently consulting with his commanders before the 2001 attacks.

It also showed bin Laden, dressed in a dark robe, sitting with Muhammad Atef, a senior al-Qaeda figure who was killed in Afghanistan, and Ramzi Binalshibh, who helped facilitate the attacks and was captured four years ago in Pakistan. Binalshibh is among those President Bush said last week had been transferred from secret prisons to the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Although bin Laden has recorded frequent audiotapes -- the most recent one was released July 1 -- his last known appearance on video was in October 2004. Both he and Zawahiri are believed to be hiding in the mountainous region along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

The Zawahiri video, translated by the Washington-based SITE Institute, was done as an interview conducted by an unseen questioner. In addition to calling on Muslims not to recognize the cease-fire agreement in Lebanon, Zawahiri:

Â· Described the government of Iraq as being made up of "traitors and charlatans" who had lost their place in the afterlife by cooperating with U.S. forces. He called on Iraqi Kurds to stop cooperating with it.

Â· Cited the "good news" that al-Qaeda had joined in a formal alliance with the Algeria-based Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat. U.S. intelligence officials confirmed the alliance, which they said had been "in the works for months."

Â· Repeated long-standing denunciations of governments in Turkey, Egypt, Jordan and elsewhere in the Middle East.

Â· Called NATO forces in Afghanistan "second-rate crusaders" who had been shoved into the line of fire by withdrawing U.S. forces.

Â· Invited "all victims of America," including non-Muslims, to "take advantage of the opportunity" offered by the Islamic campaign and U.S. weakness as a result of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq "to ward off America's aggression against them and overcome it, each in his own way, and under his own banner and with whatever means."

Zawahiri claimed that U.S. defeat in Iraq is near and that "jihadi reinforcements" are closing in on Israel. He warned "Western peoples" that "your leaders are hiding from you the true extent of the disaster which will shock you, and the days are pregnant and giving birth to new events."

Republican Pushes Hardline Tribunal Bill (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 12, 2006

A House Republican has drafted a bill largely mimicking an administration plan to create military commissions to prosecute terror suspects.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, will propose on Wednesday that his panel approve a bill that would allow the exclusion of evidence to protect classified information. A floor vote is expected next week.

DOJ_NMG_0061502

The bill puts Hunter, R-Calif., in line with the White House and Senate leadership, but at odds with his counterpart, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va. Warner and some of his colleagues have drafted a rival bill that would ensure defendants are allowed access to all evidence against them.

Hunter's bill would require the commission members, who act as a jury, to be informed if such a step is taken and instruct them to grant appropriate weight to the evidence, according to a copy of the draft.

That extra step, not included in the administration's proposal, was added to Hunter's proposal after the military's top lawyers testified last week that not allowing a defendant access to evidence would undermine the court's credibility.

"Our foremost consideration in writing this legislation was to protect American troops and American citizens from harm," Hunter said in a statement Monday.

John Hutson, a former Navy judge advocate general and critic of the administration's plan, said Hunter's legislation would not represent a notable departure from the White House position. "It doesn't in any way solve the problem" of ensuring a defendant can dispute a false charge, said Hutson, now president and dean of Franklin Pierce Law Center in Concord, N.H.

Hunter's proposal includes other slight deviations from the administration proposal, including a requirement that no fewer than nine members of the commission be present in a case involving a potential death sentence. The administration bill could allow five members to deliver a death sentence in certain cases.

Hunter's bill also says the administration would be given authority to convene commissions only in the cases of "alien illegal enemy combatants." The administration's plan is said to seek broader authority for the president.

Being allowed access to evidence is considered a fundamental right in civilian and military courts for a defendant to mount an adequate defense. President Bush's proposal, delivered to Congress last week, would let a defense counsel with security clearance see the information but not show it to a client.

The provision has been a major sticking point in negotiations between the White House and Warner. Warner, working with Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., are expected to insist upon their position that a defendant be allowed access to all evidence.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Monday he wants to vote on the legislation by the end of the month and hopes the memory of the Sept. 11 attacks will help rally lawmakers behind the White House proposal.

Frist and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell traveled last weekend to the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba to hear from the "front lines" on the detainee and interrogation program.

"The goal is to make sure our government, whether it's intelligence or armed forces, has the tools we need to prevent the attack we all solemnly recognize today," Frist said.

McConnell, R-Ky., said the program has helped prevent attacks since 2001. The administration has often been criticized for not implementing changes to improve security against terrorism.

"Among the things we're doing right is glean information" from terrorists, he said.

The leaders said they did not visit the 14 "high-value" detainees recently transferred to Guantanamo from the CIA's secret prison system. The terror suspects' cases are considered the driving force behind the administration's proposal; because of a Supreme Court ruling in June that determined Bush's tribunal system was illegal, the president wants to pass legislation allowing it to move forward with the prosecutions.

"Our job here is to make sure we do get it right," Frist said.

White House Gains Concessions In Senate Measure On Tribunals (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration has won concessions from key Senate Republicans in proposed legislation on standards for detainee treatment and the rules for military trials of terrorism suspects, although some disagreements persist between the lawmakers and the White House, Senate sources said yesterday.

The disagreements that remain involve whether suspects can be convicted with evidence they are never allowed to see, an approach favored by the administration but opposed by the Republican senators. The two sides also still differ over the terms of a related amendment to the U.S. War Crimes Act that would limit the exposure of CIA officials and other civilian personnel to prosecution for abusive treatment of detainees, the sources said.

In a sign that Congress is nonetheless preparing to act quickly to establish "military commissions," as the trials are known, and provide other legal relief sought by the administration, the Senate trio at odds with the White House circulated a revised bill yesterday containing their concessions.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) last week had circulated a draft that diverged more sharply from the White House's version. But President Bush's speech on the plan Wednesday, when he announced his intention to put 14 key terrorism suspects on trial, has made Senate Republicans more wary of bucking the White House.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), meanwhile, announced yesterday that he has drafted a competing bill that closely tracks the administration's preferences. He said it would be marked up by his committee on Wednesday.

Lawmakers thus will be considering three bills -- the Senate and House bills plus the administration's own bill -- that contain many provisions the administration has sought. This prospect has raised concerns among human rights groups and defense attorneys who say the plans offer inadequate protections for defendants and would set a precedent for the use of similarly worrisome rules at foreign trials of captured U.S. personnel.

The Senate bill for the first time includes language supporting the administration's position that detainee abuse can be prosecuted only if it, in effect, "shocks the conscience." Legal experts say that instead of setting an absolute standard for conduct, the bill's language would leave room for judges to weigh the urgency of the information extracted from detainees during rough interrogations.

The revised Senate bill also would bar detainees held by the United States from bringing legal action against the government to challenge the legality of their detention or treatment. It would bar the collection of damages by detainees for violations of the Geneva Conventions, which set the minimum standards for wartime treatment. Both provisions were sought by the administration, although their language is not as sweeping as the White House preferred.

The new Senate draft also requires that any evidence used at trial be declassified or summarized, a provision the administration strongly opposes. Under the measures, the military judge presiding over a trial could dismiss charges if the government refuses to turn over evidence to the defendant.

The Senate draft also contains other provisions the administration opposes, including one that would allow the prosecution of U.S. personnel for any degrading treatment of detainees and another that would prohibit the use of evidence obtained through cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. It further defines those subject to future military trials as people engaged in anti-U.S. hostilities, a narrower definition than the White House prefers.

Senate sources said they could not predict whether a compromise or showdown with the White House is looming. Although Warner has told colleagues he expects his version of the bill to win his committee's approval and move rapidly to the Senate floor, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has said he would bring the White House version of the bill to a vote first.

Yesterday, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden went to Capitol Hill to lobby senators for the administration's version of the bill.

The dispute over detainee treatment has been particularly awkward for McCain, a former prisoner of war who is a contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. Detainee treatment is one of McCain's signature political issues, and last year he forced the administration to accept a bill that prohibits cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment by the military.

Senate sources say that because of his political ambitions McCain has been wary of depending on Senate Democrats to provide the margin of victory for his provisions over White House opposition and has compromised to gain more widespread support from Republicans. A spokeswoman for Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) said she now supports the McCain bill.

Human Rights First, the Center for Victims of Torture and five other activist groups released a joint letter yesterday condemning the administration's version of the bill as "shockingly radical" and asserting that it would violate "fundamental notions of due process."

Graham Thinks Terror Trial Bill Fatally Flawed (TSSC)

By James Rosen

The State (SC), September 12, 2006

SENECA — U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham says he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them.

Graham, a military lawyer and a colonel in the Air Force Reserve, read the White House bill late Thursday on a flight from Washington to Greenville. He pored through the 86-page document until, on page 34, he reached a clause that would prohibit defense lawyers from sharing classified information with defendants they represent. He marked it with a red pen.

"That's the killer," the S.C. Republican said. "I fell over when I read it."

Graham said he supports 90 percent of the bill, which Bush sent to Congress on Wednesday. But "I don't feel good about telling someone — no matter who they are — 'We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why.'"

"It's a bridge too far, and it's not necessary," Graham said. "It will result in putting the (military) commissions in legal jeopardy and eroding our standing in the world community."

Graham, 51, said every general and admiral at the top of the country's military justice system agrees that classified information can be shared with accused terrorists without jeopardizing national security.

"I believe the accused should see that evidence," Maj. Gen. Scott Black, the judge advocate general of the Army, told the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has given the Armed Services Committee until Tuesday to produce a bill, Graham said. The panel's chairman, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, and Sen. John McCain share Graham's view on the handling of classified evidence, setting up a possible clash in the Senate.

Graham said Frist has vowed to bring Bush's bill directly to the Senate floor Tuesday. Graham said he agrees with Frist that Congress must act soon so terrorist trials can begin at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bush called on lawmakers to pass his tribunals measure quickly so detainees can be tried. The president increased the political pressure by disclosing that 14 senior al-Qaida members, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, were being sent to Guantanamo Bay from secret CIA prisons overseas.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that the Bush administration had exceeded its authority in establishing military tribunals without congressional action, prompting the need for legislation.

The case was brought by lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Guantanamo detainee who had been a chauffeur for Osama bin Laden.

"The Hamdan decision has reinforced our need to ensure that military commissions are reflective of American values such as due process and the rule of law," Gen. Black, the head of the Army's legal apparatus, testified Thursday.

Senior lawyers at the White House, the Justice Department and the Pentagon argue that allowing terrorists to see classified evidence could expose how the U.S. has pursued al-Qaida and would put informants within the terror network in danger. But Graham said he's certain the Supreme Court would reject a law that denies accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"It would be a tragedy to take one of the masterminds of 9/11, hold them accountable, only to have the case rejected by the Supreme Court for no good reason," Graham said.

"I'm frustrated when people say we're trying to give terrorists classified information," he said. "Well, that's garbage. We're going to protect our classified information, and we're going to protect our methods and sources."

Graham said that if his differences with the White House cannot be bridged, he is prepared to push an amendment giving accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"I think I will draft an amendment that will get majority support in the Senate, and there will be plenty of Republicans voting for it," Graham said. "I'm just predicting that we win. I don't know by what margin."

The House is set to take up tribunals legislation the week of Sept. 18.

Air Force Col. Morris Davis, who would run the Guantanamo trials, said accused terrorists will get fair trials, and his corps of lawyers will work with whatever legislation Congress passes.

Rosen covers Washington for McClatchy newspapers in South Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0061505

U.S. Appeals Ruling On American Held In Iraq (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 (AP) — Government lawyers said Monday that American courts had no authority to stop the military from transferring an American citizen to an Iraqi court to face charges that he supported terrorists and insurgents.

Shawqi Omar, a citizen of both Jordan and the United States who once served in the Minnesota National Guard, was captured in Iraq in 2004. He is being held at Camp Bucca, a prison in southern Iraq, where his family says he has not been charged or allowed to speak with a lawyer.

His family is demanding that Mr. Omar be brought before an American court, where prosecutors would have to show probable cause for detaining him and he could consult with a lawyer.

The military, which says Mr. Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials at the time of his arrest, wants to transfer him to an Iraqi court. A judge blocked that transfer in February.

On appeal Monday before the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, government lawyers said American courts did not have jurisdiction because Mr. Omar was being held by a multinational force, not the American military.

Defense lawyers say that is a legal gimmick.

The three-judge panel hearing the case also expressed skepticism, saying the government's theory might allow the military to arrest someone inside the United States and hold him without due process under the guise of a multinational force.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre said that would not happen, but the judges noted that it could. The judges also seemed wary of saying courts had no jurisdiction over an American citizen being held by his country's military.

Lawyers for Mr. Omar's family say he is innocent and is likely to be tortured if handed over to the Iraqi government. They say he is a businessman who was seeking reconstruction contracts in Iraq.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Gag Orders Lifted (NBH)

By Sara Capozzi

New Britain (CT) Herald, September 12, 2006

PLAINVILLE - American life has changed considerably in the five years since the terrorist attacks and those changes can be felt in the most unexpected places, even if they are not always seen or heard.

Public libraries in mid-sized Central Connecticut towns are not likely places for an FBI investigation involving a perceived threat to national security, but unbeknownst to their patrons and the majority of their staff, they were in the midst of one last summer.

In late June 2005, Library Connection Inc., a non-profit consortium of 26 central Connecticut libraries, received a National Security letter from the FBI, involving a top-secret investigation of patron Internet usage.

Subsequently, four executive members of the consortium were placed under life-long gag orders, made possible through the Patriot Act, which does not require court evidence or oversight. Although the names of the John Does were to be kept secret by the government, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union found the government had failed to redact one mention of Director of Plainville Public Library Peter Chase's name and other identifying information from the legal documents. From the identifying information that was not omitted, it didn't take long until the national press had identified Chase and the other John Does.

Soon, Chase was being bombarded with calls from newspapers all over the country and even in Japan and France. But even after all the media attention, the government would not allow the gag order to be lifted.

Through the ACLU, the four consortium members, Chase, George Christian, Library Connection Executive Director, Barbara Bailey, librarian at Glastonbury's Welles Turner Library and Janet Nocek, librarian at Portland Public Library, fought the gag order against Connecticut United States Attorney Kevin O'Connor under the alias John Doe.

DOJ_NMG_0061506

Bridgeport Superior Court ruled the law was unconstitutional and the government appealed that decision, later withdrawing the appeal in May 2006, thus releasing the four librarians from the gag order.

The government had said other sections of the legal documents were blacked out for National Security, but when the original, previously sealed documents were released Aug. 30, it was clear one of the items omitted under the guise of National Security was actually a CT General Statute that deems all circulation resources in public libraries confidential.

"What made me so angry about this is that when usually someone like Kevin O'Connor ... says this is a matter of national security, you believe him," Chase said.

"You don't want to pry into stuff like that. No one wants to do something that would harm the nation. But he in fact was using that as an excuse to cover up that Connecticut had a public statute that protected these laws. He wasn't telling the truth."

Chase called the power given to the government through the Patriot Act, "frightening," in terms of the personal freedoms of Americans.

He said patrons should be able to check out some controversial titles which the Plainville library owns such as Hitler's autobiography "Mien Kampf" and the "Communist Manifesto" without fear.

"Just because you read [the Communist Manifesto] doesn't mean you're a communist," Chase said. "And if you read "Mien Kamf" it doesn't mean you're a Nazi. But you should be able to take that out in privacy. People shouldn't be spying on what you're reading, what you're researching on the Internet. That should be a private confidential matter and in fact is recognized as such in state law." There were 150,000 letters issued up to the date the revisions to the Patriot Act were made, Chase said. Chase and the other three plaintiffs were the only people out of possibly thousands who had their lifetime gag orders lifted.

Now that they are free to speak out, Chase, Christian, Bailey and Nocek plan to continue to speak publicly against the Patriot Act. They are planning to attend a press conference in Washington D.C. on Sept. 28 and a forum with O'Connor at the Hartford's Old State House next month.

"This is a significant attack on American democracy," Chase said. "We've always said people should be free to say what they want, people have to be free to read what they want and this is an attack on our country, on the principals that we have supported and fought for for all these years."

Chase and the other librarians still do not know what or who the FBI was looking for through its investigation. He said the library has no problem giving the government information through court orders if it would help with a criminal investigation.

"They don't have to explain to us what they're investigating - we don't care," he said. "We just want to know their investigation is legitimate."

Sara Capozzi can be reached at scapozzi@newbritainherald.com, or by calling (860) 225-4601, Ext. 320.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush: Set Aside Differences On Terrorism (AP)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

The AP, September 12, 2006

Five years after the worst attack on U.S. soil, President Bush said Monday night the war against terrorism is "the calling of our generation" and urged Americans to put aside differences and fight to victory.

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over," Bush said in a prime-time address from the Oval Office. "The war is not over — and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

Bush also staunchly defended the war in Iraq though he acknowledged that Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people.

His address came at the end of a day in which he visited New York, Pennsylvania and the Pentagon to honor victims of the attacks that rocked his presidency and thrust the United States into a costly and unfinished war against terror.

"We are now in the early hours of this struggle between tyranny and freedom," the president said.

DOJ_NMG_0061507

As for Iraq, he said Saddam's regime, while lacking weapons of mass destruction, was a threat that posed "a risk the world could not afford to take." At least 2,670 U.S. servicemen and women have died in Iraq, which Bush calls the central front in the war on terror.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone," the president said. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us."

The nation is split over the war in Iraq and Bush's handling of it, and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., accused Bush of playing politics.

"This should have been an occasion to bring everyone together, and focus on the tragedy, the many we lost, and the heroism of those who embodied the American spirit," Schumer said. "You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it."

Earlier, Bush visited a New York fire station, the wind-swept field in Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon to place wreaths and console relatives of attack victims.

"Five years ago, this date — Sept. 11 — was seared into America's memory," the president said. "Nineteen men attacked us with a barbarity unequaled in our history."

Bush said that Osama bin Laden, the mastermind of the attack, and other terrorists are still in hiding. He said, "Our message to them is clear: No matter how long it takes, America will find you and we will bring you to justice."

Bush said the war on terror was nothing less than "a struggle for civilization" and must be fought to the end. He said defeat would surrender the Middle East to radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons.

"We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations," the president said. Two months before the November elections, he attempted to spell out in graphic terms the stakes he sees in the unpopular war in Iraq and the broader war on terror.

He said Islamic radicals are trying to build an empire "where women are prisoners in their homes, men are beaten for missing prayer meetings and terrorists have a safe haven to plan and launch attacks on America and other civilized nations."

"The war against this enemy is more than a military conflict," the president said. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century and the calling of our generation."

Five years ago, the attacks transformed Bush's presidency and awakened the world to bin Laden and his band of al-Qaida terrorists. While the public has soured on the war in Iraq, the president still gets high marks for his handling of Sept. 11.

Terrorism has been a potent political issue for Republicans, and they hope to capitalize on it in the elections. GOP lawmakers are anxious about holding control of both houses of Congress.

Congress has approved $432 billion for Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," the president said. He quoted bin Laden as calling Iraq "the Third World War."

"Our nation has endured trials, and we face a difficult road ahead," the president said. "Winning this war will require the determined efforts of a unified country. So we must put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

While Bush urged resolve, the two co-chairs of the 9/11 Commission accused the Bush administration and Congress of a lack of urgency in protecting the country. About half of their 41 recommendations to better secure Americans, offered in July 2004, have become law.

"Where in the world have we been for five years?" said former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., who was joined by his Republican counterpart, former New Jersey Gov. Tom Kean. Hamilton spoke of failures to put first responders on the same radio spectrum so they can talk to each other during an emergency — as firefighters and police officers who died in the World Trade Center could not in 2001.

The 9/11 attacks changed the political tone in Washington and abroad — but only briefly.

"We had an astonishing moment of unity in America and around the world," former President Clinton told a Jewish conference in Washington. That has given way to bitter political divisions between Democrats and Republicans. Many nations that rushed to stand with the United States now accuse the Bush administration of failing to honor human rights, tolerance and diversity of cultures.

DOJ_NMG_0061508

Still, dozens of lawmakers, Republicans and Democrats alike, joined on the steps of the Capitol Monday to remember the attacks, singing "God Bless America" as they had five years ago.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said Monday, "Five years later, we have to continue to move forward with unity, urgency and in the spirit of international cooperation, because we are not yet fully healed and not yet as safe as we should be."

Bush began the day in New York with firefighters and police officers at a Lower East Side firehouse. He stood in front of a door salvaged from a fire truck destroyed on Sept. 11. It was a cloudless morning reminiscent of the sunny day when two hijacked planes slammed into the twin towers of the World Trade Center.

The mourners silently bowed their heads, at 8:46 a.m. and again at 9:03 a.m., marking the moments when the planes slammed into the towers. The attacks killed 2,749 people.

Bush spent time talking with the first responders about what they had been through the last five years, spokesman Tony Snow said.

The next stop was in Shanksville, Pa., where Bush and his wife stood without umbrellas in a chilly rain to lay a wreath honoring the 40 passengers and crew killed when United Airlines Flight 93 plowed into a Pennsylvania field. The terrorists apparently had been planning on crashing the plane into the White House or the Capitol until passengers stormed the cockpit to take control.

Bush had an emotional meeting with relatives of the Shanksville victims. "There were some people who were still clearly grieving about what happened five years ago," Snow said.

Bush: 'The War Is Not Over' (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush led the nation on Monday in marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, making a solemn journey to the three sites where hijacked planes crashed in the terror strikes and declaring, in an evening address, that America's safety "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Until speaking to the nation from the Oval Office, the president commemorated the attacks quietly, attending ceremonies at three symbolic sites: a New York City firehouse, a grassy field in rural Pennsylvania and the mended Pentagon.

But with eight weeks until congressional elections in which national security is a dominant issue, Bush and other political leaders continued to battle over whether the nation had learned the proper lessons from the Sept. 11 attacks and was prepared to prevent new ones.

Bush's 16-minute speech reflected on the nearly 3,000 lives lost on Sept. 11 but also used dire warnings to caution that terrorists still intend to harm the country, and that Iraq remains the central front in stopping them. He repeated the themes he has laid out in a recent string of speeches designed to shore up flagging public support for the Iraq war and for his leadership on national security, which has left Republicans nervous about their prospects in the November elections.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone," Bush said. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Speaking more broadly of the fight against terrorists who aim to build a "radical Islamic empire," Bush said: "America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I. But the war is not over — and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

"This struggle has been called a clash of civilizations," he said. "In truth, it is a struggle for civilization. We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations."

Democrats said they were surprised by the muscular tone of the speech, after a day of carefully choreographed remembrances. They accused the president of trying to turn a solemn occasion to partisan advantage.

DOJ_NMG_0061509

"This should have been an occasion to bring everyone together and focus on the tragedy…. You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Bush "should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning … to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had 'nothing' to do with 9/11."

"The president's misuse of the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attack shows he'll go to any lengths to divert attention from his failures in Iraq — failures that have diverted focus from the war on terrorism," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

The speech capped a day in which the president fulfilled a ceremonial role in leading the nation in mourning and remembrance. During his visits to New York, Pennsylvania and the Pentagon, Bush spoke not a word in public, but his face — tight-lipped with eyes downcast — suggested the welling of emotions that marked the day.

In ceremonies at the Pentagon, Bush stood at the point of impact and presented a lily wreath. He and First Lady Laura Bush, both dressed in black, appeared drawn as they shook hands and hugged the families of those who died there. At one point, the president appeared to wipe away tears.

In a similar fashion, other political leaders marked the day with solemnity and ceremony, even while pressing the political battle over which party could best lead the nation in a post-Sept. 11 world.

Vice President Dick Cheney, in a morning speech at the Pentagon, took a swipe at Democrats calling for a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq. "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power," Cheney said, quoting a 2002 speech by the president.

The word "appeasement" has carried an additional political charge in recent weeks, after Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld compared critics of the Iraq war with politicians who sought to appease Hitler.

During a ceremony at dusk outside the Capitol, where lawmakers from both parties marked the anniversary, Pelosi seemed to insert a partisan note, saying that "right now we are not fully safe and we are not fully healed."

Al Qaeda, the perpetrator of the Sept. 11 attacks, also sought to put its stamp on the day. The terrorist group's No. 2 leader warned in a videotape that it would strike Persian Gulf nations and Israel to damage the U.S. economy.

The political skirmishing echoed a debate of increasing intensity in Washington as the two major political parties position themselves for the November elections.

Democrats argue that the Iraq war has distracted the nation from the unfinished work of tracking down Al Qaeda leaders and securing ports, rail systems and nuclear materials. Bush and the Republican Party have been trying to rebuild support for the Iraq war and burnish their credentials as those best suited to protect the nation from future attacks.

Throughout the day from New York to Washington and across the country, bells tolled, wreaths were laid and prayers were spoken. In one moving tribute, in New York, Bush honored the memory of scores of firefighters. He stood beside the battered door of a truck that belonged to Ladder Co. 18, dented and covered with grime from the billowing fallout of the collapsed World Trade Center.

Rumsfeld was visibly moved at a Pentagon memorial, where he stood in a steady mist.

"I remember working — working our way through that long, tragic day," he said haltingly, choking back emotion.

Rumsfeld invoked images of bipartisanship, recalling how Democrats and Republicans stood together at the Capitol after the attacks and sang "God Bless America." He said making "every effort to stay united as a country" would be a good way to pay tribute to Sept. 11 victims.

Some in Washington took the occasion to advance a possible run for president. In a speech to the mostly conservative American Enterprise Institute, Newt Gingrich, the former Republican House speaker and potential candidate in 2008, criticized the administration.

"We are not where we wanted to be nor where we need to be," Gingrich said. "We have not captured Bin Laden. We have not defeated the Taliban…. We have not stopped the recruitment of young fanatics into terrorism."

Even those with less partisan interest in the debate seized the moment to advance an agenda. Republican Thomas H. Kean and Democrat Lee Hamilton — chairman and vice chairman of the bipartisan commission that investigated the attacks and the government's response — said bureaucracy had blocked implementation of many of the panel's recommendations to improve security and intelligence-gathering.

DOJ_NMG_0061510

Former President Clinton, blamed in an ABC docudrama for failing to pay sufficient attention to looming Al Qaeda threats, addressed a Jewish charitable organization at a Washington hotel. Without mentioning Bush or the Republican Party, Clinton urged renewed efforts to stabilize Afghanistan, where the Taliban has recently gained strength.

"We need more troops," he said, noting there were almost seven times as many U.S. soldiers in Iraq as in Afghanistan. "We can't practice hit-and-run democracy."

Clinton also sounded a familiar Democratic theme that the nation is not as safe as it could be, faulting the administration for failing to improve inspections of ship and plane cargo, as well as of chemical and nuclear plants.

"They say it's a matter of costs, but it can't be," Clinton said. Hailing a new method for inspecting cargo electronically, he said the technology would cost $840 million a year, "and we've already spent over $300 billion on the war in Iraq."

Polls show that 95% of Americans surveyed remember exactly where they were when they learned of the attacks. For most of them, Monday was a day of remembering what few have forgotten, this time laced with a political message.

*

faye.fiore@latimes.com
james.gerstenzang@ latimes.com

Times staff writers Johanna Neuman, Julian Barnes and Moises Mendoza contributed to this report.

In Prime-Time Address, Bush Says Safety Of U.S. Hinges On Iraq (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — President Bush used the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks on Monday to tell Americans that they were engaged in "a struggle for civilization" that would be determined in part by the course of the war in Iraq.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," Mr. Bush said.

In a prime-time speech from the Oval Office, delivered after a day of solemn ceremonies, Mr. Bush sought to place the war in Iraq in the context of an epic battle between tyranny and freedom, saying the campaign against global terrorism was "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century and the calling of our generation."

"If we do not defeat these enemies now," Mr. Bush said, "we will leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons."

The address capped a week of speeches in which Mr. Bush tried to lay out his best case for the war in Iraq by defining it as a crucial front in the war on terror, while portraying the broader struggle as a natural successor to World War II and the Cold War in defining the place of the United States in the world.

Even by the standards of his latest round of speeches, Mr. Bush's language was particularly forceful, even ominous, with warnings of a radical Islamic network that was "determined to bring death and suffering to our homes."

Mr. Bush spent roughly one-fifth of his 17-minute address making the case that the nation's safety hinged on success in Iraq, even as he implicitly acknowledged there was no link between Saddam Hussein and the Sept. 11 strikes.

"I'm often asked why we're in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Mr. Bush said, going on to say that Mr. Hussein was a threat nonetheless, that he needed to be confronted and that the world was safer with him in captivity.

And Mr. Bush reprised some of his tougher talk against Osama bin Laden, delivering a message to him and other terrorists, "America will find you, and we will bring you to justice."

Mr. Bush gave his address at the end of a tour through the three major attack sites — Lower Manhattan; Shanksville, Pa.; and the Pentagon — in which he attended ceremonies and spoke with the bereaved but made no public comments.

He gave the speech from behind his desk at a fast clip, but with a furrowed brow and circles below his eyes. He delivered it five years to the minute of when he addressed the nation from the same seat on the evening of Sept. 11, 2001, and proclaimed that those who harbored terrorists would be dealt with as if they were terrorists themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0061511

Drawing parallels between the challenges of his presidency and those of Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman, Mr. Bush said, "Our nation has endured trials, and we face a difficult road ahead." And he called for unity, saying, "We must put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

All of the networks carried the address live; ABC ran it during a break in its miniseries about the attacks that portrayed the Clinton and Bush administrations as having failed at times to move aggressively enough against Al Qaeda before the attacks.

Mr. Bush's address brought to a close a day when leaders of both parties put aside, at least for the moment, the acrimony that has characterized the national security debate since the brief period of national unity after the attacks. But as soon as the speech was over, the partisanship flared again. Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said the president "should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning" to justify his Iraq policy. And Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, leader of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, called the address disappointing, saying, "You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it."

Hours earlier, Congressional leaders joined on the Capitol steps to sing "God Bless America," an effort to recreate their spontaneous moment of post-attack comity. And the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid — whose press office is ordinarily a clearinghouse for hard-charging attacks on the president and Republican leadership — released a statement that read in part, "The light that shone on Sept. 11 cannot die, it cannot be dimmed, it cannot fail."

But it was the president's day that dominated a news media environment that was swimming in the imagery of Sept. 11, with the cable news networks offering blanket coverage of the day's ceremonies, mixed with remembrances from survivors, first responders, officials and politicians.

Before speaking from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush had spent the day in public silence as he and Laura Bush visited the three sites scarred by the attacks, a solemn trek that began at ground zero Sunday night.

The Bushes began their day at the Fort Pitt firehouse on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, where they observed back-to-back moments of silence — one at the precise moment each of the twin towers was struck. They then moved to Shanksville, Pa., where Mr. and Mrs. Bush laid a wreath in a spitting rain in the field where United Airlines Flight 93 crashed, and wound up at the Pentagon, where the weight of the day showed on their faces.

It was an emotional and somber, if carefully scripted, day for the Bushes, designed by the White House to maximize the president's exposure but minimize his words before the evening speech.

At the Pentagon, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld presided over a memorial service that was occasionally interrupted by the eerie roar of commercial jets from nearby Ronald Reagan National Airport.

Addressing a crowd of 500 that included relatives of victims, Mr. Cheney said the United States would keep pressing the fight. "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power," Mr. Cheney said, quoting the president and reprising a theme that has been taken by critics as a veiled effort to portray Democrats as appeasing the enemy.

Also speaking at the service, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, said the number of American military personnel killed in Afghanistan and Iraq, at roughly 3,000, was approaching the number of people killed in the attacks.

Teresa Taylor of New Hampshire, who attended in honor of her brother-in-law, Leonard E. Taylor, said she was moved by Mr. Rumsfeld's recounting of the day of the attacks, given in halting voice. "It brought back a lot of memories," she said.

But Shannon Mason of Springfield, Va., called the ceremony "too political" for coupling the attacks with the war in Iraq. Ms. Mason, whose mother, Ada Mason, a Pentagon budget analyst, was killed in the attack, added, "I think the war has nothing to do with Sept. 11."

Even as he called for unity Mr. Bush alluded to Democratic calls for a timetable to withdraw from Iraq, saying, "Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone."

Bush: Vigilance Is Key In War On Terrorism (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061512

WASHINGTON — President Bush ended a somber day marking the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks with a call for unity and a plea for Americans to gird themselves for "the calling of our generation" — a long fight against terrorism.

"The war against this enemy is more than a military conflict," he said, a reference to wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century."

With control of Congress at stake in the Nov. 7 elections, both parties have been trying to use the Iraq war to their advantage. Numerous polls have shown declining support for the war and the president's handling of it.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters earlier in the day that the speech would not be political. One political analyst suggested that is an impossible task less than two months before Election Day.

"There is controversy about whether Iraq is a front in the war on terrorism, or whether it has increased terrorism," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center of the University of Pennsylvania. "The moment is political because of the elections and Iraq."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who heads his party's Senate campaign committee, called the speech "disappointing." He said, "You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it."

Bush defended his decision to invade Iraq in 2003 even though he said the country's now-deposed leader "was not responsible" for 9/11. "The regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat," the president said, adding that it "posed a risk that the world could not afford to take."

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," he said.

During his 17-minute, nationally televised address, Bush repeatedly couched the battle ahead as one that goes beyond Iraqi battlefields and compared it to the Cold War.

Bush said the key to victory is the same: forge democracy in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. "One of the strongest weapons in our arsenal," Bush said, "is the power of freedom.

"This struggle has been called a clash of civilizations," Bush said of actions that have included wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "In truth, it is a struggle for civilization."

Bush noted the security and law enforcement improvements since the 9/11 attacks, including more cooperation between law enforcement and intelligence agencies and tightened airport security. He said the country is safer but needs to remain vigilant.

"Our enemies have not succeeded in launching another attack on our soil, but they have not been idle," he said.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone."

Bush Says Iraq Victory Is Vital (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

President Bush mixed solemn remembrance of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks yesterday with a renewed call to complete the mission in Iraq, paying tribute to the fallen even while warning Americans that failure in the Middle East would leave the United States more vulnerable than ever to Islamic extremists.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq," Bush said last night in a prime-time address from the Oval Office, "the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

That ominous language capped an emotional day that took Bush to each of the three locations where terrorists crashed hijacked planes five years ago and killed nearly 3,000 people. It also marked the culmination of a new White House campaign to tie what polls show is a unpopular war in Iraq to a broader campaign against Islamic radicals who, as Bush put it last night, are "determined to bring death and suffering into our homes."

In weaving the two issues together last night, Bush melded one of the most unifying events in recent national experience -- the common horror and sadness of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon -- with one of the most polarizing, the war in Iraq. "I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0061513

"The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat," the president said, tapping his desk for emphasis. "The world is safer because Saddam Hussein is no longer in power."

Bush's 16-minute address closed a day of mournful ceremonies for him and the nation. After a memorial service near Ground Zero in New York City, Bush flew to Shanksville, Pa., where he and first lady Laura Bush met family members of the victims and placed a wreath on the makeshift memorial near the spot where the hijacked United Flight 93 aircraft slammed into a field.

They traveled next to the Pentagon, where they placed a large, white floral wreath on the new stone facade on the section of building that was destroyed by the attack. The Bushes silently faced the wall while a military band played "America the Beautiful."

The president's painstakingly choreographed day was intended by the White House to recapture -- at least for a moment -- the sense of shared purpose that prevailed in the immediate aftermath of the terrorist attacks.

But Bush faced a tall order. Although he urged Americans last night to "put aside our differences," Democrats have been attacking the administration over Iraq and Bush's national security record, hoping these issues will help them reclaim one or both chambers of Congress in November. Polls suggest the public does not accept Bush's contention that the war in Iraq is a "central front" in the campaign against terrorists.

Last night, Democrats said Bush politicized the Sept. 11 anniversary. "The president should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning to commandeer the airwaves to give a speech that was designed not to unite the country and commemorate the fallen, but to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had 'nothing' to do with 9/11," said Sen Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Bush has sought to shift public opinion in the past two weeks with speeches aimed at explaining the nature and goals of radical Islamists and putting the war in Iraq in a broader -- and, he hopes, more popular -- context.

His speech last night featured many of the themes highlighted in those speeches: the idea that the United States is facing a network of extremists driven by a "perverted vision of Islam," the notion that the Middle East enjoyed a long period of false stability in the years leading up to the Sept. 11 attacks, and the proposition that the government has made serious strides in protecting the United States from terrorist attack.

"Today we are safer," Bush told the nation, "but we are not yet safe."

Bush also paid tribute to the firefighters and others who lost their lives to the attacks. Even while the nation saw the "face of evil," he said, "we also witnessed something distinctly American: ordinary citizens rising to the occasion and responding with extraordinary acts of courage."

Bush continued: "We saw courage in office workers who were trapped on the high floors of burning skyscrapers -- and called home so that their last words to their families would be of comfort and love. We saw courage in passengers aboard Flight 93, who recited the 23rd Psalm -- and then charged the cockpit. And we saw courage in the Pentagon staff who made it out of the flames and smoke -- and ran back in to answer cries for help."

Sitting at his desk in the Oval Office, Bush said the nation "is being tested in a way that we have not been since the start of the Cold War." He described the battle against radical Islamists "a struggle for civilization."

Before his speech, the president made no remarks at public appearances yesterday. He met privately with police and firefighters to reassure them that he remains committed to fighting terrorism, and with people who lost loved ones in the attacks.

After attending a memorial service and placing twin wreaths at the World Trade Center site Sunday evening, the president started yesterday having breakfast with first responders at a firehouse not far from Ground Zero. Afterward, he and his wife stood silently next to a battered firetruck door rescued from the wreckage of the World Trade Center site, as police officers and firefighters listened to Scripture and song to honor the dead.

The group paused at 8:46 a.m. and at 9:03 a.m. for moments of silence marking the times that two hijacked planes plowed into the twin towers.

In Shanksville, Bush heard from the Rev. Paul M. Britton, a Long Island minister whose sister, Marion Britton, was aboard United Flight 93. "There is no more sacred ground on this your Earth than this very place," Britton said. "We come here with heavy hearts, yet with joyful spirits. We come here to honor them, to respect them."

DOJ_NMG_0061514

Fletcher reported from New York.

'A Struggle For Civilization' (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday led the nation in silent remembrances for the almost 3,000 victims of the September 11 attacks, hugging family members and standing solemnly for each moment of silence at the three sites where terrorists crashed four hijacked planes that sunny Tuesday morning five years ago.

After the stops in New York, Pennsylvania and Virginia, the president addressed the nation last night, reminding Americans that ever since the worst terrorist attacks on U.S. soil, the United States has been at war in "a struggle for civilization."

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I. But the war is not over, and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious," Mr. Bush said. "We are in a war that will set the course for this new century and determine the destiny of millions across the world."

With midterm congressional elections less than two months away and Democrats charging that Mr. Bush is politicizing the fifth anniversary of September 11, the president urged unity and condemned partisan politics.

"Our nation has endured trials, and we face a difficult road ahead. Winning this war will require the determined efforts of a unified country," he said. "So we must put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

At New York's ground zero, a solemn hush fell over the chasm where the Twin Towers once stood. Thousands of people bowed their heads at 8:46 a.m. to mark the time a plane hijacked by al Qaeda militants slammed into the first tower of the World Trade Center.

Seven stories down in the gaping hole where the 110-story skyscrapers once towered over Lower Manhattan, family members who had come to lay roses in a makeshift reflecting pool fell silent again at 9:03 a.m., when the second tower was struck. Twice more, to mark the moments when each tower collapsed, those in the 16-acre pit fell silent.

"Five years from the date of the attack that changed our world, we've come back to remember the valor of those we lost, those who innocently went to work that day and the brave souls who went in after them," said Rudolph W. Giuliani, New York's mayor during the attacks.

In Virginia, at an early morning Pentagon ceremony to honor the 184 persons killed there, Vice President Dick Cheney also urged Americans to stay united and persevere in the global battle against terror and the war in Iraq.

"In the conduct of this war, the world has seen the best that is in our country," Mr. Cheney said. "We will never forget the day the war began, or the way the war began. Our thoughts remain with the victims of 9/11."

In Shanksville, Pa., on a windswept hillside in a cold drizzle, the president laid a wreath on the spot where United Flight 93 crashed after passengers battled hijackers, whose intentions were likely to strike the U.S. Capitol or White House. He and first lady Laura Bush bowed their heads during a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace." Nearby, bells tolled in memory of the 40 victims, and afterward, the president shook hands with each family member.

"One moment, ordinary citizens, and the next, heroes forever," retired Gen. Tommy Franks said. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

The president said the passengers aboard Flight 93 "gave America our first victory in the war on terror."

But ground zero, virtually unchanged since the first anniversary, remained the focal point of the commemorations. Thousands of family members and friends of victims descended a long ramp to the bottom of the rubble-strewn pit, where they floated roses into the pool and wrote messages on surrounding wooden planks.

Above the hole, the husbands, wives and other loved ones of those who perished read the names of all who perished there in an emotional three-hour reading.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven, I would, just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms," said Carmen Suarez, wife of police officer Ramon Suarez, who was killed after he rushed into one of the towers.

The president began his day with a breakfast with New York firefighters and police officers, a day after he and the first lady laid a wreath in both ground zero reflecting pools in the footprints of the North and South towers.

DOJ_NMG_0061515

"It's hard not to think about the people who lost their lives on September the 11th, 2001. You know, you see the relatives of those who still grieve. -- I just wish there were some way we could make them whole," he said Sunday.

In his speech last night, the president framed the war on terror within the September 11 anniversary and said Americans have renewed their faith because of the devastating attacks.

"The attacks were meant to bring us to our knees, and they did -- but not in the way the terrorists intended. Americans united in prayer, came to the aid of neighbors in need, and resolved that our enemies would not have the last word. The spirit of our people is the source of America's strength," he said.

The day was emotional for the nation's top leaders, with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld recalling the attacks, and the price paid by the military.

"The highest tribute we can pay to them is to commit ourselves to doing everything possible to fight the extremists wherever they are, to making every effort to stay united as a country and to give our truly outstanding men and women in uniform all they need to succeed," he said.

The ceremonies looked toward the future. Organizers hope to raise $30 million in private funding to build a permanent memorial on a 1,700-acre site in Shanksville; the total cost is estimated to be $58 million. Congress has passed the Flight 93 Memorial.

At ground zero, construction has begun on a September 11 memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, which is expected to be finished in five years.

Supporters are still seeking funds for a $22 million memorial park at the Pentagon. Its completion date has been moved back to 2008.

Bush Speaks To A Changed Nation, Where Unity And Clarity Have Evaporated (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — Five years ago, with the World Trade Center and the Pentagon still burning, President Bush faced the difficult task of preparing a shocked nation for war against a single enemy, one that had attacked American soil.

On Monday evening he faced a different, more daunting challenge: to make the case to a skeptical nation that stabilizing and democratizing Iraq was now the most important element of winning that same battle.

For in the end, a speech that began as a commemoration of one of the most searing and painful moments in American history became something else. For much of his 17-minute address from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush in effect acknowledged that his political standing and the success of his avowed mission to make the world safe from Islamic terrorism now rests on victory in Iraq, a mission his critics say was a deadly detour from the task he set out five years ago.

Mr. Bush's aides acknowledged beforehand that it would not be easy. The country Mr. Bush faced on Monday was very different from the shocked, angry but unified nation he addressed from the same chair 1,826 days before. Iraq and its aftermath had changed everything, dividing Americans who five years ago had largely unified around Mr. Bush's strategy, cutting his approval ratings in half and leaving in its wake questions about whether the president had made an ugly confrontation with Islamic extremists worse.

On a day when the White House said it wanted to focus on the victims of 9/11 and their still-grieving survivors, Mr. Bush nonetheless put Iraq front and center. "I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," he said, midway through his speech. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat," he said, and "posed a risk that the world could not afford to take."

Mr. Bush's aim was to put the arguments about Iraq into a broader context, to try again to change the minds of most Americans who tell pollsters that Iraq was, in retrospect, a dangerous diversion. Along the way, he has expanded the cast of terror groups and nations that America must defeat to regain its sense of security — not only a diminished Al Qaeda and a resurgent Taliban, but also Iranian mullahs and their Syrian neighbors, regional threats like Hezbollah and Hamas, and the Sunni extremists and the Shia militias that are battling for control of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0061516

"We are now in the early hours of this struggle between tyranny and freedom," Mr. Bush said, describing a conflict with no end in sight.

He had to make the argument, he has told visitors to the White House, because five years after the 9/11 attacks he worries that the country no longer views itself as at war. But his new approach has its own risks.

"If you conflate all of our problems into one massive, single enemy, you do not define the enemy properly," said Lee H. Hamilton, the former co-chairman of the 9/11 commission. "The risk is that you think you can take them all out with a single strategy. And you alienate the sympathizers, the people who we might be able to talk to."

"And if you don't define your enemy correctly," Mr. Hamilton concluded, "you risk getting your strategy wrong."

That debate over strategy underlies the deeply political element of Mr. Bush's speech, even though the White House insisted that this anniversary was no moment for politics.

The country is eight weeks away from a critical midterm election, at a time that the war in Iraq and the administration's policies on detention, domestic wiretapping and interrogation have made foreign policy a more partisan issue than at any other time in decades. Mr. Bush seemed to acknowledge that when he asked Americans to "put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

He compared the situation now to those faced by Franklin D. Roosevelt in World War II and Harry S. Truman at the dawn of the cold war. But it also had echoes of another era, of a time in 1970 when Richard M. Nixon was urging the country to unify behind a Vietnam War that was expanding into Cambodia.

Mr. Nixon famously warned that night that if "the United States of America acts like a pitiful, helpless giant, the forces of totalitarianism and anarchy will threaten free nations and free institutions throughout the world."

In the current conflict, Mr. Bush made it clear on Monday evening that while the war might have become more complicated, he believes that the choices remain as stark as they were five years ago.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq," he said, nodding to past misjudgments, "the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

To Mr. Bush's admirers, this was the Texan president at his Reaganesque best: defining America's enemies broadly, vowing their defeat and promising to make the spread of freedom his legacy. To his critics, it was Mr. Bush at his most dangerous, approaching the world with little interest in how America is perceived and lumping together its many opponents, even if their agendas and interests are quite different.

"It can be a little spooky," said David M. Kennedy, the Stanford historian whom Mr. Bush has consulted during his periodic Oval Office meetings with outsiders. "It's a war without end, in which our enemies grow like cancerous cells, regrowing as soon as we kill them off."

President Tries To Win Over A War-Weary Nation (WP)

By Dan Balz And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

President Bush's Oval Office speech last night was the culmination of two weeks of efforts to rally the nation behind his policies and presidency by summoning the memory of Sept. 11, 2001. Five years after that indelible day, however, this president's capacity to move the public is severely diminished.

There were echoes of the language and logic Bush invoked five years ago when he united a stricken nation looking to him for both comfort and leadership. But he was speaking to a different nation last night.

Setbacks in Iraq have soured a majority of Americans on that mission. Falsely optimistic predictions of progress have undermined the administration's credibility. A majority of Americans question fundamental elements of the president's argument, including his contention that Iraq is the central front in the campaign against terrorism.

Cumulatively, it leaves decidedly uncertain whether this week's flood of rhetoric and remembrance can alter Bush's perilous circumstances -- at a critical moment for the future of the Iraq mission and the president's own domestic standing 56 days before the midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0061517

"The power of his rhetoric is in marked decline, and that's no reflection on the quality of what he says, which is still very high," said Max Boot, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and a neoconservative scholar who has been sympathetic to Bush's anti-terrorism policies. "There's a desire in the country for more deeds, not more words. . . . We are losing a war right now, and there is no way to get around that."

Three previous times in the past 18 months, as public opinion has slipped, White House officials have announced that Bush would embark on a renewed effort to explain and defend his Iraq and anti-terrorism policies. None produced a lasting positive effect on how Americans view either the president or his policies.

The events of Sept. 11, 2001, provided Bush with many of the rhetorical high notes of his administration, from his bullhorn exhortation atop the rubble of Ground Zero three days after the attacks to the stern eloquence of his speech to Congress six days later in which he put the nation on the road to war.

With his five speeches in the past two weeks, including last night's, Bush has sought to use the fifth anniversary of those attacks to put the war in Iraq in a broader and more politically viable context while offering his interpretation of where the country stands in its long-term confrontation with terrorism.

White House officials are hopeful that the round of speeches will have some impact on moving public opinion. They said that Bush has presented an enormous amount of information and background about Iraq and terrorism, much of which they believe will come as news to many Americans with only a general impression of events.

"I am not so sure that the views [about the Iraq war and terrorism] are chiseled in stone," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "There's been a lot of debate -- one side that may not have been fully represented in ours. . . . It seems that on a lot of things, people may not have fully understood the approach the president took and his thinking."

Both Snow and White House counselor Dan Bartlett singled out the effort to quote the terrorists' own words as a tactic they hope will break through to ordinary Americans who may not be aware of the terrorists' aims. "We may be having a debate in this country about whether Iraq is part of the war on terrorism, but our enemies believe it is," Bartlett said. "We were trying to transcend the political debate in Washington by letting the words of the enemies speak for themselves."

Polls show how the political ground has shifted over time. The Pew Research Center began charting early in Bush's presidency public confidence in his leadership. Bush enjoyed a solid majority until the summer of 2005, when the public was roughly divided. In February 2001, 60 percent of Americans said they saw Bush as trustworthy, compared with just 28 percent who did not. By last month, a majority, 52 percent, said they did not believe he was trustworthy.

"People see him as less trustworthy because things are not going very well," said Pew center director Andrew Kohut.

In his speeches, Bush has advanced several arguments, starting with the proposition that the United States is engaged in a long-term ideological struggle between forces of freedom and Islamic radicals who want to destroy freedom. Although U.S. adversaries come from different backgrounds -- ranging from radical Sunnis in al-Qaeda to Shiite militants such as Hezbollah -- Bush has characterized the opposition as forming a single movement, "a worldwide network of radicals that use terror to kill those that stand in the way of their totalitarian ideology."

"That's is an oversimplification of the task of dealing with the tactic [terrorism] that is used by many different groups, with many different ideologies," countered Paul R. Pillar, a former top CIA analyst and the author of a respected book on terrorism. "It leads to a misunderstanding of the need of what is in fact a different counterterrorist policy for each groups and state we are dealing with. . . . Hamas is an entirely different entity than al-Qaeda. . . . Their objectives are very much different."

Bush this week reiterated his four-year-old argument that Iraq is a central front in the broader struggle against Islamic terrorism. Premature withdrawal, he asserted, could make Iraq what Afghanistan was before the Sept. 11 attacks, an incubator for al-Qaeda. To support the point, he has noted not only the flow of foreign fighters to Iraq but, as on some earlier occasions, the words of al-Qaeda leaders themselves. In his speech last week to the Military Officers Association of America, Bush quoted Osama bin Laden as describing the war in Iraq as "a war of destiny between infidelity and Islam."

Daniel Benjamin, a U.S. counterterrorism official in the Clinton administration who has written extensively about the subject, said efforts to defeat the radical Islamist ideology have been undermined by the Iraq invasion.

"There is no acknowledgment that because we have inadvertently confirmed their claims -- that we seek to occupy Muslim lands, as we have in Iraq -- the ideology is spreading and undermining our efforts," Benjamin said.

DOJ_NMG_0061518

Bush's speeches have been sprinkled with what critics regard as factually questionable assertions -- adding to what even some allies have described as a credibility problem for the White House.

In discussing proposed new rules for trying terrorism suspects at the Guantanamo Bay prison, Bush last week said flatly that "the United States does not torture." That may have been the White House interpretation, but the CIA has approved tactics -- "water-boarding," for example, in which interrogators simulate drowning -- that many military and international lawyers consider outside legal boundaries.

Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, said Bush retains the unique capacity to lead the nation through the commemoration of the 2001 attacks. "The speeches he's given have been meticulously crafted to avoid any obvious political message," he said. "But seen in an overall way, they reinforce in the mind of people his uniqueness as president and the fact that we're still in a dangerous situation, and in times of danger people inevitably rally behind the president."

